

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

THE Parliamentary Debates

During the Second Session of the Sixth Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, appointed to meet at Westminster, the Twenty-third Day of November 1819, in the Sixtieth Year of the Reign of His Majesty King GEORGE the Third.

[Sess. 1819-20.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, November 23, 1819.

THE PRINCE REGENT'S SPEECH ON OPENING THE SESSION.] This day, at two o'clock, his Royal Highness the Prince Regent came down in the usual state, and, being seated on the Throne, his Royal Highness opened the Session with the following Speech to both Houses :

“ My Lords and Gentlemen ;

“ It is with great concern that I am again obliged to announce to you the continuance of his Majesty's lamented indisposition.

“ I regret to have been under the necessity of calling you together at this period of the year ; but the seditious practices so long prevalent in some of the manufacturing districts of the country have been continued with increased activity since you were last assembled in parliament.

“ They have led to proceedings incompatible with the public tranquillity, and with the peaceful habits of the industrious classes of the community ; and a spirit is now fully manifested, utterly hostile to the constitution of this kingdom, and aiming not only at the change of those political institutions which have hitherto constituted the pride and security of this country, but at the subversion of the rights of property and of all order in society.

“ I have given directions that the necessary information on this subject shall be laid before you ; and I feel it to be my indispensable duty, to press on your immediate attention the consideration of such measures as may be requisite for the counteraction and suppression of a system which, if not effectually checked, must bring confusion and ruin on the nation.

“ Gentlemen of the House of Commons ;

“ The estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before you.

“ The necessity of affording protection to the lives and property of his Majesty's loyal subjects has compelled me to make some addition to our military force ; but I have no doubt you will be of opinion that the arrangements for this purpose have been effected in the manner likely to be the least burthensome to the country.

“ Although the revenue has undergone some fluctuation since the close of the last session of parliament, I have the satisfaction of being able to inform you, that it appears to be again in a course of progressive improvement.

“ Some depression still continues to exist in certain branches of our manufac-

ures, and I deeply lament the distress which is in consequence felt by those who more immediately depend upon them; but this depression is in a great measure to be ascribed to the embarrassed situation of other countries, and I earnestly hope that it will be found to be of a temporary nature.

“ My Lords and Gentlemen;

“ I continue to receive from foreign powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country.

“ It is my most anxious wish, that advantage should be taken of this season of peace to secure and advance our internal prosperity; but the successful prosecution of this object must essentially depend on the preservation of domestic tranquillity.

“ Upon the loyalty of the great body of the people I have the most confident reliance; but it will require your utmost vigilance and exertion, collectively and individually, to check the dissemination of the doctrines of treason and impiety, and to impress upon the minds of all classes of his Majesty's subjects, that it is from the cultivation of the principles of religion, and from a just subordination to lawful authority, that we can alone expect the continuance of that Divine favour and protection which have hitherto been so signally experienced in this kingdom.”

His Royal Highness then withdrew, and the House adjourned till 5 o'clock.

ADDRESS ON THE PRINCE REGENT'S SPEECH AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION.] The Prince Regent's Speech having been again read by the Lord Chancellor, and also by the clerk at the table,

Earl Manvers rose to move an address to his Royal Highness, in answer to the most gracious speech which had then been read. He hoped he might be permitted to observe, that he had never before had the honour of addressing their lordships, and that he felt himself unable adequately to discharge the important duty which he had undertaken. He found it necessary, therefore, to appeal to that indulgence which their lordships usually granted to persons placed in situations similar to that in which he stood. In the sorrow which his Royal Highness expressed on account of his majesty's continued indisposition, their lordships must all partake. His Royal Highness next adverted to the causes which had induced him to convene parliament at this early period, and recommended it to their lordships, to direct their early attention to the adoption of such measures as might be necessary to suppress those seditious meetings which had been prevalent for some time back. That the country was in a situation of extreme danger, he believed few of their lordships would deny; and though he did not anticipate the precise nature of the measures which it was intended to propose, he hoped they would prove sufficiently energetic to meet the exigencies of the case. He was aware that much had been said out of that House, and that much would be said within its walls, respecting the rights of the people; but their lordships must be cautious, lest, whilst they were protecting the liberty of the subject, they should compromise the security, of the state. He was aware that in abstaining from offering any remarks on the other subjects adverted to in the speech of his Royal Highness, he left a wide field untouched; but he did so with the less regret, as he felt assured that ample justice would be done to those topics by the noble lord who was to follow him. The noble lord concluded by moving an address, which was an echo to the speech from the throne, and similar to that moved in the House of Commons.

Lord Churchill rose to second the address of his noble friend, of which he said he highly approved. His lordship spoke for some time, but in a tone of voice inaudible below the bar. He came forward, he said, as an independent peer of parliament, to give his feeble but honest support to the government of his royal highness the Prince Regent at a crisis like the present, which was undoubtedly one of great difficulty and danger.

Earl Grey rose. He said, that had he not been aware of the state of the country, the speech from the throne, the address which had been moved in reply to it, and the language used by the noble lord who moved, and the noble lord who seconded that address, would be sufficient to convince him that parliament had never assembled at a more important crisis, or when there were greater difficulties and dangers to be overcome. He did not, however, think the line of policy pointed out in the speech from the throne, and recommended by the two noble lords, was such as ought to be adopted in the present situation of the country; or that the reasons urged in support of the address, ought to induce the House to concur in it without the fullest information. He had attended with the greatest care to every thing that had been stated in that House and elsewhere respecting the situation of the country. He had heard strong observations on the progress of sedition and treason, and on the necessity of adopting measures of coercion calculated to avert the danger which threatened the country. But he had as yet heard no recommendation to avert the danger, by relieving the people from some part of the heavy burthens which oppressed them. Neither of the noble lords had recommended that course which was best calculated to remove the cause of the existing discontent. It was by conciliation, by a reduction of the enormous public expenditure which weighed down the country, and by a system of timely reform and economy, that the threatened danger should be met: for such a system would in its result speedily suppress all the seditious practices referred to in the address, or in the speeches of the noble mover and seconder. Having said thus much in the way of general objection to the line of policy which had been recommended to their lordships, he had now to observe, that neither the noble lord who moved the address, nor the noble lord who seconded it, had described the dangers and difficulties of the country in stronger colours than he was disposed to view them. It was not with respect to the situation of the country that he was inclined to differ from them, but with respect to the causes which had produced it. It was the continued operation of those causes which was the great subject of alarm. The internal situation of the country was most afflicting, and even its external was not in his opinion perfectly satisfactory. The speech from the throne, it was true, stated, that his royal highness the Prince Regent continued to receive from foreign powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country; but even with respect to that part of our situation, his confidence was far from being so great as many might suppose the assurances alluded to in the speech ought to produce. But, into the consideration of our external affairs, when circumstances so much more pressing at home called for immediate attention, he should not enter. The internal situation of the country was the primary object for their lordships deliberation, and to that subject he should now address himself. He had no desire to dispute the difficulties which the situation of the country presented, or to palliate any improper proceedings to which those difficulties might have given birth; though he was not prepared to admit the extent to which it was alleged those proceedings had been carried. He must, however, acknowledge, that the discontent of the country must be very general, and the danger great, if, as asserted in the speech from the throne, a spirit was manifested utterly hostile to the constitution of the kingdom, and aiming at the change of those political institutions which had hitherto constituted the pride and security of the country. Some extraordinary circumstances must have occurred, before any considerable portion of the people of England ceased to respect those institutions which were heretofore their pride. The danger in such a state of things must doubtless be great; but if their lordships were satisfied that the danger was rightly described, the next object of their consideration must be the causes which had led to it. The causes, he was confident, were to be found in that system of policy which he had already condemned—that system which refused to look at the danger which was most pressing and present, and which neglected to make those provisions by which it could alone be effectually averted. To one part of the noble mover's speech he had no objection, namely, that in which he urged the necessity of resisting plans of innovation, tending to the subversion of the constitution and the state of society. No noble lord could be more inclined than he was to oppose the plans of those persons who were endeavouring to lead the people to their ruin—men who, if not all equally criminal, some perhaps acted from ignorance or zeal, while others might expect to attain distinction by introducing confusion into the country; but they were all equally mischievous in their proceedings. To the plans of innovations alluded to he felt the necessity of opposing the most decided resistance. On this point there could be no difference of opinion among their lordships. But while opposing one danger, let care be taken that another was not incurred. The existing laws were adequate to put down those men. Their lordships ought therefore to consider well what might be proposed to them, lest in curing one evil the constitution was exposed to a much greater. The noble lord who moved the address, had, in the course of his speech, warned the House not to let an anxiety for the security of liberty lead to a compromise of the safety of the state. He, for his part, could not separate those things. The safety of the state could only be found in the protection of the liberties of the people. Whatever was destructive of the latter, also destroyed the former. If, therefore, the noble lord hoped that by taking from the liberties of the country he would be giving more security to the state, he had greatly mistaken the way to accomplish the end he had in view, and would, by any measure destructive of liberty, only more speedily incur that danger against which he wished to provide. In supporting the authority of the government, their lordships, he hoped, would not so far lose sight of the principles of the constitution as to sanction any precedent hostile to public liberty, and therefore injurious to the safety of the state. The history of this country furnished sufficient proofs of the danger of such innovations. What would become of that constitution which had always been the boast of the country, if the liberty of the subject were extinguished?

The discontent existing in the country had been insisted on as a ground for the adoption of some measures. He must again observe, that where discontent generally prevailed there must be much distress; but there was another axiom no less true—that there never was an extensive discontent without great misgovernment. It was seldom found that a people, and, least of all, that a people such as that of England, manifested dislike or hostility towards a just and protecting government. Was not the change stated to have taken place in the sentiments and feelings of the people to be chiefly attributed to distress? If, then, this distress produced irregularity of conduct, was it not right when all the vigour of the law was exerted, to make a distinction between those who instigated such proceedings—

between those who were misled, and those who mislead? If it was requisite to punish the one party, it was not less so to relieve the other. The people ought to be taught to look to parliament with a confident expectation that their complaints would be heard, and protection afforded to them. Was it a wise, a safe, or a humane policy, to be always looking with a harsh and severe front towards the people—always ready to punish, but slow to give redress? He had inferred, that the presumption of mal-administration in government was strong when a general discontent prevailed in a country; and he would only ask their lordships to look back to what had happened in the course of the two last sessions, in confirmation of that opinion. He remembered, that two years ago, when their lordships had under consideration a subject similar to the present, a noble friend of his, now sitting at the table (marquis Wellesley) quoting the opinion of lord Bacon observed, that “the surest way to prevent seditions is, to take away the matter of them.” Speaking in the spirit of lord Bacon, his noble friend recommended the taking away “the matter of sedition” by the reduction of every part of the public expenditure which could be spared, and more particularly by the reduction of that great and unnecessary military expenditure which bore so heavily on the country. Had the recommendation of his noble friend been attended to? No. Parliament had paid no attention either to the recommendation of his noble friend, or to the wishes of the people on this subject. Instead of reducing, had not the burthens of the people been rather increased? Profusion was obstinately maintained, as if the continuance of every abuse were necessary to the safety of the state; and at the very time when every relief was refused, severe laws were passed, and the great bulwark of the liberty of the country removed. This was the way in which parliament had unhappily proceeded. Last session, however, commenced in a way which gave reason to hope, that the House of Commons, whatever objection might be made to the manner in which it was constituted, would defend the interests of the people, and adopt measures for their relief; but the hopes which the commencement of the session afforded were soon dashed, and severely disappointed. Not only was no efficient measure of reduction adopted, but additions were made to the expenditure which no public principle justified. He had, in vain, opposed some of those measures which had proved most injurious both to the character of parliament, and to that of the family on the throne. After this denial of justice—for to refuse a relief so necessary to the country was a denial of justice—the session was closed, in a manner most insulting to the distress of the people, by the imposition of three million of new taxes. When their lordships reflected on what had been done, how could they be surprised at the growth of discontent? When no attention was paid to the calls of the people for relief, when their petitions were rejected, and their sufferings aggravated, was it wonderful that at last public discontents should assume a formidable aspect?

The state of the manufacturing districts was alluded to in the speech from the throne. It was well known that in Glasgow, in Manchester, and in the West Riding of Yorkshire, the greatest distress prevailed. Was it such as could be called a mere partial depression? Certainly not, for those districts were filled with a starving population. In the midst of so much distress, could it be matter of surprise that opportunity was afforded to some men to propagate opinions which were less dangerous to the government than to those who received them? Several public meetings had been held in different parts of the country: one for the mischievous, and, he might say, insane purpose—not of petitioning for radical reform, which, notwithstanding that he more strongly than ever thought some reform necessary, appeared to him nothing less than radical subversion—of electing what was absurdly called a legislative attorney. A meeting of the same description was advertised to take place at Manchester; and he must here express his astonishment, that, in the speech from the throne, no notice whatever was taken of the events which had occurred in that town. The meeting at Manchester, ending as it did, was, he must say, by far the most important event that had occurred in the course of his political life. The purpose for which the meeting was first called being considered illegal, it was abandoned, and one was assembled for that object to which he had already alluded, and which, though most absurd and improper, he would not call illegal. But, God forbid he should desire to see the people of England deprived of the right of discussing that or any other political question. The meeting took place, and a scene ensued of a kind which no man could witness, or hear described, without the most painful emotions. The events of the 16th of August must call for a separate, a full, and a solemn inquiry; and he therefore should abstain from any particular details at present. Thus much, however, he might now be permitted to say—that there appeared prima facie evidence against the magistrates of Manchester, of conduct for which it would be most difficult to find any justification. When an inquiry should take place, it would not be sufficient to prove even that the meeting was illegal. He was ready to allow, that the manner of calling such meetings in large towns, and the populace marching to the place of meeting in large bodies, and in military order, from places in the neighbourhood, were circumstances calculated to excite alarm—that such a proceeding was an abuse of the right of petitioning, which was the more to be deplored, inasmuch as the abuse afforded pretexts to those who might wish to abridge that right; but he was not prepared to go the length of calling the object of the meeting illegal, or to admit that the interposition of the magistrates could be justified. Be this, however, as it might, it would be necessary not only to prove that the meeting was illegal, but that the steps taken for its dispersion were also legal. He would refer to the noble lord on the woolsack, whether an attack on a meeting could be justified until every other mode of dispersing it had been tried. It was only in the extreme case of no other means being left to guard against violence on the part of the persons assembled, that force could be lawfully resorted to. If it could be shown that the Manchester magistrates had acted under an imperious necessity, then they would doubtless stand justified for their conduct before God and man: but if they could not prove that imperious necessity, then all the blood shed on the 16th of August must rest on their guilty heads, and parliament would become a party to the guilt, if a severe inquiry was not immediately instituted, and every means taken to wipe so foul a stain from the character of the country.

He was, however, willing to abstain from entering into the investigation of this matter, until ministers had time to lay regular information on the subject before parliament; but there were some other matters connected with the transaction which had taken place at Manchester, on which he thought it necessary to say a few words. He could not avoid calling to their lordships' recollection, the letter addressed by the noble secretary of state to the chairman of the Manchester sessions. Much had been said on the impropriety of prejudging the question relative to the Manchester transactions; but, amongst all the surprising things to which those transactions had given birth, the most surprising was, to hear such an objection urged by those who advised the writing of that letter. The noble lords who supported the address were indignant at the question being prejudged. Where was this indignation when the noble secretary of state expressed his satisfaction at the measures which had been resorted to by the Manchester magistrates? Good God! Was not that prejudging the question? Next in order to this extraordinary proceeding, came the flippant and undignified answer given to the address of the common council of London. They were told that they were ignorant of what had occurred previous to the meeting, and of what had taken place at it; they were informed, that if any persons were injured or aggrieved, the courts of law were open to them; and it was intimated that to institute an extrajudicial inquiry, would be inconsistent with justice. Now, if the members of the common council were ignorant of what had taken place at the meeting, he should be glad to know what information ministers possessed when they advised the letter conveying to the Manchester magistrates the approbation of the Prince Regent. That letter was dated the 21st of August, and, allowing for the time necessary to send to his royal highness at Portsmouth, and to receive a return, it was plain that no sufficient information of what had passed could have been obtained. It was, then, a most extraordinary circumstance that the noble secretary of state should join in the indignation expressed at prejudging the question when he himself, without any inquiry, and without one expression of regret for the dreadful occurrences which had taken place, immediately advised his royal master to give the sanction of his approbation to a transaction of which he could know nothing, except what came from those very magistrates whose conduct was the subject of general reprobation. It would seem, that to ask for inquiry was, in the opinion of his majesty's ministers, to prejudge a question; but that to approve and applaud a transaction which on the face of it appeared culpable, was consistent with candour and justice! The transaction at Manchester was one which their lordships were bound to investigate with the greatest strictness: and if it should be even found that there were circumstances to justify the conduct of the magistrates, still the hurry of the noble secretary of state to make the Prince Regent express an approbation of that conduct was most blameable. What more could have been done had a great victory been gained over a foreign enemy? In the good times of the republic of Rome very different was the conduct of its government; for the senate never decreed a triumph to a general who had obtained a victory in civil war. It was not supposed that the shedding of the blood of their fellow-countrymen could ever be subject for exultation or thanks. He thought it would have been more consistent with the best feelings of the human heart, to have shown some hesitation on such an occasion, than to express satisfaction at the event which had occurred at Manchester, without one word of sympathy for the many sufferings of the people. But it was said, that the courts of law were open. He should wish to ask, whether it was not the duty of the privy council as well as of parliament, to inquire into such transactions. Was it not the practice of the privy council to inquire into cases of sedition and disturbance, to examine witnesses, and to order prosecutions? Upon what principle did they refrain proceeding in this way in the present case? On the same principle, it was their duty, as protectors of the public peace, to institute an inquiry into such a breach of the peace, whether the actors were mobs or magistrates, and to order prosecutions. The answer given to the address of the city of London was therefore inconsistent with that regard to justice, which in such a case ought to be strictly observed. It was possible that the meeting was illegal, and that there might be a necessity for the interference of the magistrates; but these were subjects into which the privy council ought to have inquired before the conduct of the magistrates was approved, and before it was tauntingly said, that the courts of law were open for the redress of those who had suffered injury. The calling on parliament to inquire had been objected to, but it was well known that it was the duty of parliament to inquire and direct prosecutions in cases in which the courts of law were open. Committees of the House of Commons were often instituted for inquiry into offences, and on their recommendation prosecutions were ordered. He would state a case by way of illustration. Suppose a set of ministers, acting on a violent and unconstitutional system of police, should publish a proclamation, imposing a tax, of ship-money for instance, and that magistrates were found disposed to issue warrants for levying the tax by distress, this would be a case in which any person would have a right to bring an action for redress: the courts of law would be open; but would it on that account be less the duty of parliament to inquire? Would it be reasonable to say, that parliament ought not to institute an inquiry into so unconstitutional a proceeding, because the individual who had suffered injury could resort for redress to the ordinary tribunals of the country? But he would ask, how long it had been considered, that inquiries into proceedings of this nature were extra-judicial?—that inquiries into matters which might become the topics of discussion in courts of law, were inconsistent with the principles of public justice? They had heard of inquiries and reports, declaring evidence and stating facts; and not only declaring evidence and stating facts, but pronouncing opinions upon the authority of both Houses of Parliament; not upon subjects of trifling import, but in cases where the lives of individuals were at stake, and at the moment when those individuals were taking their trials upon charges of high treason. If inquiries were permitted on occasions of this nature, he would ask, upon what ground could they be denied on the recent occurrences? Such a denial he could not help thinking shocking to common sense, a violation of all feeling, and in direct contravention of public justice. What would be the consequence of this mode of proceeding, if the people were told that when offences were committed against the crown, inquiries should take place, reports should be made, and their lives endangered by such extra-judicial proceedings, while, if they were themselves injured by offences committed against them, their rights should not be protected by the same means? Such a course of conduct, in his opinion, would not only aggravate the nature of their complaints, but would be contrary to all former practices. Then, in this instance, they were shut out from obtaining redress in another way by the rejection of grand jurymen, and by a refusal of the magistrates to attend to their complaints. In this view of the case, how were they to obtain redress but through the medium of parliament? Was it possible, in such a state of things, by such a character of proceeding, that the discontents which now prevailed, could be allayed?

He had alluded to the address of the city of London. It was not necessary to say more on that subject; the feeling of those who voted that address was perfectly understood: all they desired was inquiry. He would now advert to the manner in which a noble friend of his (earl Fitzwilliam) had been treated, because he had thought it his duty to concur, or, if they would, to give his approbation to a requisition which was directed to the sheriff of the county of York, requesting him to call a meeting of the inhabitants of that highly respectable and independent county, to consider of the transactions which had taken place at Manchester, with a view to address the Prince Regent, and to call upon him to exercise his legal privilege in assembling parliament at as early a period as possible, for the purpose of instituting an inquiry into those transactions. Could there be an application of a more constitutional nature? Could there be an application to the Crown better suited to the circumstances of the country, or better calculated at that moment to allay the ferment and discontent to which the melancholy transactions at Manchester had given rise? It was impossible, in his apprehension, to have instituted a proceeding more admirably adapted to allay discontent. But what was the character of the proceeding itself? A meeting assembled, as large, as numerous, and as respectable in composition, as had ever assembled in that county. Were their proceedings tumultuous or disorderly? Were the speeches which were delivered by the individuals who attended the meeting calculated to inflame or to excite angry feelings? Were the resolutions in any degree such as would afford a construction or inference favourable to the designs of those who might be supposed enemies to the country, or in any way hostile to the laws and to the constitution? The fact was notoriously the reverse. The meeting was as large, as numerous, and as respectable, as it was distinguished by orderly and peaceable behaviour. The speeches were characterised by fairness and moderation, while the resolutions studiously abstained from pronouncing any opinion whatever, farther than was necessary to state the ground of address; and yet for a proceeding dictated for so just and laudable a purpose, so happily devised for that purpose, and attended with such eminent success, was the lord-lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire removed from a situation which he had long held, with so much advantage to himself, and with so much honour to the country. He never could forget the surprise with which this act of extraordinary violence was viewed by every man of every description, whatever might be his political opinions or prejudices, throughout the country. But to a man like earl Fitzwilliam, who had been distinguished by his constant support of the Crown on every trying difficulty—a man of high rank, extensive influence, and princely possessions—a man beloved and esteemed—a man so properly described in resolutions which had been lately passed, from his particular situation, as affording security to the government and firmness and confidence to the people; when such a man was peculiarly marked out and devoted, in a season of such difficulty as the present, what confidence could exist in the ministers by whom such conduct could be sanctioned, and what hope remained for the deluded people of this country? That for the exercise of a constitutional right—for having presumed to question the transactions at Manchester—he should have been thus removed, was indeed inexplicable. He was aware that it was the undoubted privilege of the Crown to appoint and dismiss from offices of this description; but he knew also that the prerogative and power which the Crown exercised might become the subject of representation or remonstrance from either that or the other House. Whether it might be expedient to adopt any step of this kind, was a matter for after consideration. At present he would only advert to the existence of their right, if the exercise of that right should be thought advisable. He would ask, however, whether it was not extremely dangerous that a power should exist, by which, if they presumed to deliver their sentiments in opposition to those of his majesty's ministers, they could be held up to public suspicion? And was it not extremely dangerous, at a period like the present, to place in such a situation such a man as earl Fitzwilliam? Was not such conduct calculated to increase disaffection in the country, and to produce additional hostility to the government? This observation was particularly applicable, when the House recollected the great manufacturing district over which the noble earl presided. What must be the effect in the minds of the people inhabiting that extensive county, when they found that, instead of affording them redress, the individual who had shown a disposition to enforce justice, and to support their rights, had been deprived of the situation which he held—had been treated as a person unworthy of further trust, and had been considered as one to whom the public security could no longer be confided? This was a lesson to persons holding similar situations; it was, in fact, neither more nor less than an intimation, that those who were not determined to support the measures of ministers, could no longer be considered as worthy of the confidence of the government, and would be turned out of any situation of trust or power which they might hold.

He had now adverted, first of all to the magistrates dispersing the people, or to the violence of those magistrates who had been acting in concert with the government: he had next called to the attention of their lordships the ready approbation, without any inquiry or examination, which his majesty's ministers had given to those acts: he had afterwards alluded to the answer which had been given to the city address; and finally to the punishment, or rather to the intended punishment (for he viewed it rather as an honour), of earl Fitzwilliam, for having presumed to listen to the voice, and to advocate the rights, of the people. The result of all these inquiries led him to the conclusion, that it was the determination of ministers to persevere in the measures which they had adopted, and to support that determination by a system of unqualified coercion. The next topic to which he should request their lordships' attention, was that part of the speech from the throne which referred to an addition of from 10,000 to 11,000 men to the regular troops of the country. He certainly had great doubts of the legality of this addition to the regular army without the sanction of parliament; but he did not mean to say much on this part of the subject; neither was it his intention to dwell much on the state of distress in which the country was at present placed, or on the prudence of adding to their burdens an expense of at least from 200,000*l.* to 300,000*l.* He would simply observe, that this was another of that series of measures which had marked the progress of the existing government, and which was unaccompanied by a single measure of concession to keep down the spirit of discontent which so unhappily prevailed. He now wished their lordships to consider, to what end the conduct to which he had been alluding was likely to lead. Their lordships had some experience in that House two years ago, when restrictive laws were passed, and when the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended, of the effect which such measures were likely to produce. The same complaints were then made of the existence of disaffection and discontent, and the same means of resorting to force were suggested. Did those measures produce the effects which were promised? He would ask their lordships, if they at all recollected the history of that time, or examined the situation of the country which resulted from those proceedings, whether the effect was not directly the reverse of that which was anticipated? Where discontent prevailed, was it not infinitely aggravated? The grounds for those measures on coming to be enforced—he meant the march of spies and informers, who were employed by the executive ministers of the Crown—were themselves the instigators of mischief, were themselves the originators of plans of treason, and were themselves the primary cause of an unconstitutional attack upon the liberties of the people. The effect of these measures was, in his opinion, the cause of a great portion of the discontent which now prevailed. After all the experience which they had had, however, there was no attempt at conciliation, no concession to the people; nothing was alluded to but a resort to coercion, as the only remedy which could be adopted. He had seen, and seen with regret, the progress of this system. The natural consequence of such a system, when once begun, was, that it could not be stopped: discontents begot the necessity of force; the employment of force increased discontents: these would demand the exercise of new powers, till by degrees they would depart from all the principles of the constitution. This was the uniform course and progress of such measures; and all the evils which were to be apprehended from their adoption must be expected, unless the preventive wisdom of parliament was called in to correct and to restrain the views of ministers.

The noble earl next alluded to the military force which was raising in different parts of the country, and the attempts which were making to arm one part of the people against the other. It had been said, that a malignant spirit was abroad, but he did not believe that there was any foundation for the charge. If the inhabitants of Manchester exhibited a disposition to disaffection, he verily believed that that disposition might fairly be traced, on the one side to those Orange societies, which were patronized by government; and, on the other, by the party feelings of those who were suffering distress, for the relief of whose complaints no attempt was made, and who, in consequence, assumed all the violence of radical reformers, and felt anxious to destroy all those distinctions of rank by which the existence of society was supported. Such was the order of things which prevailed in Ireland previous to the rebellion, and which ended in the destruction of the independent legislature of that country. He knew not whether it was intended to adopt the same measures with regard to this country as had been adopted in Ireland, where the sword had been substituted for persuasion. The situation of the two countries was extremely different. In Ireland the state of distress was such, that it produced universal confusion: the danger was imminent; but it was suppressed by the power and interference of this country. If the discontents in this country existed to the same extent, and upon the same disparity of resistance, the consequences would be far different. Ireland had derived assistance from this country; but from Ireland we could expect no such advantage: on the contrary, it was to be apprehended that Ireland herself would be placed in a situation of danger. They had been told two years ago that Ireland was perfectly quiet. He remembered well an observation which was made on that occasion; it sunk deep in his recollection. He remembered the answer which was made by a noble marquis (Wellesley) to that statement. The noble earl then quoted a passage from the speech to which he alluded, which, in substance, stated, that the quiet of Ireland was to be attributed to her endeavours to obtain a relief from her religious disabilities; but that if an opportunity offered, she would not hesitate to assert her independence, and to take advantage of any difficulties to which this country might be exposed. To obviate such an attempt, they could only look with confidence to a system of policy founded upon liberality and justice. He would put a case in the reverse: suppose the adoption of coercive laws—an addition to the army, and in fact the establishment of the reign of force and terror. Could this be depended upon? Could government rest with confidence upon the sword for security? It was impossible that a government of such a nature could exist in England. What would become of their manufactures? What would become of their credits; of their commerce; in fact, on what could they rest the stability of their resources without their constitution? Without that spirit which the knowledge of the advantages which they enjoyed under their constitution infused, all their energies would flag, and all their feelings by which their glory as a nation had been established would be utterly dissipated. He would put it to the test of the military experience of the noble duke who sat opposite (the duke of Wellington). He would ask him whether, in the moment of peril, any thing excited the superior qualities of the British soldier to the glorious feats by which he had been distinguished, but the sacred spirit of liberty which he derived from the constitution under which he had lived, and from the consciousness of the rights which that constitution preserved to him? If this principle, which was the great source of our prosperity, was destroyed, what would become of the boasted security of those laws and those measures of coercion which the language of ministers throughout had taught us to expect? Not alone would the various ranks of society be endangered, but the throne itself would be placed in jeopardy. The example of history had sufficiently proved, that there was no comparison between the security of a monarch who lived among a free people, enthroned in their affections, and him who, like the great emperor of Russia, looked alone for protection from the troops by which he was surrounded. It was with a view to establish this liberal principle, that he should move the amendment by which he should conclude. He was of opinion that the powers which existed under the law as it was constituted were sufficient for the preservation of the public peace; but if it could be shown that any new dangers, that any new circumstances, had arisen for which no provision had been made, and that notwithstanding all the diligence and active management of a good government, that government was in imminent peril, he was not prepared to say that, upon receiving such proof, he would not give his sanction to measures calculated to meet those unusual exigencies. But he must say, that his majesty's present ministers were the last persons to whom he would intrust the general interests of the state. He should grant them new powers, such as those to which he had alluded, with a degree of caution amounting to repugnance. It should, however, be their duty in the first instance, to institute a solemn inquiry into the circumstances which had attended the unfortunate transactions at Manchester on the 16th of August, and thereby convince the people of England that they were their true guardians, and sensibly alive to every thing in which their interests were involved. The noble earl concluded by moving an Amendment to the Address by adding at the end thereof the words,

“ To assure his Royal Highness, that, called together at a season when unexampled distress and extraordinary agitation prevail in some of the most populous districts of the kingdom, we will immediately proceed to take into our most serious consideration the various matters contained in his Royal Highness's gracious speech from the throne.

“ Humbly to express to his Royal Highness our reprobation of the attempts which have been made to persuade the suffering classes of the people to seek relief from their distress in schemes injurious to themselves, dangerous to the public quiet, and inconsistent with the security of the constitution, which it is our duty and determination to maintain against every species of encroachment and attack.

“ To represent to his Royal Highness, that while we thus declare our determined resolution firmly to uphold the just authority of the laws, we feel that we are called upon by a sense of duty to conduct ourselves so as to satisfy the people that their complaints will at all times receive from us that just attention, and their rights that ready protection, that is indispensable to their safety and freedom.

“That this seems to us more particularly necessary, in order to maintain that competence in the public institutions of the country, which constitutes the best safeguard of all law and government.

“That we have seen with deep regret the events which took place at Manchester on the 16th of August, and that, without pronouncing any opinion on the circumstances that occurred on that melancholy occasion, we feel that they will demand our earliest attention, in order to dissipate the alarm to which they have given birth; and by the result of a diligent and impartial inquiry, which may show that the measures then resorted to were the result of an urgent necessity, or that an important constitutional privilege cannot be violated, and the lives of his majesty's subjects sacrificed, with impunity.”

Lord Sidmouth said, he was induced to solicit their lordships attention in consequence of the manner in which the noble earl who had just sat down had thought fit to allude to events involving great official responsibility — a responsibility which attached principally, if not exclusively, to himself. The noble earl had commenced his speech with an admission of the existence of present danger. Indeed, he did not believe there was an individual either in this or the other House of Parliament, or in the kingdom, who was not prepared to make the same concession. The noble earl had attributed those dangers to the neglect of parliament in the performance of its duties. How far that proposition was well founded, their lordships were perfectly competent to judge. It was within their lordships' recollection, that in the course of the last session of parliament military retrenchment had taken place to an extent which appeared to satisfy every individual calling for retrenchment. Another call which had been made on the House was for the abolition of sinecure places. In this, too, government had conceded to the supposed wishes of the country: whether those concessions had or had not been carried too far, was a question which events would probably demonstrate. With regard to the military retrenchment, those noble lords who had experience of the present state of the country, and who felt the insufficiency of the means which were afforded to support the civil magistrates, could best satisfy the House. It was not his intention to travel through all the parts of the noble earl's speech. The primary object was the internal state of the country; and to that, for the present, he should confine his observations. The internal state of the country it was that had determined the Prince Regent, by the advice of his ministers, to assemble parliament, for the purpose of laying before the two Houses such information as would present to them at one view a clear exposition of the state in which the country was placed. It would be for parliament to consider, upon reading this statement, and to say, whether some additional powers were not necessary for the preservation of the constitution, and whether the present laws were not too weak for that purpose. But the manner in which the noble earl had referred to the circumstances to which he had alluded, which he (lord Sidmouth) felt in his own mind to be immediately connected with his official character, induced him at once to apply himself to that subject. The transactions at Manchester on the 16th of August formed a prominent point of the noble lord's speech; and he would take upon himself to say, that there never was a transaction in which the public were interested, or respecting which they were solicitous, in which there had been so much misrepresentation, falsehood, and exaggeration as respecting the proceedings of that day. They had heard of the magistrates of Manchester as if they were merely magistrates of the town of Manchester, and as if they were the stipendiary magistrates of government. This was not a true representation of facts; the magistrates in question were appointed by the county, and commenced their duties in the beginning of July last. There were of them twelve in number, and their attentions were unremitting to preserve the public peace. They were none of them Manchester magistrates; they were men of the highest respectability in the county, who had associated themselves for the purpose of watching over the conduct of persons whose designs were but too evident to be mistaken. Two of them only were stipendiary magistrates; he alluded to Mr. Hay, who had been appointed by the quarter sessions; and to Mr. Norris, who had been appointed by the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, to whom he was only known by character. These individuals had been the objects of much unfounded misrepresentation. He should have thought, from the policy of the system of government in this country, that the conduct of magistrates would not be condemned, at least without due deliberation, if not with great allowance, and that presumption would have been in their favour. They knew that in the first criminal court in the country, the court of King's-bench, the aberrations of magistrates, where they might have departed from the strict letter of the law, or acted from unintentional error, had always been treated with every possible indulgence. But, to place presumption aside, the danger by which those magistrates were surrounded on the day to which the noble lord alluded, was sufficient to justify every act which had been imputed to them. When they saw an immense assemblage of individuals, marching in military array, coming in large bodies from a distance, and declaring their object to be neither more nor less than the total subversion of the constitution or to perish; these persons carrying with them caps of liberty, pikes bearing the appearance of having been dipped in blood, and flags inscribed with the most seditious sentences; all, in his humble estimation, ought to have placed presumption on the side of the magistrates. But there were other grounds of presumption in their favour: if they had misconducted themselves, the courts of law were open for redress; and yet, not a single application or charge had been made against them, while bills had been found against every individual whom they had apprehended, by the grand jury of the county palatine of Lancaster. The noble viscount then proceeded to defend the yeomanry from the charges which had been preferred against them. He denied that they had done more than became them as soldiers, acting under specific orders; and instanced the various contradictions which had been given to the charges which had been brought against them, as proofs of the malevolent falsehoods by which they had been assailed. Under all the circumstances, he thought the presumption was as strongly in favour of them as it was in favour of the magistrates. On the illegality of the Manchester meeting he could speak with the utmost confidence. Without referring to information exclusively in possession of the government, and none of which had yet been communicated to the public; but taking the facts which were generally stated and admitted, he would not hesitate to declare, relying on the opinion of the great legal authorities, in whom he could place the most implicit confidence, that the assembly of the 16th of August was not only illegal, but treasonable.—The next object of the noble earl's animadversions was the letter addressed to the lords-lieutenant of the counties of Chester and Lancaster, communicating the approbation of the Prince Regent's government to the magistrates and the yeomanry who acted on that occasion. He did not shrink from any responsibility which the writing of that letter imposed, and he was convinced that a plain statement of facts would convince their lordships, that his majesty's government could not have pursued a different course. An account of the transactions of the 16th, at Manchester, reached ministers on Tuesday night. On Wednesday, Mr. Hay, the chairman of the Salford Quarter Sessions, accompanied by another gentleman, arrived in town to give the fullest information on all the circumstances to the government. A cabinet council was summoned immediately, and attended by all those members of it who were then in town. It consisted of the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, of the noble master-general of the ordnance, of the noble secretary of state for foreign affairs, and of several other members, and was attended by the law officers of the Crown. The two gentlemen who had come from Manchester made their statements in the presence not only of the cabinet, but of the law officers; and all the information which they gave, and all the circumstances which they minutely detailed, served only to confirm the conviction which had been produced by the original account, that the magistrates had faithfully done their duty. As soon as this step had been taken, and this explanation given, the law-officers gave it as their opinion, on a view of the whole case, that the conduct of the magistrates was completely justified by the necessity under which they acted. With this conviction on the minds of the Prince Regent's ministers, the letter in question was written. If, so convinced, they had not acted in the manner they did, and had delayed to communicate the approbation of government till they had made unnecessary inquiries, he would not hesitate to say, that they would have acted not only unwisely, but unjustly and basely. The persons whose conduct had been thus canvassed, had performed a most painful and dangerous duty; they had exposed their lives for the preservation of the public peace; they had given a satisfactory account of the necessity which compelled them to act; the presumption was in favour of the truth of their statements: and, were ministers, in such a case, to say, after hearing them, "No, we cannot approve of your proceedings; there is every appearance that you acted with proper temper and decision; there is a certainty that you exposed your personal safety in the performance of your duty, but facts may afterwards come out against you, and on this vague anticipation of probable contradiction, we will refrain from thanking you till we have heard the statements of your accusers?" Would such conduct have been fair, manly, or generous? Ministers were charged with prejudging the question by the conduct they pursued; but how could they have done otherwise than they did, convinced as they were that the magistrates had acted under a necessity that admitted of no alternative? What would have been the consequence of any doubt thrown unnecessarily on their intentions or acts? What would have been thought of the conduct of government by the other magistrates of the kingdom? The times in which they lived were not those that would allow them with impunity to temporise in a manner so base and so unjust towards men to whom the protection of the public peace was intrusted. The noble lord here entered shortly into an account of the transactions of the 16th, and described the hostile conduct of the populace towards the constables and the authorities, both before and after the meeting. Campbell, a constable, had been actually stoned to death, in open day, in Manchester; and a constable of the town had stated that he considered his life in danger. This system of hostility to all who were engaged in executing the law, or preserving the public peace, was not confined to Manchester. It appeared in Newcastle, and other places. Referring to the cruelties said to have been perpetrated by the military on the 16th, he declared that not a single life was lost in consequence of the blows which they inflicted. On this subject he would not, however, dwell any longer at present: the danger with which we were threatened from the discontented state of the public mind was generally admitted and its magnitude should induce their lordships to unite in vigorous measures to avert it. If, in the character of that danger, there was any feature more alarming than another, it was the conduct of some persons, who encouraged and emboldened the disaffected by standing between the government they assailed, and the party assailing. The noble lord, advertng to the observations of earl Grey, regarding the dismissal of lord Fitzwilliam from the lieutenancy of the West Riding of Yorkshire, said he would not enter at large into the grounds of that measure. The different view which that noble lord and his majesty's ministers took of the state of the country, and the public declaration which he signed in opposition to their wishes, showed that all confidence between them and him had ceased, and that a separation had become indispensable. These were all the observations which he felt himself called upon to make on the present occasion. He concluded by declaring, that he should vote for the original address as it stood; and if the amendment was persisted in, he should feel it his duty to take the sense of the House upon it.

Lord Erskine, in rising to support the amendment, said, that although he could add nothing to recommend it to the adoption of the House, because it had in his opinion, received no answer whatsoever from the noble secretary of state, though of all others the most bound to justify its rejection, yet he could not content himself with giving a silent vote, to be perhaps passed over in the published list of a division. He wished all the people of this land to know, that he was still in his place, as he ever had been when the rights of the people were invaded; and upon the present occasion, they had not only been most manifestly invaded, but wantonly trampled upon and insulted.—The unquestionable merit of his noble friend's amendment was, that whilst it supported the address in every part of it that pointed out any public offence or danger, and to all that pledged the House to maintain order and tranquillity, yet at the same time it justly and prudently called upon them to examine into the causes of the discontent and disorder which they condemned; to pledge them also to support the liberty of the subject under the laws, and to suffer no wrong which might have been committed under the pretext of supporting them to pass unexamined and unredressed. — What answer had been given, or even what attempt at an answer had been made to that sound and statesman like proposition. — The noble lord who had just sat down, in a speech most unwise and unfit in the present agitated state of the country, instead of sympathizing with admitted sufferings, and lamenting the supposed necessity of inflicting them, had passed them by altogether, and closed the door at once, without the slightest consideration of them, against either inquiry or relief. Such a course of proceeding, however it might have been determined upon by ministers, even on grounds which might appear to them to be satisfactory, could not possibly justify the House to refuse examination, when the people appealed to parliament for protection, and tendered the proofs of most atrocious violations of the constitution. — When the people, my lords (said lord E.), complain to us of the grossest misgovernment of the magistracy, and of the ministers for sanctioning their misconduct, can we possibly accept of their own declarations as conclusive evidence in their justification, whilst we refuse to hear the evidence of their accusers? — When ministers took upon themselves to pledge the Crown to support their rash pre-judgment, and to condemn the people, how could they be considered to be responsible, if parliament, upon their own suggestion, and under their own influence, rejected all inquiry into the facts offered to be proved, and which if established must condemn them? In laying their conduct before the House by the address which they have proposed, they must think, no doubt, that they have submitted their conduct, and the state also of the country to the impartial and constitutional judgment of the legislature. Be it so; but what then must the nation, and all other nations, think of the House of Lords as a branch of that legislature, if its decision echoed the address prepared by themselves who were accused, against the universal complaints of the people, and this without hearing a syllable of the proofs, which by petitions from one extremity of the country to the other, they had been solemnly called upon to examine. Such a proceeding was without example in the history of the worst times. It would have been wiser to give a wrong judgment after hearing the evidence, than to reject it altogether. The first could only raise the presumption of an error in judgment, but the last might create suspicions of too gross a character to be stated. — The noble viscount, however, to justify the rejection of the amendment, had assured the House that the proceedings at Manchester had been grossly misrepresented; but this he thought was rather an additional argument for an inquiry into the facts. — But, putting aside all accusation or justification of ministers, was it not the duty of the House to examine impartially the state of the country, and the acts of the magistracy, to restore tranquillity, by inspiring the people with a trust in the justice of parliament, to afford relief and protection even to those who might have offended, if the laws had been overstepped. Can we, my lords (said lord E.), expect either affection or obedience from subjects, if we ourselves depart from the immutable rules of justice? — He had formerly observed to their lordships, that the diseases of the state, like those of the body, must be first traced to their causes before any remedy could be usefully, or even safely applied; and he was sorry to be obliged to say, that the principal cause of that now complained of was unhappily, too notorious. It arose (no matter whether with or without foundation) from a distrust of parliament: the great bulk of the people did not consider the House of Commons as their representative, nor the House of Lords as independent, when they uniformly, even more than the House of Commons, adopted every measure which every administration in its turn had proposed. They thought, no matter whether justly or unjustly, that the influence of the Crown in both Houses of Parliament, annihilated their use and office in the government; they declare in all their tumultuous meetings that whatever ministers introduced was always conclusively adopted, whilst their wishes and opinions were rejected. Now, nothing surely could be more dangerous than that such an opinion should spread, and take root throughout the country; yet could it possibly be a remedy for such a diseased opinion, or rather could it do otherwise than exasperate and confirm it, to defer to ministers as you are called upon to-day; to take their own words for their own wisdom and justice, and to refuse to hear the other side, that thus they might be pronounced by the House to be immaculate, and the people discontented without cause. Was it possible to expect tranquillity or obedience to government, if this course was pursued, or to fail in securing both the one and the other, by adopting the amendment? My lords (said lord E.) if whilst you shall maintain a just submission to lawful authority, even by military force when unfortunately necessary, you shall at the same time take care to limit its interference, and never to suffer it to pass beyond the bounds of the law; and if, when excesses occur, you shall open wide all your assemblies and tribunals to the sufferers, and hear their complaints with an affectionate feeling for the great mass of the people, appeals to force will be but rare and insignificant. Only do this systematically, beginning to-day upon so favourable an occasion, and every thing you fear will soon disappear, like an enchantment or a dream: Only show the world that you are not the slaves of ministers, but the faithful guardians of the rights of the people, and you may lay at rest all the laws against tumultuous assemblies, and your troops and magistrates may go to sleep. But he ought, he said, to have spared their lordships from hearing these truths from him; the causes of the present discontents had been already pointed out by his noble friend with so much truth and eloquence as the foundation of his amendment, that he felt his words return back upon him. The complaints which had convulsed the public mind from one extremity of the island to the other, were surely a sufficient presumption of their justice, not merely to vindicate inquiry, but to impose it as a solemn duty upon the House; and the more so as it was the only possible course by which the alienation of the lower orders of the people from the government of the country could be removed; and even if the result in favour of the magistracy appeared to be probable or almost certain, the more politic would be the examination of the facts, as it would show that parliament, instead of being cold to the wishes of the people, ran even before its duty, through sympathy for their feelings. There could be no doubt, and for the very reasons he had adverted to, that there had been tumultuous assemblies of the people in different parts of the country, in numbers too great to be useful, and which could not be brought together without leading to probable disturbances of the peace; neither had he any doubt that the meeting in the neighbourhood of Manchester was of a description to call for the active vigilance of the magistrates; but at the same time it could not be denied, that the object of the meeting was legal, it being to petition parliament, and no overt acts had been committed, nor any conspiracy discovered, to prove it to have been a cover for rebellion or sedition. On the contrary, there was little ground for believing that violence or disturbance of any kind was contemplated, when very great numbers brought their wives and children along with them; for if tumult or danger had been contemplated or expected, the feelings of nature would have prevented the presence of women and infants in the crowd. Supposing, however, that the great numbers assembled, and the banners displaying the wishes of this multitude for a reform visionary and impracticable, had rendered the meeting in the honest judgment of the magistrates unsafe and injurious to the public peace, and therefore fit to be dispersed, was not the mode of accomplishing it most clearly prescribed by the laws, and completely and safely practicable? After mildly admonishing those who were nearest to them, were they not bound to read the Riot act in different parts of this immensely numerous meeting, so that the reading of it might be perfectly notorious, which most undoubtedly had been very insufficiently done; and no means taken to circulate the knowledge of it. The leaders of that multitude well knew, and no doubt would have made known to those who followed them, the consequences of remaining after an hour had elapsed, and this knowledge would in itself have soon dissipated or thinned the meeting; but what after all was the legal consequence of their keeping together after the period prescribed by the statute? Not that they were subject without imminent necessity, to be sabred right and left with indiscriminate and merciless violence, by cavalry impelled against them as in rebellion or foreign battle. No; they were felons only, and subject to indictment. Lord E. said, he admitted that even before the hour had elapsed so as to render them felons, or any portion, however small of it, if such acts of force or dangerous breaches of the peace had been committed or threatened as would justify magistrates to repel force by force, that force not only might, but ought most unquestionably to be employed; but did such a case exist at Manchester, or in the justification of the magistracy, had any such acts of the multitude been proved?—Certainly not. On the contrary, their leader had offered his person to the laws if he had offended, and no violence had been committed when they were charged by the yeomanry and cut down. Now, my lords (said lord E.), when you are invoked by the universal voice of the country, can you, in such a case as this, refuse all examination, only because ministers forbid you; and is it possible that your lordships should be blind to the peril of pursuing such a course? It may be necessary perhaps very soon to employ military force in the support of lawful government, which is but another name for protection of the people; and if the amendment is accepted, recourse may be had to it without unpopularity or suspicion; but if, by now rejecting all examination, the unlawful employment of force shall be vindicated, government will then raise a question in public opinion between the people and itself which the military may be called upon to decide; and God forbid that such a dangerous arbitration should ever exist! When the military are employed upon lawful occasions, they do not then act against the people but for their manifest protection; but if this sound distinction comes to be disbelieved or brought into doubt or question, your lordships should recollect that the soldiers being themselves part of the people, partaking of course all their feelings, the arm may be palsied with which we may have to act. It appeared to him, therefore, that the House was bound by every principle of interest as well as duty to satisfy the people, that whilst parliament was determined on the one hand to put in force the laws of the country, and to maintain order and tranquillity even by force if unhappily necessary, yet that they were equally resolved to protect their liberties and avenge their sufferings; which was all that the amendment called upon their lordships to do. To this, however, it was objected, that the subject prayed to be inquired into had already been decided by the rejection of the bills of indictment by the grand jury of Lancaster, which brought these transactions before them; but the complaints of complaining individuals, and the evidence produced by them to which their lordships were strangers, was but a small part of so great a national question; might not the prisoners in 1794 have been proceeded against by the state trials at the Old Bailey, without the interference of parliament, but the magnitude of the question formed the exception, and the reports of both Houses, even though they assumed the guilt of the individuals who were in custody and to stand their trials, were made public. This was done under the same administration of government which now refused inquiry, because bills of indictment by a few individual sufferers had been rejected. Nothing surely could be more completely at variance than the two courses which had been pursued! This (said lord E.) is the whole; the amendment neither negatives nor questions the principles which are the foundation of the address, and if adopted leaves the House solemnly and unanimously pledged, as it ought to be, to support the government as established by law, which I hope always to be found amongst the foremost to maintain; whilst, at the same time, it gives it the most efficacious support by assimilating it with the interests and affections of the people. For these reasons I shall vote for the amendment.

Lord King observed, that the assertion of the noble secretary of state, that misstatements had gone abroad on the subject of the Manchester transactions, laid the strongest ground for inquiry. The speech of the noble secretary was remarkable for its coincidence with every thing that government had done regarding the melancholy transactions of the 16th of August. It contained not one expression of regret. The letter of thanks to the magistrates, the answer to the city address, the speech from the throne, and the address now proposed in answer to it, were all silent on this head. The magistrates had been approved of in a high quarter, but it was certain they were not approved of by the nation. It must be allowed on all hands that they had committed indiscretions; at least they had been guilty of rashness and precipitation. Magistrates might act lawfully, and yet be guilty of indiscretion. They had a title to apprehend the individuals upon proper depositions, but they might have been indiscreet in selecting the moment for their apprehension. Why did they not issue their warrants before the meeting? Why did they not prevent the meeting by declaring it illegal? or why not wait till it had dispersed, to apprehend its leaders? The dangers, if there were any, arose from its dispersion, and not from listening to speeches; and there was every reason to believe, that if not interfered with, it would have passed off like innumerable other meetings of the same kind. The noble lord then went on to state, that distress was the cause of the present discontent, and appealed to those places where disaffection appeared exactly proportioned to the privations endured. He then adverted to the meetings for loyal declarations, and said, that such effusions always preceded attacks on the liberty of the subject. He did not deny, that there was now considerable danger, and considerable discontent; but contended that the former could only be averted, and the latter removed, by measures of conciliation and kindly reform. Regarding reform, the nation was divided into three parts; the adherents of ministers, who objected to all reform; the radical reformers, whose plans would be a subversion of the constitution; and those who supported the necessity of a gradual, a practical, and a moderate reform. The noble lord professed himself desirous of being ranked in the latter class, and thought great good would result from a correction of abuses, when they should be proved to exist, and a careful repair of the breaches which time might have made in the constitution. An opinion had unfortunately gone abroad, from the neglect of this species of reform, that parliament, instead of being a check and a control on the measures of the executive, had become its minion and its tool. It had last year increased the taxes by three millions, without any ostensible object but to benefit the fund-holder; and the grant of 10,000*l.* a year to the duke of York, for visiting, at stated intervals, his afflicted father (a measure which gave more disgust than any thing that had been done for a long time) was quoted as another instance of disregard to national interests. The noble lord then drew a parallel between the treatment of Ireland, before the late rebellion, and that of England, recently; and showed how the system of spies and informers had been transplanted from the one country into the other. Nothing could more tend to alienate the people from the government than a refusal of inquiry. The noble lord, therefore, after a few more observations, concluded by supporting the amendment.

The Earl of Carysfort said, it was our duty, as members of society, to protect each other, by upholding those principles on which society depended. Much had been said of the meeting at Manchester on the 16th of August, and the transactions of that day. It seemed to him extraordinary, that there should be a second opinion as to the legality of that meeting. Was it possible that it could be lawful for men to meet in such enormous numbers, and in a threatening manner, as on that occasion? Could a proceeding be lawful which went to defeat all the ends for which men entered into society? Men entered into society for the purpose of leaving the protection of their rights to public authorities constituted for that purpose, and not to the adjudication of themselves. If that principle was departed from, no individual could have any security for his life or property. The meeting of so large a body, and with such devices, even under pretence of a lawful purpose, could not be allowed; for it must necessarily inspire terror, and such terror was, in its nature, an act of violence and compulsion. The present times were different from those of the civil wars, when there was a claim of arbitrary power in the Crown, and a contest on the part of the people for the recovery of ancient rights and liberties. Those liberties were now well understood, and he was convinced that no family was ever more attached to those principles than the illustrious family under whose auspices we lived. The king undertook to administer justice in mercy, and so mild had been his reign, that in the performance of this duty numerous cases had occurred in which mercy might be thought to have been carried too far. What would have been said at the period of the Revolution, by the judges of that day, had a grand jury been abused in public libels, as the grand jury of Lancashire had been treated for doing their duty? He hoped, that, laying aside party spirit and prejudice, all would unite in supporting the constitution, and that was only to be done by giving support to the magistracy of the country. He was anxious that full and complete support should be given to the executive magistrates in the discharge of their duty; for those principles, on which every thing valuable in society depended, could only be maintained by supporting the executive. He certainly was of opinion, that lenient measures were better indications of firmness, than those which partook of a character of violence. He always considered, that if the magistrates had violated or misused the powers intrusted to them, the courts of law were open to the persons aggrieved. In allusion to what had fallen from a noble lord respecting the lord-lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire, he remarked, that had he been placed in the same situation as earl Fitzwilliam, he should probably have acted differently. Had that noble lord asked his advice, he should perhaps have advised him to take a different course from that which he had pursued; for he could not but feel, that at a juncture like the present, persons of high station, like that noble lord, and possessing extensive property and influence in the country, should come forward and prevent the people from being led away by designing and seditious persons; should not abet them in their errors, but teach them to look up to them for direction. Still, however, he could not but sincerely wish that his majesty's ministers had viewed that noble earl's conduct in the light in which he viewed it. It must be admitted, that that noble lord never was one who gave his countenance to proceedings of a dangerous character; but that, on the contrary, upon trying occasions, he had in more than one instance given his support to the administration, in opposition to the opinions of those with whom he usually acted. He could not, therefore, but regret the extent of the punishment which had in this case been inflicted. The noble lord said, he should conclude with an earnest hope that none of the apprehensions of public danger which were at present entertained might be verified.

The Duke of Athol observed, with reference to the present situation of the country, that the artifices of factious demagogues were working on the loyal and industrious poor, by means of the worst poison that ever contaminated the public—a poison sufficient to awaken the horror and detestation of the government under which we lived. He did not mean to dwell on the particular circumstances of the Manchester meeting, but to state what he knew from local experience of the northern part of the kingdom, with which he was more immediately connected. He did not hesitate to say, that a short time ago, a more moral and religious set of people did not exist; but he knew that attempts had been made to corrupt them, although those attempts had not perhaps been so successful in that quarter, as in some other parts of the kingdom. He knew that delegates had been employed in disseminating blasphemous and seditious tracts among them, either gratis, or at so low a price, as to enable the poorest to purchase them. These tracts had certainly not been so successful there, in destroying order and morality, as they had been in this part of the country; but still they had to a certain degree succeeded. He had the satisfaction to state, that in the country where he resided, the projects that had been suggested for the relief of the labouring poor had in part succeeded; and that, notwithstanding the swarm of publications spread among them, for the purpose of rendering them dissatisfied with their situation, they were convinced that every thing practicable had been done for the amelioration of their condition. He was one of those who thought themselves bound to call the attention of their lordships to the state of the lower classes, in order to save them from the specious delusions of those demagogues, who were disseminating among them the injurious principles of radical reform. The question of reform had been often agitated, but he never knew any specific, practicable plan, on which twenty persons were agreed. We had at last, however, got one. We had now a radical reform, a reform by which noble lords would not remain in possession of their estates three days after it was carried into effect. He had a newspaper in his pocket, in which a radical reformer stated pretty plainly what he meant. An exchange of poverty for property was the principle and purpose of the radical reformers. If their lordships did not adopt some measures to restrain such men, they would not do their duty. The mass of the people were loyal, but if not protected, they would be lost in the gulph of radical reform. He would recommend the signal of lord Nelson when at the battle of Trafalgar, "England expects every man to do his duty." Let the House also do its duty, and by so doing it would have done that which, under divine Providence, would arrest the calamities with which the country was threatened, and insure its safety. He had sat in that House nearly forty years; he had seen, in that time, many black clouds hanging over his head, but the good sense, the loyalty, and the morality of the people had never failed to dispel them; and that, he was persuaded, would be the case, in the present crisis of the country.

Lord Lilford said, that the liberties of the people were involved in the protection of the constituted authorities, whose reputation could not suffer without injury to those over whom they presided. He would ask, then, whether some of the speeches of noble lords, who pretended to be the exclusive champions of liberty, were not calculated to degrade that respect which was due to the magistracy? In advocating their cause, he advocated the cause of the people. The little he had to say should be confined to his own local knowledge. He had received information from persons in the middle rank of society, not of the privileged orders, but men of sound judgment, and without prejudice or partiality; he held this correspondence in his hands, and he should state two or three passages from it. Its date commenced with January, 1819, and it stated that the radicals, in urging parliamentary reform, and decrying the corn bill, only meant to excite a prejudice against the landholders; that the people in the quarter in which he resided were goaded on by reformers, and ready for any act of desperation; that their minds were assailed by seditious tracts, and if sedition was allowed to go on they would write down any government on earth. The cotton trade had improved, and he was sure would improve, if not prevented by the madness of those men—but reform had got possession of their minds; it mixed with all their habits and ideas, and constituted the subject of all their conversation. He was a man of but plain intellect, and did not pretend to see far before him; but it did appear to him to be a strange perversion of optics to see only the possible mischief that might accrue from government, and to be blind to the immediate danger already flowing from the conduct of the people. For his part, he was willing to give, by his vote, a pledge of his opinion, that in the present state of the country some remedy was necessary to check the mischief which he saw existing.

Earl Grey took that opportunity to explain, that, with reference to the objection that any parliamentary inquiry would be extrajudicial, he had stated, that according to this mode of reasoning, it might happen that ministers might order the most illegal acts, such, for instance, as the levying of ship-money; and yet parliament might be precluded from any examination of their conduct, by being told triumphantly that any inquiry by them would be extrajudicial.

Lord Lilford begged to be allowed to supply an omission in his speech: it was, that he knew personally the character of the magistrates at Manchester: he knew them to be men of the highest integrity: he knew also that they were most desirous of inquiry.

Earl Grey, in explanation, observed, that he had carefully abstained from saying any thing respecting the character of the magistrates, though he certainly had a very strong opinion as to their conduct; but all he wished was a full, fair, and impartial inquiry; for if, as was said, their conduct was capable of justification, an inquiry was the more necessary even on that account.

The Lord Chancellor said, that whatever might be the tendency of parliamentary inquiry to allay local uneasiness, and however much he might, as an individual, wish it for the sake of justifying the character of the magistrates, yet, looking at the question in his public capacity, he must say, that no such inquiry as was called for could be granted consistently with the spirit of the laws of the country. No noble lord had ventured to say that the meeting at Manchester was a legal meeting. When he considered what proceedings were now in progress in the courts of law, he almost feared to speak out his opinion; but when he read in his law-books that numbers constituted force, and force terror, and terror illegality, he felt that no man could say that the Manchester meeting was not an illegal one. It was a new and somewhat strange ground that was taken on the present occasion by the advocates for the liberty of the subject. He had, to be sure, often heard it stated on former occasions to the attorney-general, when he filed an information, "Why have you done so? why have you not adopted the old constitutional course of laying the complaint before a grand jury?" whereas, now the cry was, "Why do you not, since that constitutional tribunal a grand jury, has rejected the bills, instantly file an unconstitutional information in order to allay the popular ferment?" He felt from the bottom of his heart that the meanest subject of this country was better than the highest of any other country under heaven; but he would be no longer so, if he gave up his ear and soul to those evil counsellors who would make not (as they pretended) the poor man rich, but would make both rich and poor "poor indeed!" It was complained, that not only had the grand jury rejected bills, but that magistrates had refused to receive information on oath. This latter conduct was either right or wrong: if right, why complain about it? if wrong, why interfere with measures already under consideration in the court of King's-bench? Another ground of complaint was, the conduct of the coroner in adjourning an inquest. But what was the fact? The coroner alleges that the jury had been tampered with, and that there is a fear that they might give their verdict on evidence not before them on oath. He, therefore, adjourned the inquest, in order to have the opinion of the court of King's-bench in a matter of such high importance. What was there unjust in this? His noble and learned friend, of whom he always should speak affectionately as of an old fellow-labourer in the same vineyard, had stated that there were precedents of parliamentary interference with the courts below. If there were any, he was sure they must be bad precedents; but he was not aware of any that bore any analogy to the present case. Those cases of high treason to which he had referred were not at all in point: parliament had then interfered, or rather had instituted a contemporaneous inquiry; not for the sake of, or in any connexion with, the persons under trial, but with reference to those numerous classes throughout the nation who were supposed to be implicated in some general designs of mischief against the government. Was there any similar state necessity in the present case? Was there ever any reasonable ground of fear that the magistrates would run wild and exceed their duty throughout the nation? He must confess that he thought the danger was one of a very different kind. He thought that the magistrates had been remiss rather than over active; and had neglected to take notice of many seditious and blasphemous publications which ought to have been noticed. One observation of his noble and learned friend he must particularly remark upon, because the great source from which it proceeded might give authority to error. He alluded to what he had said about the Riot act. It should be recollected that the act, specially called the Riot act, did not exist till the 9th of Geo. 1st; yet that a great many acts of parliament (which though not generally known, were yet in force) had previously been passed against illegal, as distinguished from riotous or routous meetings. As the law now stood, if the magistrates thought proper to read the Riot act, and the mob did not disperse within an hour, they were guilty of felony; but if a case should arise of an assembly, after the reading of the Riot act, conducting itself in such a way that it ought to be immediately dispersed, was it to be said that the whole powers of the common law were palsied, and could not be put into execution till a full hour had elapsed; and that therefore all the mischief possible might be done with impunity in the remaining three quarters of an hour? He would not now give any opinion on the proceedings at Manchester, as a case was in progress for trial. A bill had been found, though perhaps, according to the reasoning of the noble lord, that circumstance was a strong presumption of innocence, the rejection of a bill having been considered as the surest proof of guilt [a laugh]: but as all the facts of the case were about to be laid before a jury, he would not enter into details—no; not even in that debate which was threatened would he be induced to enter into any minute explanation. This only he owed it to himself to say—that it was his fixed, his unqualified opinion, that the meeting at Manchester on the 16th of August was, in every sense of the word, an illegal meeting.

Lord Erskine explained. He did not say that an hour after the reading of the Riot act was requisite before the law of the country could be enforced against tumultuous assemblies. On various perilous occasions he had been put to the test, and did not then think that an hour was requisite. During the riots of 1780, when the mob was preparing to attack the house of lord Mansfield, he was in Bloomsbury-square, and attended with some military, when he offered to defend the house. He was also in the Temple when the mob was preparing to force the gate, and when several houses in London were on fire, and he went forward to the gate, which he opened, and stood beside a field-piece, prepared to fire, in case the attack was persisted in. In such cases every man was a magistrate, every subject was bound to act, to defend his country and its laws. But the rioting mob of London in 1780, was different from the assembled multitude at Manchester on the 16th of August. It was no slight matter that the inoffensive crowd at Manchester should be sabred to the right and left within a short time after the reading of the act. But to him it was particularly a matter of astonishment to find that although much misunderstanding existed on both sides, it should be said that all inquiry was unnecessary, for one alone was right. He had always thought when two parties disagreed, inquiry was most needful.

The Marquis of Lansdowne began by observing, that in the discharge of his public duty he proposed, if no such motion should emanate from the government, or from any other quarter, to move for an inquiry into the causes of the proceedings at Manchester which occasioned so much and such just disquiet. He rose, however, now to state his reasons for voting for the amendment—a determination which he had come to, not without great anxiety, but which was not the less firm, and which he conceived to be perfectly compatible with the recommendation of the speech from the throne. He must first avow most distinctly, that the amendment would not have had his concurrence, unless it had most unequivocally expressed the utmost abhorrence at the abominable and persevering attempts which had now been made for two years past to subvert the allegiance of the lower orders. Indeed, he did not think any man was entitled to public confidence who was not prepared to come forward with such an avowal. He thought, however, that this confession of danger should be followed up by a proposition calculated to allay any exaggerated alarm—he meant, by the parliamentary assurance, that their lordships were not asleep at their posts, but were ready to consider fully and impartially, not only whether the public peace had been broken, but also whether the lives of his majesty's subjects had not been wantonly endangered. The transactions at Manchester, on the face of them, demanded inquiry; but what said the noble viscount? He said that he had only meant by his opinion, uttered on the spur of the occasion, to express a confidence in the magistracy of the country, and not to prejudge the facts of the case. The noble viscount had talked a great deal about his anxiety, and as proof of it, had related the mode by which he came to his decision. He told their lordships that two persons had come up to him from

Manchester; persons who, it must be notorious, must have been interested in persuading the ministers that they were innocent; persons whose fame and character were at stake; and yet he told their lordships, that after examining these two persons, and after a consultation with two counsel, he found himself in a situation to pronounce judgment, and to turn round to the public and say, "My sentence is definitive; you shall have no opinion but what I have formed. With this sentence I shall close the mouth of every independent man in the kingdom; and even such a man as lord Fitzwilliam shall be disgraced, not because he has prejudged the question, which nobody but myself has ventured to do, but because he calls for inquiry, which I do not think proper to be granted." He assured their lordships that he thought it a valuable characteristic of the amendment of his noble friend, that it exaggerated nothing, but called merely for the real merits of the case. It desired merely facts and truth. How different was the conduct of the noble viscount! He contented himself with saying, that the magistrates were entitled to a strong presumption in their favour. What could be meant by such a declaration? If it was merely meant that the magistrates should not be condemned without a full, fair, and impartial inquiry, he most cordially subscribed to the opinion; but he must add, that no more deadly blow could be aimed at the magistracy of the country than to hold them up as irresponsible persons, whose excesses were not only to be screened from punishment, but could not either legally or constitutionally be subject to inquiry. Whether the particular meeting was legal or not he did not know. Sufficient circumstances had not transpired to justify any conclusion on that point, and for this very reason inquiry was necessary. Whether, however, the meeting was legal or not, nothing had been said to justify the particular mode of dispersing it. But the noble viscount had confessed, that the magistrates themselves were not aware that the meeting was illegal, and that their object had been solely to take Mr. Hunt, and not to disperse the meeting. He sincerely hoped that this view of the case was correct; for, certainly, if the magistrates had been aware that the second meeting was illegal, after they had seen their warning against the first meeting complied with, what censure was too great for them, who thus chose rather to risk the lives of their fellow-subjects, than have recourse to a precaution which they had already found to be available? There was another question—why arrest Mr. Hunt in the midst of his partisans, who, it was reasonable to suppose, might be excited to some act of outrage, by seeing their chief torn from their assembly? It is true, that reasons of unavoidable necessity might exist for so violent a measure. He himself did not see them; he did not mean to say that there were none, but they ought to be fairly made known, in order to establish the propriety of the magistrates' conduct. This at least was clear—that on the day referred to, blood had been shed; the blood of his majesty's subjects, for the first time, by his majesty's subjects, in a county already too much irritated in consequence of its distresses, and whose irritation, he feared, rankled far too deeply to be allayed by any wisdom which could be hoped for from the present administration. But an inquiry was necessary, not merely for the sake of the sufferers at Manchester, but for the public, who should feel that they may look to the laws for protection. The stability of the government depended on the institutions of the country being held in reverence; and here he must say, that ready as he was to express his abhorrence of the radicals, and not to under-rate the mischief of which they were capable, yet that he saw more to regret than to fear on their account. He believed a much greater danger threatened the nation from another source—he meant from the prevalence of an opinion among the public, that the institutions of the country were not so favourable to the lower as to the higher classes. If this feeling were once general, it would be a formidable weapon in the hands of those who combined so much zeal with their abominable endeavours to shake the foundation of confidence between the governors and the government, and to gain ultimate possession of the country. The way to render these men harmless was, for parliament to adopt a conduct calculated to conciliate the esteem and confidence of the people; and by such sentiments and such measures as were recommended in the amendment, to convince the public that their rulers felt that peace and stability could never be secured without an equal administration of the law.—One word as to the expression of the noble viscount, that those who stood between the government when assailed, and those who assailed it, gave weight to the side of the assailants; he must have much greater authority than that of the noble viscount before he could implicitly adopt such an opinion. He would never allow that greater weight was given to discontent by a manly opposition to government in favour of the people, than by that prostration of understanding which the noble viscount seemed to expect from every man in the country; and without which the noble viscount thought that no talent, no honour, no integrity, could qualify an English nobleman to be of service to the nation. "I (said the noble marquis) am of opinion, that the noble viscount has given the greatest encouragement to discontent, by withdrawing from the service of his king and country, one who, by his irreproachable character, by his long-tried services, by the admiration in which he was held by the whole kingdom, was eminently calculated to be a peace-maker, and to conciliate not merely respect, but that love and affection without which no government, however powerful, can long be secure."

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that as the noble marquis had given notice of a motion for inquiry, he should not now enter into any details, but he could not let the speech of the noble marquis go by without one or two observations. The amendment proposed by the noble earl, and recommended by the noble marquis, was in part true, but alluded to circumstances not fit subjects for discussion that day. They were that day called to give a test of their readiness to do their duty to the nation generally, and not to refer to any particular subjects on which the widest difference of opinion prevailed. He would defy the noble marquis to tell where an inquiry had ever taken place under circumstances similar to the affair at Manchester. The cases of the year 1793, and of the year before last, had no reference to the conduct of individuals, but embraced the consideration of precautionary measures for the nation generally. What analogy was there between those cases and the present? Besides, how was a parliamentary inquiry to be instituted? It could only be done by suspending the functions of the courts of law, and by silencing all subordinate tribunals. But, how can proceedings there be stopped? They are begun, and already far advanced. The noble viscount had been spoken of as being the only party to the letter of thanks to the magistrates; but he must say, that whatever blame attached to it, belonged to him (lord Liverpool) and to other of his majesty's ministers who had sanctioned it. He would undertake most explicitly to say, that the Manchester magistrates would not have received the thanks of the government, unless they had done their duty. And on all occasions where it had been considered to have been so performed, it had been the custom to give them thanks. How difficult and painful a situation would they stand in, if they were at a loss to know whether they had the approbation of his majesty's government or not? But, supposing government had decided in a different way, did their lordships consider what would have been the course in that event? He would pledge his word, however, that there never was a case of assault more fully and irrefragably proved than that which, in its consequences, had so recently called down all the obloquy of the noble lord. It had been said that many of the circumstances which were alluded to in the answer of his royal highness the Prince Regent, to the address of the city of London, were either circumstances not generally known, or of previous occurrence. True; but let the fact of this meeting be stated in the manner in which it was made known to all the world. He was content to take it thus—that bands amounting to at least 20,000 men, disposed in military array, marching in military order, and commanded by military leaders, came to one spot with banners and streamers, upon which might be read the motto of “Equal Representation or Death,” and he would venture to declare, that this was not only an illegal, but under all the circumstances, a treasonable meeting. Their intention was, to carry into execution their avowed object by violent and illegal means. It was so considered by the magistrates of Manchester, who had made affidavits, declaring that such was the belief of themselves. Good God! how was the government to be carried on—how was the country itself to exist—if these things were to be permitted? Had their lordships ever heard of such meetings before? Did they ever hear of peaceable or legal meetings, armed and carrying banners and emblems totally destructive of good order and of loyalty. If there were certain circumstances connected with that meeting which must, and actually did inspire terror and alarm, what was it but an illegal one; and, minutely considered, what but a treasonable assembly? Under these circumstances he must contend that the magistrates were justified in their proceedings: and if the question were put more strictly—if it were considered that in the opinion of the highest legal authorities, it was their duty to disperse the people,—it became a second question how far the magistrates themselves would have neglected their duty by failing so to disperse them? What his noble friend has stated to their lordships was this—that the magistrates had no intention of dispersing the meeting before they were actually assembled on the 16th of August. They decided upon that step, when they saw what was the character of it. They did not decide it to be illegal till they saw separate parties of 2,000, 5,000, and 7,000 men, each marching in columns, and in military array. It was then that they did decide it to be illegal, whatever appearance it might have assumed before. They had sometimes heard the noble lord strenuously maintaining the right of trial by jury; but here it appeared to be looked on with perfect contempt: he chose now to uphold a very different course of proceeding. Any of the parties aggrieved by the events of the 16th of August might have sought for redress either by a civil or a criminal suit. That they might have done this all who heard him were well aware. And why had they not? The parties acted on their own responsibility. Now, their lordships might ask, what was the conduct of the Manchester magistrates? Having arrested the individuals, they presented three weeks afterwards, to the grand jury, bills for a conspiracy against such persons for what took place on that day. The grand jury found these bills; and, therefore, he did not feel it necessary to say one word more upon that subject; it would be, he thought, improper that he should. Well, the grand jury having found them, what happened? An individual, the agent for some of those who had suffered upon that day, presented no less than five bills against so many of the yeomanry. Was not this, he would ask their lordships, putting the question under judicial investigation? The grand jury ignored these bills; yet, that did not satisfy the noble lord. [Here

earl Grey and other noble lords said, "No, no."] Now, it should be remembered, that the depositions upon which the grand jury had decided were upon oath. It appeared, however, that the grand jury—a body of men as respectable for talent, for character, and for property, as any that he knew of—acting upon the evidence, and acting also upon their own responsibility, had ignored all the bills against the yeomen. Did he (lord Liverpool) say that this fact decided the question before them? No: but he did say, that while grand juries were to be upheld, their decisions were not lightly to be called in question, nor was the evidence upon which they had already decided, to be re-examined in another place, except upon the showing of a strong case. If other judicial evidence was yet to be brought forward, let it come in a proper and legal shape. But no: an attempt had been made to put down the magistracy altogether; it had been hazarded for the purpose of trying what could be done with juries and coroners and magistrates, till it could be ascertained how far the constitution itself might be set aside.—There was one other circumstance which he felt himself obliged to allude to, and, he assured their lordships, not without considerable apprehension. He trusted that the number of the disaffected, as compared with the great aggregate of the people was not very great. He knew that the activity of the former was very great; and he was aware of the speed with which they diffused the poison of sedition from one district to another. But he knew also that revolutions in all countries had been brought about, not by the number of the disaffected, not by the sedition which they excited, not by the falsehoods which they insinuated, but by the terror of the whole community. Terror had been the unfailing engine with which they had effected their mighty mischiefs; and in all those cases which had ever come under his observation, he had condemned the course of proceeding which he condemned in this case, where one county sat in judgment upon another: the effect was, to excite a feeling of terror in the country. He so condemned it, because he felt that, in the present crisis, whatever might be the amount of distress in the kingdom, the great object of calling their lordships there, and the only good they could do there, was to give their confidence to all the loyal part of the community; to make the magistrates feel that they were protected; to make property feel that it was protected. In a few days, from information to be laid before them, their lordships would see with pain, that in some parts of the country it had been found impossible to put the laws in force by reason of the resistance manifested towards the magistrates. If the magistracy—he would not indeed say the magistracy—but the magistrates of Lancashire, were to be treated as the noble lord wished them to be, what would be the effect of such a determination? In conclusion, from information which he might hereafter allude to, while facts were unanswered, which indeed admitted of no denial, he felt confident that the Manchester magistrates had only performed their duty; and that government would basely abandon its own duty if it did not now protect them.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, in explanation, said, he considered that the calling the magistrates before parliament could not be more improper than the measure of calling other magistrates, at least equal to themselves in rank and consequence, before the same tribunal on a former occasion. He did not know that the summoning of the Scotch magistrates on a question involving their conduct, before that House, had reflected any disgrace or dishonour upon them.

The Earl of Carnarvon animadverted upon the declaration of the noble earl, that it was impossible for parliament to go into any inquiry upon judicial proceedings. Notwithstanding all that had been said and published on the subject, he could not believe that there was a man in the country who did not think the interference of the military on the occasion alluded to unnecessary. It was stated, that though they brought their wives and children to the spot, yet, that this circumstance offered no proof that it was not meant and known to be an illegal meeting; and that when women came into the midst of such scenes, they lost the softness and tenderness natural to them. With all deference to the noble duke, from whom this ingenious argument had proceeded, he must acknowledge that it did not appear to him very natural that they would bring their wives or children for the purpose of being mangled or slain. He offered no opinion of his own as to the legality of this meeting; but he was far from being satisfied, that the only legitimate means of its dispersion had been adopted. But it had been designated a treasonable meeting: why, then, was it permitted to take place? Those noble lords who did not wish to prejudge the question, forsooth, had declared the fact of the meeting to be neither more nor less than an overt act of treason, before their own tribunals had decided it. The noble lord then observed upon the publications daily put forth, not more remarkable for blasphemy than for sedition; in which the people were called on to arm, and a threat of the scaffold was held out against ministers and other illustrious persons. He meant the "Medusa", the "Cap of Liberty," and others. Why were government so backward in prosecuting those disgraceful productions, while they discovered so much promptitude in pursuing those whose conduct in the business of Manchester had been in any degree deserving of reprobation? The noble earl, after passing an animated eulogium upon the character, talents, and conciliating conduct of earl Fitzwilliam, declared that he thought the disapprobation of his conduct, expressed by his majesty's ministers, did him the greatest honour; and concluded by deprecating every harsh and coercive measure, arising out of the present question, towards the British public, whom justice, kindness, and forbearance, never failed to bring back to their duty.

The Marquis of Buckingham said, he would not now enter into the question whether the Manchester meeting was legal or not, nor into the conduct of the magistrates or yeomanry. Their conduct, upon the occasion alluded to, if improper, was open to investigation, before the proper tribunals. He had heard as yet no argument sufficient to persuade him that they should, upon the present occasion, deprive them of the advantages of the trial by jury. The point at issue now was between the address and the amendment, between ministers and those who opposed them. The case was one of no difficulty. It presented itself without the labour of much investigation to the mind of every person. There was not one man in that House or out of it, who did not know that the country was in a state of danger. They all saw the same exertions now making, plans of the very same kind pursued, as, at no distant period, brought upon a neighbouring country revolution, anarchy, and, at last, a degrading despotism. The state in which they were placed was this: the Christian religion was that of the country, recognised by law, and professed by the wisest and best of men; the bond of society, and the best source of comfort in this life and of hope in the life to come. They had lived to see the time when the country was told, not in a whisper, not in a concealed or smothered manner, but in broad day, that the sacred truths of the Christian religion were gross impositions and polluted falsehoods. Now, were open attacks upon religion, upon the laws of the country upon the life of officers who attempted to enforce those laws—were these things to be disregarded? Had they not seen a committee appointed for the ostensible purpose of petitioning for a reform in parliament, direct their measures in a way evidently calculated for the overthrow of the constitution. Public right might be used in such a manner as to become a public wrong; and if the right of petition was made a cloak for mischievous purposes, it was high time that some remedy should be applied to the evil. The country was in imminent danger. This was not a time for inquiring into the causes. The danger must be provided against without delay, or ruin would be the consequence. When a house was on fire, what was the fittest thing to be done—to inquire into the causes of the conflagration, or to take means of putting it out?

The House then divided on the amendment: Contents, 31; Proxies, 3—34. Not-Contents, 120; Proxies, 39—159. Majority against the amendment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, November 23.

ADDRESS ON THE PRINCE REGENT'S SPEECH AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION.] The Speech of the Prince Regent having been read by the Speaker, Mr. Somers Cocks rose to move an Address of Thanks. He said, that, approving as he did of the measures pursued by his majesty's government, and feeling it his duty, under existing circumstances, to avow his sentiments, he rose with much pleasure upon the present occasion to move an address, in answer to the speech from the throne. In doing this he trusted the House would extend to him that indulgence which they usually showed to a person, like himself, inexperienced in public speaking, and every way inadequate to the important task he had taken upon himself to discharge. He should feel it necessary, in the progress of what he was about to say, to offer a few observations upon the variety of topics which formed the subject of the speech from the throne. Unaccustomed to public debate, and of course to that accuracy of language acquired by habit and experience, he felt apprehensive he should not be able to express himself with all the clearness he desired. The first subject alluded to in the speech from the throne was one upon which no difference of opinion could arise, he meant the lamented continuation of his majesty's illness. Upon this there could be only one feeling, that of profound regret. The House, he was assured, would be unanimous in their accordance with this part of the speech. In calling upon them to express such a sentiment, it was impossible at the same time not to make some allusion to the moral and religious character for which their revered sovereign was, at every period of his life, distinguished. Though afflicted, and labouring under so awful a visitation, he still hoped he would long remain; and that the examples of domestic and public virtues which he had at all times set, would impress the minds of those who revered him, with a desire to follow in the same course. In thus adverting to his majesty's virtues, above all to his habitual and exemplary attention to the sacred duties of religion, every one, who paid any attention to late events, must reflect with sorrow and apprehension, that feelings of the most opposite nature were now attempted to be impressed on the minds of the labouring classes. Men were seen engaged in this diabolical duty, and exerting themselves in it with as much zeal as if they were the harbingers of substantial and real good. Was it not horrid, that they who cried loudly against abuses, who pretended to be the friends of the people, should thus attempt to deprive them of the best sources of consolation here, and of hope hereafter?—The second subject alluded to in the speech was one of the highest importance. The House was called together at this unusual season in consequence of the disturbed and alarming state in which some districts of the country were placed. He need not remind them of the general and eager anxiety with which the present meeting of parliament was viewed by all classes. Never perhaps was there a period when the eyes of the nation were more attentively fixed on them; when public curiosity was more anxiously turned on their proceedings. When late events were taken into consideration, the insidious and persevering attempts made to undermine the foundations of the constitution, to make religion a subject of mockery, and thereby to enervate the influence of the laws; when persons were heard proclaiming doctrines of the most dangerous nature, and inculcating them on assembled multitudes with all their force and zeal, doctrines utterly destructive of religion, of law, of happiness; when all this was considered, they must feel confident that an occasion more important than the present could not possibly arise. He trusted he should be borne out in his appeal to the House, whether under such circumstances, and in such times, the difficulties were not such as ought to form a point of union for both sides of the House—whether they were not such as should unite the suffrages of all, in some strong, though temporary measures equally for the advantage of all. The constitution was now threatened; that constitution, which in his soul he believed to be, above all other human institutions, the best calculated to secure and preserve the happiness of a nation. To it they were indebted for all that was most valuable in life. It was the system best adapted to the preservation of their rights: the system which afforded the greatest protection against the encroachments of oppressive power, from whatever quarter its attacks might be directed. He should not attempt to dwell upon this subject. He felt himself inadequate to describe in fit terms the blessings they enjoyed from that constitution, so long the boast of all who lived under it, and the admiration of the wisest and best of men. The most able eulogist, the most eloquent man that ever opened his lips within the walls of that House, could not touch upon such a subject without feeling his inability to do it justice. To support this constitution was their first and most important duty. If it was allowed on all hands that attempts were making to overthrow it, that designs for that purpose had been long in active progress, and so far from ceasing were gaining strength; if the proofs of this were so manifest as to require no confirmation, it was their first duty to stand forward for its preservation, to cling with one accord to that bulwark of their rights, to protect, preserve, and hand down to posterity the blessings it afforded. If danger did in reality exist, the question now was, from what quarter did it come; and if once ascertained, it was natural and constitutional to ask the House, whether they should suffer the cause any longer to exist? If he thought it proceeded from the Crown, he should in that event be as willing to come forward in the performance of a public duty as he was at present. It could not, however, be traced to such a source. Ministers acted in the usual way, upon those recognised constitutional principles from which no danger could be apprehended. Feeling convinced, therefore, that the cause of apprehension could not be traced to the Crown, they must look for the source of it elsewhere. When they considered what had been lately done in various parts of the country, the meetings that had taken place, the manner in which those meetings were held, the sentiments expressed by the leading speakers, their flags, and their whole system of proceeding, was it not clear that dangerous attempts were in preparation, and was it not equally clear from whence those attempts were to be apprehended? The danger could not be referred to the conduct of ministers. They adhered to established customs, and adhered to them perhaps too strictly, under existing circumstances, under the systematic endeavours now making to overturn all law and social order, every blessing, civil as well as religious. Every man who considered events with attention, must feel that the danger did not proceed from the Crown, and if it did exist he would again appeal to the House, whether it was not fit it should be repressed—whether all should not unite their endeavours to put it down? It would be lamentable indeed, if, upon the present occasion, any party feelings existing in the House could be made instrumental towards their purpose by those whose object was to overturn the constitution. He trusted, that upon the present occasion no consideration of that kind would be allowed to operate, and that they would all concur towards the removal of a danger that threatened the happiness, the life, and the property of all. In quiet times he approved of a regular opposition; but when imminent peril threatened the country, it was not a fit occasion for that sort of political hostility which, under other circumstances, had its advantages. If, then, the danger existed, and could not be traced to the Crown, from whence did it proceed? From whence, but from the sources alluded to in the speech from the throne? From men who strove to instil into the minds of the people a tendency to sedition—from persons bankrupt alike in property, in knowledge, in character, and principle,—from a set of demagogues more infamous if possible, than the detestable object to which they aspired. Had they not seen them use every means within their reach to create sedition and disaffection, to undermine all principles of loyalty and morality, to destroy and confound all the common feelings of humanity? It was notorious that they endeavoured, and were unfortunately too successful, to induce the poor to look forward to the possessions of the rich. It was impossible, even upon a superficial view, not to see what their object was. Not only had they done all this—they even strove to aggravate the distress, that they might thereby increase the troubles of the country. It was notorious, that during the late harvest the surplus population of the manufacturing districts did not proceed as usual from one county to another in which there was a demand for labour. They remained at home, and thereby increased the distress. This was to be attributed to no other cause, but the meetings, the speeches, and the publications of which they had lately heard so much. The leaders at those meetings, and the persons who composed them talked of reform; but what did the word reform mean with them? Was it employed in the usual sense of a calm, temperate, and moderate change of measures? in the sense applied to it in other times and by other men? No such thing. With them reform meant, if it meant any thing, such an alteration as it would be impossible to adopt without ruin to the constitution. As they used it, it did not apply to any mode of reform ever before suggested. It took in universal suffrage and vote by ballot. It was in fact a cant term, and meant nothing less than Revolution. All these alarming proceedings, however, it was said, arose only from the natural workings of a free constitution, and that no real danger existed. He wished it might be the case; but when he considered the information received from various parts of the country, the efforts made to bring large bodies of men together from distant parts, the doctrines preached up to them, their military organisation, their flags and all the other attendant circumstances, he could not consider their plans innocent. It should be recollected that in 1816, those who were anxious to produce revolution expressed their determination to carry on the system by occasional meetings for the purpose, as they stated, of giving confidence to their adherents by a display of their strength. This was the plan proposed for effecting their object. Had they not, accordingly, from that period forward witnessed their meetings, from time to time, at various places, and that they became more numerous every day? It was notorious that they pursued a plan of military organisation. To what else could be attributed their regularly marching from place to place, with banners and flags inscribed with mottos of a most treasonable nature? With respect to these and various other points, he did not pretend to have his information from more than the common sources of intelligence, but it was evident that such proceedings could arise from nothing less than designs of a dangerous tendency. What must be the feelings of peaceable inhabitants under such circumstances? In the towns where they took place it was impossible that the people could feel their houses, their lives, or their property secure. He would put it to the House, whether, if such things were to be continued, the law, as it stood, could be sufficient for protection? How could it be sufficient, when an attempt to comply with the letter of the law, as it stood, had a directly contrary effect? As to the principal actors in those troubles, their study, was, at least they pretended to adhere strictly to law in the manner of calling and holding their meetings; but who was so blind as not to see that this was mere pretence, that they acted in this manner for no other purpose than the better to accomplish their nefarious views?—There was one subject much talked of, upon which he should decline giving any opinion at present. It was natural, however, to expect, that upon an occasion like the present, he should allude to it. He had not sufficient information to give a decided opinion; but he wished it to be understood, that, judging from the intelligence he had hitherto any opportunity of receiving, he saw no reason why the examination of the matter should be taken out of the usual course. He was not disposed to enter into discussions on subjects of law, nor was he acquainted with them; but there was one principle which he thought a most just and proper one, namely, that every Englishman should be presumed innocent until he had been declared guilty by a jury of his countrymen. If this principle was in any one instance carried further than in another, it was with respect to the persons who composed the Manchester meeting. Their innocence was the theme of much declamation, and of many publications. They had the full benefit of the principle. There was, however, another maxim not less just, namely, that no man should be put upon his trial until he was before a jury. With respect to the magistrates and yeomanry in the affair alluded to, he must say that this maxim was not very anxiously observed. They were, on the contrary, before their case came to be heard by any jury, unhesitatingly pronounced guilty. They were treated in a manner which to him appeared most unfair. When it appeared that a grand jury, upon their oath, and upon evidence received upon oath, did not find bills of indictment against them, this might not be thought sufficient, but when he reflected on all the circumstances, he must say, that there did not seem to him sufficient ground for taking this matter out of the usual course. It would not be fair and just, while a subject was before a court of law, to bring it before another tribunal. He was aware of the delicacy of this question, but still he felt it his duty to make some allusion to it. He did not mean to imply blame, but he lamented the attempts made in certain quarters to inflame the passions of the people with respect to this unfortunate transaction. These attempts were repeated by those who had the means within reach, by publication, of giving them additional force. He was desirous that the distinction between those who opposed the government, and those who opposed the existing order of things, might be strictly defined and made known. He knew the distinction was as broad as possible; but still it was important that it should be broadly expressed; nor should it be omitted, under existing circumstances, from a wish which naturally enough might prevail of leaning to one side for the purpose of gaining strength to a party.—There was another part of the speech which he felt it necessary to touch upon; the increase of the military force of the country. Now that they were at peace with foreign powers, and that there was every prospect of better times, it was greatly to be lamented that a necessity should have arisen for making any addition to the army, for the protection of the peaceable and well-disposed. If, however, they required such protection, it was the duty of government to afford it. What would be their feelings, if family, life, property, and all they held dear, were to be left in times of danger without necessary protection? Strong measures, at least for a short time, were now perhaps as necessary as at any former period; all should unite to preserve the existing order of things. This determination once made manifest, and these measures once adopted, would show the country that they were determined not to allow the mischievous plans now contemplated to proceed any further. If the exertions of the country were thus once roused, it would soon put an end to the views of the men who sought the overthrow of the constitution. He hoped the sentiments and information conveyed in the speech from the throne would have their effect, and that every thing would be done to check the diabolical system now in progress. Having said thus much, he should not trouble the House further, but should conclude by moving,

“That an humble Address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, to return the thanks of this House to his Royal Highness for his most gracious speech from the throne:

“To express to his Royal Highness the great concern with which we receive the intimation of the continuance of his majesty's lamented indisposition.

“To assure his Royal Highness that we learn with the deepest regret that the seditious practices so long prevalent in some of the manufacturing districts of the country have been continued with increased activity since we were last assembled in parliament; that they have led to proceedings incompatible with the peaceful habits of the industrious classes of the community: and that a spirit is now fully manifested utterly hostile to the constitution of this kingdom, and aiming not only at the change of those political institutions which have hitherto constituted the pride and security of this country, but at the subversion of the rights of property, and of all order in society:

“To return our thanks to his Royal Highness for his gracious intention to lay before parliament the necessary information on this subject; and to assure his Royal Highness, that we shall not fail to apply our immediate and most anxious attention to the consideration of such measures as may be found requisite for the counteraction and suppression of a system which, if not effectually checked, must bring confusion and ruin on the nation;

“To thank his Royal Highness for having directed the estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before us:

“To assure his Royal Highness that while we regret the necessity of providing for the protection of the lives and property of his majesty's loyal subjects by any addition to our military force, we shall be happy to find that the arrangements for this purpose have been made in the manner likely to be least burthensome to the country:

“To express our satisfaction at being informed, that though the revenue has undergone some fluctuations, it appears to be again in a course of progressive improvement:

“That we deeply lament with his Royal Highness the distress experienced by many of our fellow subjects in consequence of the depression which still continues to exist in some branches of our manufactures, and earnestly join in the hope expressed by his Royal Highness that it may be found to arise from causes of a temporary nature:

“That we hear with much satisfaction the friendly disposition of foreign powers towards this country, and gratefully acknowledge his Royal Highness's anxious wish to take advantage of this season of peace to secure and advance our in-

"To assure his Royal Highness that he may rely with the most perfect confidence on the loyalty of the great body of the people; but that we are at the same time fully convinced, that it will require our utmost vigilance and exertion, collectively and individually, to check the dissemination of the doctrines of treason and impiety, and to impress upon the minds of all classes of his majesty's subjects, that it is from the cultivation of the principles of religion, and from a just subordination to lawful authority, that we can alone expect the continuance of that Divine favour and protection which has hitherto been so signally experienced by this kingdom."

Mr. Edward Cust said:—In rising, Sir, to second the motion of my hon. friend, I feel that I have to appeal to the more than ordinary indulgence of the House, inasmuch as I now, for the very first time in my life venture to address any public assembly, much less one like the present, in which my inferiority is so evidently apparent; nor, can I hold out as an excuse for my presumption in presenting myself to their notice any hopes of recompensing them for their time and their patience by force of language or extent of information which those of my predecessors on this duty may have afforded, who have had leisure and opportunity of devoting their early years to those studies which are more essentially useful to a member of parliament; mine has been passed in a profession which did not afford me such advantages, and in the prosecution of duties not at all analogous to those which I have now taken upon myself to perform. I think, Sir, there never was a time in which it would be more fortunate that unanimity in this House should prevail, than the present. The eyes of the country, and almost of the world, are turned upon us to learn our sentiments at this momentous period, when a party, humble, it is true, in the origin and the importance of its votaries, but not at all mean, if we may judge of their proceedings, in the abilities of their leaders, whoever they are, have, by a series of the almost unwarrantable exertions of their rights, created so great a ferment in the country, and assumed a position, so formidable, as to impress upon the peaceable and well-disposed part of the community a well-founded apprehension as to their ulterior designs. His royal highness the Prince Regent, certainly not needlessly alarmed, but with a well-founded confidence in the wisdom and the counsels of his parliament, has called us together at a period much earlier than of late years it has been customary, that he might be informed as to the extent of the danger, and be advised in the remedy for it. I am sure that the House will fully participate in what has fallen from my hon. friend, as to the beneficial effects this country has derived from the character and example of our excellent and venerable sovereign, and I am sure, there is not an individual in this House or in the country, who does not at the mere mention of his beloved and revered name, recur with pleasure to the many virtues that adorned his character, and to the eminent services that he rendered to his country. But, Sir, whilst we all deeply deplore the severe calamity which it has pleased Providence to visit him with, we may perhaps be allowed to rejoice that, it is not permitted him to know, that his people, whom his firmness and perseverance saved in the hour of the greatest danger, when the principles which were then first broached by the French revolution were new, and the pernicious effects of them unknown, are, now that they are become matter of history and example, preparing to transfer to the page of our history the follies, as well as the eccentric crimes (as they have been called) of that great school of iniquity. I think it will scarcely be denied that a very bad and dangerous spirit exists in the country—a spirit which takes delight in browbeating our judges in their judgment seats, and in abusing all indiscriminately who are placed high by birth or situation in the country. It is no longer the echo only of that abuse which has been so lavishly levelled against every measure of every minister of the Crown for the last century, and which is likely soon to become the only perquisite of office. It now aspires to attack the Crown itself, and all who are placed in authority under it. To be a member of the aristocracy is declared to be a member of corruption, and even those of the democracy are alone pure who wear white hats, or have lungs strong enough to address a Smithfield meeting. That reform is the declared and only alleged cause of the discontents that have,

for the last few years, prevailed in this kingdom is, by the discontented themselves, avowed; nor have they hesitated to acknowledge, that they will obtain it by physical force if they cannot do so by other means. This is not now the time to discuss that question; but I may perhaps be allowed to remark, that innovation, at all times hazardous, is incontestibly dangerous, when backed by threats and clamour. But I trust, Sir, we are Britons still, and not to be frightened by the open declarations of the former, nor to be bullied into compliance against our judgments by the unceasing efforts of the latter. I am not one of those who conceive that reform is, in every one's mouth, the watchword of rebellion, nor that we are to conceive ourselves upon the eve of a revolution whenever that subject is mooted; but I must say, that such wholesale attempts at improvement are more likely to be dangerous than beneficial; and a question which is so evidently directed against the prejudices which always attend existing things, merits at least more dispassionate inquiry than we seemed inclined to bring to the question; and it is but fair to ask, what advantages have we in prospect that would at all compensate for the risk we run in attempting such a change in our situation? It is not for me, Sir, to state, nor is this the opportunity to discuss what may be the measures to be proposed, to use the words of his royal highness's speech, "for the counteraction and suppression of a system which, if not effectually checked, must bring confusion and ruin on the nation;" but I would say to those who profess to see in any measures, a revolution at hand from the encroachment of the Crown, if, indeed, there are men in these days who really believe this (and I must own, I can scarcely credit the public prints when they register it as the expressed opinion of a peer of the realm), to them, if they exist in the plural number, I would say, that assuredly the best plan to prevent our liberties from being encroached upon is, to quench the spirit which affords the excuse for it. It has been an opinion given in the House by an hon. and learned gentleman opposite, that the best way to effect this, is by employing sound reasoning and rational argument. To him I believe, Sir, we must leave this Herculean task; but I think the country has some reason to complain, that, as from the applause which was stated to have followed that sentiment, it was led to believe it was the opinion of the gentlemen with whom he is in the habit of acting, no attempt of this sort has been made by them, seeing that they profess to possess the confidence of the people. Assuredly if it is practicable at all, it can only be employed by those to whom the people will listen. We certainly cannot expect from them a confession of the sad state they are fallen into in this respect; but perhaps we shall find the best excuse for the omission, in the known fact, that the people will not listen to them, unless they have a radical reformer at their elbow. That measures of some sort are necessary, will not, I think, be denied; but the House is not called upon by my hon. friend to pledge itself as to the nature and extent of those measures. I should hope that the gentlemen opposite will refrain from disturbing the unanimity which I hope will attend this night's debate, by confounding the nature of those measures with their necessity. The latter may fairly be considered as part of the question before the House, and whether the former be conviction, conciliation, or concession, can alone be fairly argued when that matter is brought regularly before the House. I am aware that some gentlemen who are come up from parts of the country where the utmost tranquillity prevails, believe the alarm that has been spread to have been exaggerated, because there has been no cause for it in their own immediate neighbourhood; but I think, upon reflection, they will be satisfied that there must be some other object to be attained than a legitimate redress of grievances, from incessant meetings of multitudes, simultaneously assembled in various parts of the country, not assembling at their own homes and habitations, but marching with all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of war, from distant parts to their places of rendezvous. And here the House will have the goodness to remark, that those rendezvous were in the heart of populous districts, not arrayed as in prosecution of their ordinary occupation, but armed with weapons of defence, attended with republican and revolutionary emblems, and with banners and music in military array, according to the common-sense interpretation of the expression, however lawyers may dispute the propriety of it. Assuredly the well-disposed citizens of those towns, equally alive to the interests of the country with these self-termed patriots, have a good claim upon our interference and protection, that they may not be interrupted in their daily occupations, nor be exposed to the caprice of a mob, the temper of which no one can measure. It has been maintained by some, I know, that the tranquillity which has attended the late meetings throughout the country, is a proof that no restrictive measures at all are necessary; but I would implore the House not to be led away by such delusive appearances, nor to wait until anarchy and atheism stalk openly over the land, before it stretches forth its authority to stay them. Yes, Sir, there has undoubtedly been an appearance of tranquillity; but it is the tranquillity of a lion waiting for his prey. There has been the apparent absence of danger; but it is that in a fire half smothered by the weight of its own combustible materials, which is ready to blaze forth again upon the least accidental movement. It is the suspense of disaffected persons, partly alarmed at the magnitude of their own intentions, and partly appalled by the preparations used against them. Nor will the House fail to remark the specious pretext it affords them for declaiming against those preparations, while it at the same time affords them a cloak under which they can carry on their ulterior designs. But, Sir, if the meetings themselves have been peaceable (and I have too good an opinion of John Bull to believe he would ever be otherwise, unless seduced and imposed upon), what shall be said of the resolutions that have emanated from them? Take, for example, the 6th and 7th resolutions of the late meeting for Middlesex, where it is openly declared, that if parliament shall enact any measures which are contrary to their philosophy, it is not to be considered a statute, but an error or corruption, and ought resolutely to be holden for naught. Under what definition of returning tranquillity may I ask, is such doctrine as this to be included? With regard to the increase of the military force of the country, of course the House will receive the necessary information from those whose duty it is to afford it: of course the executive power is bound to afford protection to the lives and property of his majesty's subjects. But as it is always an object of such proper constitutional jealousy to employ the military upon this duty, we have a right to expect the fullest evidence of its necessity; but I think we have very good presumptive evidence of that, from the known character of the gallant general who commands in the disturbed districts. Nobody will, I think, accuse him of being an alarmist; or, were he so accused, he would receive an instant exculpation from the mouth of every British officer or soldier who has seen him before an enemy, and who can nobly testify that he never knew fear, excepting that of sacrificing his gallant countrymen. It was, I presume, upon his report of the state of the district in which he commands, that it was considered necessary to increase the military force intrusted to him. This necessarily drained the rest of the country of troops, and although there was no immediate necessity for troops in the counties where every thing was quiet, it was impossible to say how soon these pedlars of sedition might carry their wares of discord into the most peaceable regions. But, Sir, my hon. friend calls upon the House for no approbation on this point. It is resolved into the question of the seditious practices, the evidences of which his royal highness has promised to lay before us, and there will be a still farther opportunity of discussing it, when the army estimates are before the House. All that the House is called upon by my hon. friend to approve is, that this object has been accomplished in the manner least burthensome to the people. I think, Sir, it would be unnecessarily taking up the time of the House to say a word upon this subject. The men who have been embodied in consequence, have been receiving in retirement the full amount of pay, for which they are now called upon to serve their country; and, dividing the question, as the House ought in fairness to do, of the expediency of calling out any troops, and the manner in which it has been provided, I think there will be but one opinion in the House upon the latter. It will, as I conceive, only afford pleasure to those sober patriots who have determined to drink no excisable liquors, unless they have been smuggled, that the revenue in the last quarter has been deficient; but it must give sincere pleasure to all to hear that it has already begun to improve. It is not, I think, at any time a fair conclusion for despondency that the revenue in any one quarter has been deficient: various causes may occasion this. The result of the whole year is the only true criterion; and of that his royal highness's assurances afford a prospect; and if it is already in a state of improvement, we have good reason to hope that we shall not be disappointed.—Sir, it must afford all parties the sincerest gratification to find that the peace of Europe remains undisturbed, and the assurances his royal highness has received of the peaceful disposition of foreign powers, receives additional weight from the testimony of travellers as to the disposition of the people over whom they govern. The nations of the continent, not so blest as we in the hour of danger, know too well the calamities of war to hazard a recurrence, and tired of speculative opinions by which they have so much suffered, they are anxious to make use of this season of repose to recover from the pernicious effects of them, and to improve their moral condition. I wish I could also add, that I saw any prospect of improvement in their political; but the name of liberty has been so polluted by some of its modern professors, that it may well be a question with them whether they had not,

Than fly to others that they know not of.”

It must give sincere regret to the real friends of liberty that this prostitution of her name prevents the dissemination of her benefits, and thus “Enterprises of great pith and moment

With this regard their currents turn away,
And lose the name of action.”

I am sure, Sir, his Royal Highness need not doubt that parliament will make every exertion in its power to advance our internal prosperity, and, notwithstanding the abuse which is so unsparingly levelled at it by the factious and the turbulent, it merits the applause of the world by its unremitting efforts in the cause of humanity. The House of Commons, Sir, best refutes the calumnies that are heaped upon it by its unceasing efforts to do good, and presents, indeed, much to that heart who can descry nothing but abuses, when we behold the time and the talents of the ablest and best men in the country gratuitously employed in it to ameliorate the condition of their fellow-creatures, whether the sick or the poor, the prisoner or the slave; and it is worth while for the country to consider, whether, when the pseudo-patriots of the present day shall have reformed this House according to their ideas of its pristine excellence, we shall find them as ready or as capable to attend to the condition of the poor and destitute, or to excite, as the House of Commons has done, the emulation and applause of rival nations. I am sure, Sir, it must be the cause of sincere regret to every well-wisher of his country, to see the progress which infidelity and impiety have made in the country. Good God! that Britain, the nurse of morality and protectress of religion, when she was almost an outcast, should have the disgrace of having it recorded in her annals, that within the walls of an English court of justice, Christianity was impugned, and that it was declared, and attempted to be maintained, that the Holy Book, incontestibly proved by the evidence of a nation hostile to our belief, to be of Divine origin, that the oracles of the living God was declared to be a blasphemy and a lie! Will it be said there is no cause for alarm in such doctrine; or can it be urged that it is but the opinion of an individual, and not connected with the spirit that is abroad? Would that I could persuade myself it were so; but what says the convicted wretch himself of the profits of his iniquitous trade? How many honest bosoms, alas! may have been infected with this doctrine of hell? Into how many houses may it not have found its way, where sedition has already opened the door; where the wife perhaps is a member of the Female Reform Society; and the children of the Juvenile? And will not she who has sworn to instil into the minds of her progeny contempt for all allegiance and all authority, be easily induced to include that of a disbelief in the word of God? But, Sir, we must not forget, that religion has received a blow before; the liturgy of the church of England is, to the members of that church almost as dear as the Bible itself; but yet this has been reviled and scoffed at, and what is worse, its scoffers not only escaped punishment but met with encouragement. I complain not of the jury who returned their verdict; there may have been a lack of evidence to bring the fact home to the accused; for aught I know it is not an offence against the statute. But, Sir, if it is not one, it is assuredly high time it should be made one. It is not the cause of one religion alone, but of all religions: Jews and Christians, Catholics and Protestants, all are alike interested in upholding the precepts of religion, for if it is fundamentally attacked in one, it is virtually so in all; and in what are we elevated above the savage and the slave, but in the knowledge and worship of the true God?

(F)

I feel, Sir, I have ill requited the kind attention of the House by the call I have made upon its patience; but I will conclude by earnestly imploring the House to sink all party differences upon this occasion, and whether Whig or Tory, or Reformer, that they will unite in conveying to the throne their unanimous determination to suppress a system which brings liberty into disgrace by debasing it, and which is not more directed against the throne, than against the real happiness and interests of the people; and that they will show by their unanimity to-night, to the country and to the world, that however they may differ in their opinions as to the means of bettering their country, they are all equally alive to its salvation, and that violence and clamour will only make them closer rally round the constitution as it is—pro aris et focis.

Mr. Tierney rose. He said, that the ordinary manner in which a speech from the throne was received was, that no gentleman should oppose the address unless it contained something directly committing the House. He had little inclination, in the present instance, to deviate from the usual practice, especially after the construction that had been put upon the address by the hon. mover and seconder, from which it appeared, that all that was stated in the royal speech as assertion, would on some future occasion be made out by the papers to be presented to parliament. If those facts were not established, his temporary concurrence in what the address contained would of course be revoked. Although he might give his assent thus qualified to what had just been read from the chair, he felt called upon to say, that it did not comprise all that, under the circumstances of the country, it ought to have included. Looking at those circumstances, he felt that he was imperatively called upon to claim the attention of the House to an amendment he should in conclusion submit. He was as much aware as any man, indeed, more than many men who had not had the same parliamentary experience, of the inconvenience of offering an amendment on the first day of a session, because many persons who did not object to the matter of an amendment, resisted it merely because it was presented in that obnoxious shape; he should therefore have abstained, had he felt that the important object he had in view could be otherwise as satisfactorily accomplished. As the kingdom was now situated, it was the duty of every member not to lose a moment in coming forward to state his opinion fairly and freely to the world, not merely by an acquiescence in an echo of the royal speech, but by a full disclosure of the sentiments by which he was actuated. No man could feel more deeply than himself the melancholy condition in which the country was placed: no man, he assured the hon. mover, could have heard with more disgust, with more abhorrence, than he had, the blasphemous doctrines, the farther promulgation of which the laws had now happily suppressed. This was not a subject on which he wished to enlarge, because the present was not the most fit occasion: he would only state generally, that the abhorrence he had felt was not exceeded by that of any gentleman present. It was attended, however, with this great consolation—a consolation in which others participated—that however extensive and daring the evil might be, it had been seen that the law was able to correct it. He did not believe that impiety, as some contended, had been widely spread; and it was his firm conviction, from what he had seen of various parts of the kingdom, and from the comparison he had been able to make with other countries, that a nation more pious, more devoted to its duty to God, and more sincere in its religion, was not to be found in the whole circuit of the globe. He had a right to express his confidence in this persuasion the more decidedly, because it had been stated on the other side of the House, and generally allowed, that the piety of the country had so enlarged itself, that the churches already built were not able to contain it. There was not room enough in the ordinary places of worship for the surplus piety (if he might so call it) of the country; and it became absolutely necessary to erect a number of new churches. It was therefore somewhat strange to hear it now urged, that such had been the rapid progress of impiety that the laws of the country were incompetent to put it down. If they were incompetent, he was ready instantly to vote for new laws; but he had yet seen nothing which did not prove that backed by the honest, upright, and christian feeling of every jury in the kingdom, they were amply sufficient. The political state of the country was very different: dissatisfaction or disaffection, by some called treason, pervaded the kingdom or, more properly, certain quarters of the kingdom: for he was happy to say, that it did not extend beyond the manufacturing districts. He was quite ready to admit, that if the existing laws were not adequate to remove it, or prevent its consequences—if treason or insurrection could not be quelled by laws now in force, new ones ought to be passed, and that without delay; but had that case been made out? or could it be made out? He desired to be distinctly understood as not setting his face against additional and extraordinary measures, if the necessity were shown; but, at the same time he was anxious to guard himself against a supposed admission, that the existing laws were not sufficient to maintain obedience and tranquillity. He believed at present (but he might be wrong), that nothing was wanting but a vigilant and wholesome exertion of the magistracy—nothing but fairness and firmness on the part of the government—to do all that the law authorized, and the circumstances required. If, on the other hand, no such disposition existed, and if the people were taught by facts to believe, that the existing law was not equally administered to all ranks, not only new laws might be required, but he would go further, and say, that he knew not what new laws could be devised that would be effectual in keeping down a people that had no respect for the government and the constituted authorities of the land. The House would do him the justice to recollect, that he had always represented that what was now witnessed would be the result. He had long since warned ministers, though in vain, on the subject of taxation, which had grown worse and worse, and heavier and heavier from day to day, until at last the burthen was intolerable. He had told them, over and over again, that the resources of the country, great as they undoubtedly were, were not inexhaustible: they had more confidence in them than he had felt: he had seen millions after millions voted, and spent as soon as voted—nay, sometimes before they were voted; and he had been called almost an enemy to social order and happiness, because he had maintained, that the day would ere long arrive, when it would be seen that he was not in the wrong, and that it would have been better for ministers to have paused in their career of profusion, and confined their lavish expenditure to narrower limits. Where, then, was the real root of all our grievances? The pressure of taxes—a pressure which the country could not bear; by which more was to be extracted from its inhabitants than they could produce, consistently with their own reasonable comforts and conveniences. The nation was over-taxed, and that was the root of the evil. This was strong language, but not too strong: facts compelled him to use it; and a dreary prospect of those facts had formerly compelled him to declare the same opinions. Gentlemen on the other side never could be brought to admit, that any thing could possibly be wrong on the subject of taxation and revenue. It was here that they held themselves immaculate and above instruction. Even in the speech just delivered from the throne, there was what he should call, but that it proceeded from the royal lips, a miserable attempt to raise a fallacious hope. It was said that there had been some fluctuation in the revenue, and from thence it was inferred, that a continued improvement must take place; this was a wretched expedient—a poor attempt on the part of ministers to avail themselves of a temporary rise, artificially produced, and which could not be progressive, to delude the country with the empty vision of returning prosperity. It only showed how much the revenue sympathised with the meeting or prorogation of parliament: when the Houses assembled, it was contrived that the revenue should be always better, and when they adjourned, it gradually proceeded from bad to worse. It was not necessary to trouble the House by reading it; for it could scarcely be forgotten, that only nine months ago the country was congratulated from the throne on the commerce, the revenue, and the trade of the kingdom being in the most flourishing condition. These were the very words employed. Did ministers believe what they then asserted? If they did not, they had imposed upon the nation; and if they did, the House ought never again to listen to such men on any subject, much less on the subject of finance. An artificial and temporary improvement was called a fluctuation; and then it was idly held out that things were rapidly coming round, and that prosperity would soon be restored. This might be a pleasant topic for a royal speech; but it was most mischievous in the country; and only showed how radically wrong matters must be, when, in the face of all the distress by which the people were afflicted, ministers attempted a delusion, by stating, that, if there were any distress at all, it would quickly be removed by the gradual and certain improvement of the revenue. He asserted, without fear of contradiction from any merchant in the realm, that such a stagnation of trade was never before known. Ask any and every manufacturer what was the state of his business, and what would be the answer? It never was at a lower ebb; and within a short time meetings of the agriculturists had been held, at which it was declared, that some assistance was necessary for them. The labouring classes would assert, and with truth, that wages were so low that they could not maintain their families by their severest exertions; and the paltry pittance of the poor-laws, to eke out a miserable subsistence, while it did not furnish support, weakened and broke down the honest and upright spirit of industry which used to be the happy characteristic of the people of England. Seeing all this, was it necessary to talk about sedition and treason? Treason and sedition he did not believe existed; but who could hope that the great body of the nation would not be in a state of miserable discontent? Could it be otherwise? He was an alarmist—an alarmist to a certain extent, though not, perhaps, on the grounds that many other gentlemen rested their fears. Every man was in terror; and his apprehensions grew out of what he best understood; but he felt as much general alarm as any man in the House; and it might not be improper for him to state a few of the causes of that alarm, and of the mischiefs that now afflicted the land. He was bound to speak out; and though liable to misconstruction, and though a clamour might be raised against him, he was determined to do his duty to his country and to himself. His settled conviction was, that there did not exist among the inhabitants of the country that confidence in the House of Commons that could be wished [continual cheers from the Opposition side]. That conviction did not pervade merely those who, to give every thing a name, had been called radicals; but it had penetrated much further and much higher; and many of those who wisely condemned the visionary schemes of reform at present afloat, were satisfied that there was something wrong in the state of representation, or the nation could never have been reduced to the condition in which it now found itself. What had reduced it to that condition? Had the House refused to ministers any of the means of carrying on war? Had it been sparing in its votes for national improvements? Had it refused to make new laws when they were asked for? Had it resisted the raising of additional troops? or had it, in short, objected to comply with any request ministers thought fit to make? Certainly not. How happened it, then, that in the result the revenue was so deficient; that trade was stagnated; that the stocks fell; and that the House was to be told that there was not law enough to control sedition, or troops enough to prevent rebellion? How happened all these things; and above all, how could ministers now venture to demand that new confidence should be reposed in them for having thus brought the nation to the brink of ruin and despair? These were not merely the opinions of the radicals in public meetings, but of sober, discreet men in private societies. Though they were unwilling to make an open avowal of their sentiments, they entertained them in fact, and parliamentary reform had been gradually working its way for years; and it was now almost universally admitted, that the great mass of the people did not feel that the present state of the representation was beneficial to them. It would be to bely the sentiments he had entertained through life, if he denied that he was honestly and sincerely a friend to parliamentary reform. Yet he was in no way a radical reformer; and he thanked the hon. mover for his fairness in admitting that there might be distinctions in the different classes of reformers. If asked whether he had not changed some of his opinions upon this subject, he would freely confess that he had: he was not ashamed to confess that as he became older, if he had not become wiser, he had at least become more cautious; and for many of the schemes to which he had formerly listened with ardour, he was not now so warm an advocate. That great improvements might, however, be made in the state of the representation—that those great alterations might be accomplished, not only without the smallest hazard, but with additional safety to the constitution, was as undeniable as that the majority of the nation demanded that those improvements should be effected.

The question of parliamentary reform was first started during the American war; it was afterwards supported by Mr. Pitt, who did more than any man to diffuse a general inclination in its favour. It afterwards slept for some few years when he abandoned it; and it might still have continued to slumber had the nation found that the House of Commons, as at present formed, was practically beneficial. But, finding every day that things grew worse and worse—that the burden of taxes was increased, while the means of paying them were annihilated—the nation now again insisted on a remedy; and it was not unreasonable that they should look for that remedy in a change in the representation. The nation laid the blame on the House of Commons, which called itself the guardian of the public purse: if the public money had been squandered and misapplied, were ought the blame to rest but with the House of Commons? The House claimed to itself the privilege of maintaining the rights of the people, and of seeing that the laws were equally enforced. Had those laws been fairly administered? And if not, who was held responsible to the people? There were three branches in the constitution—two permanent and one elective; and whose conduct from day to day must be a subject of discussion, unless an abstract idea of representation could be formed. If that conduct was wise and temperate, many blessings would ensue; but if it was, careless and extravagant, endless mischiefs would arise. Had those mischiefs arisen? With regard to plans of reform, it was unfortunately but too true, that some men in this country entertained the strangest and most extravagant notions of parliamentary reform: and here he begged to be understood to be as much an enemy as any man to what were called the radical leaders: he was as willing as any man to mark in the strongest terms his contempt of their understanding, his disgust at their proceedings, and his jealousy of their objects. Some had availed themselves of a clamour for parliamentary reform to accomplish their own purposes; some had been guided only by excessive vanity, and a wish to be distinguished as popular leaders; and some from a sheer paucity of intellect had come forward, without understanding, or attempting to understand a syllable of the project they supported. In a few instances bad men might be linked by bad designs—designs that aimed at utter destruction; and such being his opinion of radical leaders, he thought he now stood fair and above board with the House on this great question.—The hon. mover had wished distinctions to be drawn: he (Mr. Tierney) had now drawn them, and without using harsher language towards men at present on their trials, he hoped he should not be misunderstood. In characterising the radicals as he had done, he had been actuated by no rancour; and he did not think the other side would charge him with too great partiality; for it was certainly impossible to conceive any set of gentlemen under less obligations to the radicals than the whigs were. True it was that ministers came in for a share of abuse and disapprobation; but it was mild and merciful compared with the castigation which their opponents received. The right hon. gentleman who were in office were unpopular with the radicals; but the unfortunate Whigs, who had long left office, came in for a sort of post obit of unpopularity. He was thoroughly convinced, that if many of the seditious publications had not obtained such violent vituperations of the opposition, government and their friends would have been much more active in putting an end to their circulation and punishing their authors. There might be some madness in these effusions, but there was a great deal of method in it, and ministers took care to avail themselves of it. They argued in this way—"If we do not do something against these pamphleteers, we shall increase sedition, it is true; but if we put an end to them, we shall let our enemies go scot-free; therefore we will not be too severe with these seditious gentlemen, in order that we may not be too merciful to the Whigs" [cheers from the Opposition benches].—He had thus fairly stated his opinion on the state of the country: he hoped he should not be misunderstood: and he repeated, that there did exist out of doors a general want of confidence in the House; for even sober men began to be satisfied that the practical inconveniences they suffered, and which had been increasing for the last twenty years, were attributable to a defect in the representation. The doctrines of universal suffrage and annual parliaments was unquestionably a great evil; but, after all, as far as regarded them, it was not of wide extent—it had not many partisans; and though it was common for the friends of ministers to talk of hundreds of thousands of its supporters, he believed it was a gross mistake or exaggeration. True it was, that men marched from one town to another; but they were the same men at both places, and they were to be looked upon like a company of strollers, who travelled about to perform their parts in different situations: 4,000 or 5,000 of these gentry would make an imposing display when their numbers were swelled by all the curious and unemployed of the large town where they were exhibiting. But if it were possible to separate from the gross mass those who were really and in earnest in favour of universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and the last improvement—vote by ballot, their numbers would be comparatively very small. In no part of Great Britain but the disturbed districts were any friends to it known; and the whole was a scheme which, by the great mass of the people, must be held in contempt, though some few might regard it with an ignorant and fond amazement. What could any man of sense, even among the lower orders, think of that project, by which a respectable baronet (sir Charles Wolseley) was to be returned, and was in fact returned, by the inhabitants of Birmingham, as a legislative attorney, to take his seat in the House of Commons? The name of a member of parliament was offensive to his self-enfranchised constituents; and accordingly, as legislative attorney he was to undertake this expedition to London: if he had undertaken it, and had carried his promise into effect, he would have found it one of the most inconvenient seats he had ever occupied in his life [a laugh]. The plan had not a shadow of law or understanding about it; and if the non-represented of Birmingham assumed the power of electing one, what reason was there that they should not have returned ten legislative attorneys to claim or enforce an admission into that House? Such schemes as these satisfied him that there was no real ground for alarm at what was called the radical party in the country: his fears arose from other causes, to which he had already alluded, and which occasioned, in his mind, as much apprehension as he had ever felt in the course of his life, or could have felt had it been his fate to have lived in any of the most momentous periods of our history. Did gentlemen make sufficient allowances

when they set their faces so determinately against all kinds of reform? He had said what he thought of the radicals on one side of the question; and he would now make a few remarks on the radicals on the other, and a word or two by the way to the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Canning). He must take leave to say, that that right hon. gentleman was just as much a radical, as those to whose projects he was so strenuously opposed. There were radicals in favour of a complete change of system, and radicals in favour of an undeviating adherence to old customs. One of the latter was the right hon. gentleman, and he was decidedly opposed to every thing in the shape of parliamentary reform: he resisted all degrees of it, from opening close boroughs, to the monstrous proposition of electing legislative attorneys. But he did not sufficiently take into consideration the different state of the country in point of education now, and thirty, forty, or fifty years ago. The proceedings of the House were formerly wrapped up in a sort of mystery: the debates were only given to the public in brief and imperfect notices, and under Roman names: the power of reading what passed in parliament was not diffused as at present; and could any gentleman at all acquainted with the state of society doubt that the whole population, in the proportion of three to one, now thought itself capable of thoroughly understanding, sifting, and criticising parliamentary proceedings? The blessings of education had been extended by the measures of the House itself; and could any hon. member suppose that its debates and votes had not thereby been often subjected to no very favourable comments? To act like wise men, times and circumstances must always be taken into view; and if the incalculable blessings of diffused information were to cease to be enjoyed, the House must submit to all the criticisms upon its proceedings that men thought themselves justified by the facts and their own knowledge in making. Thus, that which thirty, forty, or fifty years ago, might be thought a wholesome, or at least a secure course, was now both injurious and dangerous. It was too late for ministers now to say, that they would hear nothing in the way of innovation—that they were well contented with things as they are, or that whatever is right, and needs no improvement. Men were now capable of forming sound opinions, and at the corner of every street these might be encountered who, by the mere use of the knowledge they had acquired, and by the force of their own strong sense, could bring such assertions and asserters to shame and confusion. If government thought that by passing new laws, by raising new troops, or by the promulgation of loyal addresses, they could put down the awakened spirit of the country, they would find themselves grievously mistaken: the progress of reason was not to be curbed by Crown influence, nor could a military force put an end to the assemblies of the people, who, having received the means, had a right to exercise the power of judging for themselves. Such was the state of affairs up to the 16th August: the hon. mover had felt it his duty not to advert to the events of that day; and much credit was due to him for so doing: he had thus shown that he was not the mere mouth-piece of the Treasury, in dwelling upon the scenes of a day which must be looked upon as one of the most eventful in modern times. Since those transactions, the question had been completely changed; it was now whether parliamentary reform should or should not be agreed to. A new subject of complaint was afforded, and that subject had provoked and occupied all the later meetings which had spread, in despite of ministers, from one end of the kingdom to the other. How, then, was it possible for him (Mr. Tierney) to discharge his duty without demanding inquiry, when he found the whole kingdom, by addresses, calling upon the Prince Regent most earnestly and anxiously for investigation? Yet, when called upon to vote an address in this House, that was the only subject that was to be entirely omitted [Hear]. However painful it might be, not a day ought to be allowed to elapse without the mention of this great topic. He was not prepared to go into the details, nor did he wish the House to do more than pledge itself to acquire all the information that could be obtained, as well to justify the magistrates as to satisfy the country. He would not prejudge a single point; he would not even give an opinion, but would confine himself to the statement of what was known to have occurred, and which, in his view, required immediate explanation. If ever a case had arisen in which explanation was necessary on the first meeting of parliament, it was the present. He found that, on the 16th August, a multitude was assembled—a multitude admitted to be unarmed, for he would not introduce disputed facts; the numbers were differently stated at from 40 to 70,000; and they were suddenly, and without any previous notice, attacked by an armed force; several lost their lives, and hundreds were sorely maimed and wounded. If this was not a case which required immediate investigation, he could only say, that no case ever had or ever would occur that could demand it. He was not here stating who was right or who was wrong: on the contrary, he was willing to make every allowance for the alarmed state of the minds of those gentlemen who had for some time resided in the disturbed districts: a great degree of irritation and party spirit unquestionably prevailed, and differences had long existed between the higher and lower classes in Manchester and its neighbourhood. Yet, with all these admissions, he could not shut his eyes to the fact, that blood had been shed, limbs broken, and many persons reduced to the condition of cripples for the remainder of their lives, in consequence of a transaction, of which it was enough for his purpose to say that he did not understand it. It was a strong case at present, and he hoped, for the credit of the magistracy, that they had a strong case in answer to it. Explanation had not yet been attempted; it had been reserved for some future opportunity, and that opportunity was now arrived. If the House of Commons yet had any respect for the opinions of the people, if it wished to redeem itself at all from the imputations that had been cast upon it, it ought not to lose a moment in insisting upon a full, fair, and unsparing investigation. When he called for inquiry into this event, when he demanded what reasons could be adduced in justification of such a proceeding, he might be told, that the persons thus dispersed were disaffected to the government. Still, however, his case would not be answered, because it began after those individuals were taken into custody against whom the vigilance of the magistrates seemed to be chiefly directed. For the sake of argument, he would admit that it was proper they should be taken up; but it should not be forgotten, that that object was effected without resistance. They were conveyed, in perfect safety (except the injury which one of them declared he had received from the constable) before the magistrates, and were ultimately placed in confinement. But why, he demanded, was the meeting to be violently dispersed by military force, subsequent to the arrest of those individuals? Why was it thought necessary to call out a military force against an unarmed multitude? They were wholly helpless; they had lost their leaders. It was, indeed, an army without a general. The general was made prisoner; and then, from one end to the other of the place where the meeting was held, nothing was to be seen but a body of cavalry cutting, slashing, and riding over men, women, and children. He did not mean to give credit to all that he had heard relative to the proceedings of that day, but there were circumstances against which he could not shut his eyes. He must receive as evidence the infirmity return of persons who were brought in there wounded; and he could not overlook the coroner's inquests that had been held on the bodies of persons who were slain. He would say nothing harsh of the magistrates; he merely demanded a full inquiry. He wished to know why a military force had been employed at all? It might be answered, that Mr. Nadin had said, he could not arrest these people without the aid of a military power. Well; a military force was granted, and he apprehended the obnoxious parties. Then, he wished to learn, why that military force was suffered to remain, and to act against the defenceless multitude, after the persons whom the magistrates ordered to be apprehended were in custody? Did the magistrates approve of that proceeding? If they did not, why did they not exert themselves and put a stop to it? From the windows of the house in which they were assembled, they must have seen the horsemen cutting down those poor people; why, then, did they not use the same authority which they had previously exercised in summoning the yeomanry there, by ordering them to desist and retire? He wished especially to know, why the magistrates called on the Manchester yeomanry for their services—why, of all others, they had selected them for this business? If it were at all necessary to employ troops on this occasion, they should not have been called out. Was there any gentleman who did not feel, that a body of men who resided in and about Manchester, and who must have been infected by the heat and irritation of party feeling which had prevailed there for a considerable time, were those who,

of all others, ought not to have been selected? Other troops might have been found who would have performed this duty without difficulty and without violence. He had no doubt whatsoever, that if a regiment of dragoons had been employed to open a passage to the hustings, they would have effected their object without producing that dreadful scene, the recollection of which shook all England from one end to the other. Was it, then, under all the circumstances, too much to ask of parliament to take this unparalleled event into immediate consideration? Was it too much to call on the legislature to show to the empire, that, while they were alive to the necessity of causing the laws to be obeyed, they were also alive to the acknowledged privileges of the subject? Parliament ought now to prove, that, while they deprecated any thing like tumult or sedition, they were, on the other hand, determined not to suffer the rights of the people to be trampled on with impunity. He knew that an argument had been generally used against instituting any parliamentary inquiry into this proceeding, namely, that it would be a prejudging of the question. Many men, actuated by the best possible feelings and motives, who were anxious that justice should be done, and who supposed the business would be brought before a legal tribunal, besought all whom they conversed with to wait for the decision of that tribunal, and to abstain from delivering a premature opinion. Now, first of all, he did not know that any proceedings had been instituted before a legal tribunal, for the purpose of bringing the matter to issue. The trial of Hunt could not affect the question, because he was charged as a party in a conspiracy, which alleged offence occurred before the meeting took place. This could not be contradicted; for every person was in possession of the terms of the information. Hunt's trial, therefore, could have no relation, not even the slightest, to what took place when he was forced from the ground, and imprisoned in the New Bailey at Manchester. The whole of the case respecting the forcibly dispersing the mob could not come before the court: but, in his mind, even if it did, that circumstance would not remove the necessity of inquiry. They were the great inquest of the nation; and when they had before them positive information, that many lives were lost in time of profound peace, they could not, with justice, refuse to exercise their powers of inquiry. It was asserted, that the people who had been injured might procure legal redress. What redress, he demanded, could they have against the magistrates and yeomanry? This was not similar to a case in which John Thompson knocked down George Jackson. There the party aggrieved knew where to seek for his remedy. It was not so here. This was an extraordinary, not a common occurrence. Let it also be remembered when redress was spoken of, that it had been the great object of his majesty's ministers to crush inquiry. Had any thing ever excited, or indeed could any thing excite, more general or more decided indignation, than the precipitancy with which they gave thanks to those individuals whose motives were wholly unexplained? He had not met a single individual, whether friend or foe of ministers, who did not condemn this act. He had not met a dispassionate man, who did not exclaim, that of all the ill-advised measures that ever entered the human mind, this was the most ill-advised. It was impossible for ministers to have been acquainted with the circumstances of the case; and yet, they at once, without any hesitation, expressed his royal highness's great satisfaction at the prompt and efficient exertions of the magistrates and yeomanry. Great satisfaction! For what? For an event in which 300 or 400 persons were maimed and wounded, and several were killed! With respect to what ministers might say on the subject, it was not worth attending to. They might as well talk to a Manchester magistrate as to a minister on this event; for ministers had absolutely made themselves partners in the business. [Hear, and laughter.] However on other occasions he was willing to allow due weight to what might fall from the noble lord, he could not pay any attention to what, as a minister, he might this night offer to the House on the subject of the proceedings at Manchester, because he had now a clear and direct interest in the acquittal of the parties concerned, with whom he and his colleagues had identified themselves. Therefore, all the noble lord might say this night would go with him for nothing.—The greatest pains, it appeared, had been taken by government to prevent great public meetings, at which the feelings of the community on this deplorable event might be collected. On that point he begged to say a word or two, particularly as the interference of ministers on one occasion of that kind, ought, in his opinion, to be taken up as a breach of the privileges of that House. He saw an hon. friend in his place (Mr. Wynn) who was deeply versed in questions of this nature; and he would ask him what he would say to the lord-lieutenant of a county who should conduct himself in the manner he would presently describe? A nobleman of great worth wrote thus to the high sheriff of the county: "We are in a state of great agitation in consequence of what recently occurred at Manchester: we do not wish to come precipitately to any decision on that event; but we are desirous that a meeting should be called for the purpose of petitioning the Prince Regent to call parliament together immediately, in order that a proper inquiry may be instituted." What was he to think of the lord-lieutenant of that county, who, in conjunction with one of his majesty's ministers, wrote a letter to the high sheriff, desiring him "not to call such a meeting, as it would be unconstitutional?" He demanded whether such a proceeding was not directly questioning the power of the House of Commons? Sure he was, that if it was not a breach of privilege, it most undoubtedly was a breach of all decency and decorum. Was it not saying to those who could be at all influenced by ministers, that if they wished to stand well with men in power, they must set their faces against any inquiry into the Manchester business? When he saw a paper like that, meant to stifle inquiry, signed by one of his majesty's ministers, he could not suppress his indignation: but, in spite of such arts, they would ultimately compel inquiry—such an inquiry as would visit with shame and confusion some of those who endeavoured to prevent investigation.—The great and anxious wish of the honourable mover was, that, at a critical period like the present, they should throw aside all party feeling, and only consider the public good. Let gentlemen look to the example that had been shown by ministers—let them examine whether they had forgotten party-feeling. This brought them at once to the dismissal of earl Fitzwilliam. That was the act which ministers performed to prove that they were entirely free from party feeling! [Hear, hear.] "Oh, but," said they, "the public good required it. It was necessary to remove him, because he, as lord-lieutenant, held a different opinion from that entertained by us, with respect to popular meetings." And yet, after this act, which spoke for itself, they exclaimed—"Oh, party has nothing to do with our proceeding!" Next to the general indignation produced by the thanks given to the Manchester yeomanry and magistrates, was the sensation produced by the removal of this venerable nobleman. He knew no individual at any time with whom the feelings of the country so entirely sympathised as they did with earl Fitzwilliam, on this occasion. No man could be selected, towards whom the great body of the people, those who knew him and those who did not know him, bore so respectful a feeling. He believed no individual could be found for whom the country entertained so deep-rooted and thorough an affection; and certainly no man more justly deserved it. His private virtues, his advanced age, the exemplary manner in which, for twenty years, he had administered the office of lord-lieutenant, ought to have been entertained by ministers as powerful reasons against degrading him—for such was their intention—by a removal. After the treatment he had received, he knew not how others, who had not served their country so long, could escape a similar visitation, if they acted with similar independence. It was his misfortune to differ from earl Fitzwilliam with respect to the steps that ought to be taken at a former period, when there were disturbances in the country; but he was convinced that his opinion was a sincere one, flowing from the dictates of his conscience. He was, at one time, the best stay the administration possessed, for effecting and preserving what they considered the tranquillity of the country. He had since done that which, if it had been done elsewhere, there would have been no necessity for his addressing the House that night. The noble earl had preserved the tranquillity of Yorkshire; and he was rewarded by a removal from the situation of lord-lieutenant! [Hear]. In Yorkshire there had been a display of flags; and there also that martial array of which so much had been said was observable. But those things had ceased in consequence of earl Fitzwilliam's exertions; the system had nearly evaporated; and many of those deluded persons had applied to his lordship to be enrolled in his corps of Yeomanry. The noble lord opposite (Castlereagh) smiled at that; but he was, notwithstanding, extremely sore about it. If a lord-lieutenant acted improperly in his office, it was but just that he should be discharged. His offence should, however, be clearly pointed out. What, then, had earl Fitzwilliam done? Did the noble lord mean to say, that government had any thing to find fault with, as far as earl Fitzwilliam's conduct in the discharge of his official duties was concerned? Did ministers mean to say, that he was not ready to appear at any meeting, or to attend in any place, where tumult or riot might be expected? Would they contend that in these respects he was not so vigilant as he ought to have been? They could not allege any charge of that kind. It might be answered by ministers—"We must have a person in the situation of lord-lieutenant who reposes confidence in us, and in whom we, in turn, can repose confidence." This was the only answer that could be made. When gentlemen talked of doing away party feelings, it was right to call their attention to the case of earl Fitzwilliam, and to ask them whether it was necessary to state in a public newspaper, a month before a successor to the lord-lieutenancy could be found, that he had been removed from the office. How came it in that newspaper? It could not have found its way there, except from the cabinet: there was no other mode in which the communication could be accounted for. He asked of those who declared that they entertained no party feeling, but who were evidently influenced by a mean party-spirit, how they could justify this act? They showed how much they enjoyed their petty triumph, by stating the removal of Earl Fitzwilliam a month before his successor was appointed. By such a proceeding, they hazarded the tranquillity of Yorkshire; and in running that hazard, by what could they possibly be influenced, except by party feeling? "Oh! but," said they, "it is an act of spirit. It shows that government will not be trifled with; that they have assumed a vigorous and commanding attitude; and all will soon be well." He would, however, tell them, that there never was an act which tended more to set the country against the government, than the removal of earl Fitzwilliam.—There was another point connected with the Manchester business which he should like to have properly explained. Why, he wished to know, was Hunt arrested on the hustings, when he might have been taken the day before? Was there a desire to create an opportunity for the employment of troops? He did not mean to say that so base a desire existed, but certainly it was a little extraordinary that such a course was taken. The same thing, however, happened in London. A person of the name of Harrison was arrested in Smithfield, when he was surrounded by thousands of individuals. Why, then, endanger the peace of the city? why run the hazard of endangering the safety of the metropolis, merely for the purpose of apprehending a man at 12 o'clock on one day, who might as well be arrested at 12 o'clock on the next?—It was evident that the country had no confidence in ministers; it was clear their proceedings were disapproved of; and that was one great reason why he would not give them any additional force. Till the whole of those proceedings were explained satisfactorily, he could not extend any confidence to the government; and he knew not with what face they could demand fresh confidence from the House or the country, until they showed how they had exercised the powers which had previously been intrusted to them. He was aware, that throughout the country, the attempts made to run down the liberty of the subject had excited a very great alarm. The hon. mover doubted this, but he (Mr. T.) was assured of the fact. The jealousy of the people was roused by the proceedings at Manchester, and was farther inflamed by the precipitancy with which the yeomanry and magistrates were thanked for their conduct in that deplorable affair. When they saw the whole system crowned by the manner in which persons were arrested, the most dangerous periods being selected for that purpose; and when they witnessed the removal of such a man as earl Fitzwilliam, for no other reason but that his opinions were not in unison with those of his majesty's ministers, was there any thing under heaven which could induce him, or any unbiassed individual, to give additional confidence to the advisers of the Crown? The constitution was at stake; it depended on the debate of that night. He had abstained from giving any specific opinion on the Manchester business; he had confined himself to the mere fact; but that there ought to be a full and fair inquiry he could not doubt, unless parliament wished to state to the country, that their mode of allaying discontent was, by raising an additional military force, by enacting severe laws, and trusting entirely to a system of coercion. If they meant to state this, it was in vain for him, or any other man, to raise his voice in that House hereafter in defence of the rights and privileges of the people. If there was an opposition to inquiry, what could he hope from the discussion of those severe measures which might, and probably would, be proposed? Such a want of sympathy for the feelings of the people would tend to produce that line of separation which occasioned danger in all countries where it existed—a separation between the interests of the high and of the low. He, however, would do his duty, under all circumstances, however discouraging. He would point out, what he conceived to be, the best cure for existing evils, and he hoped those in power would take a warning from the history of other nations—particularly from the events which occurred in the early part of the French revolution. Had there been a government in France willing and anxious to conciliate the people, and ready to admit that abuses existed which ought and would be remedied, hopes might have been cherished that the revolution would not have taken place. But a contrary course was adopted: every man who complained was subjected to persecution, and set down as a Jacobin and an agitator. This mistaken policy produced a dreadful convulsion, and every thing dear and valuable was hurried away in the general devastation. Let gentlemen beware how they proceeded in this question—one of the most momentous that was ever agitated within the walls of parliament. The radicals, as they were called, were, he believed, by no means in force in this country; but a large proportion of the people were acutely alive to the business transacted in that House, because they felt that much of their sufferings were to be traced to its proceedings. Let ministers do all they could to alleviate the distresses of the people, and he would stand by them to protect the law and the constitution; no man would do more, or go farther than he would, most cheerfully. Let the House but show a wish to remove the real grievances of the people, and he was convinced peace and harmony would be restored. But while they proved that they were most anxious to uphold the laws, they ought to let the people see that they were equally determined to protect and maintain their just rights [Hear]. He then read his amendment, as follows:

"To assure his royal highness, that, called together at a season when unexampled distress and extraordinary agitation prevail in some of the most populous districts of the kingdom, we will immediately proceed to take into our most serious consideration the various matters contained in his royal highness's gracious speech from the throne:

"Humbly to express to his royal highness our reprobation of the attempts which have been made to persuade the suffering classes of the people to seek relief from their distress in schemes injurious to themselves, dangerous to the public quiet, and inconsistent with the security of the constitution, which it is our duty and determination to maintain against every species of encroachment or attack:

"To represent to his royal highness that while we thus declare our determined resolution firmly to uphold the just authority of the laws, we feel that we are called upon by a sense of duty, so to conduct ourselves as to satisfy the people that their complaints will at all times receive from us that just attention, and their rights that ready protection, which is indispensable to their safety and freedom:

"That this seems to us more particularly necessary in order to maintain that confidence in the public institutions of the country, which constitutes the best safeguard of all law and government:

"That we have seen with deep regret the events which took place at Manchester on the 16th of August last; and that, without pronouncing any opinion on the circumstances which occurred on that melancholy occasion, we feel that they will demand our earliest attention in order to dissipate the alarm to which they have given birth, by a diligent and impartial inquiry, which may show that the measures of extraordinary severity, then resorted to, were the result of the most urgent and unavoidable necessity; or prove that an important constitutional privilege cannot be violated, and the lives of his majesty's subjects sacrificed, with impunity."

The Marquis of Tavistock seconded the amendment. At a time of peril like the present, he observed, it was the duty of every man to stand forward and deliver his opinions as to the best mode of removing those evils which were so generally allowed to exist. On this occasion, he assured the House, that he was not actuated by any party feeling. He felt the dangers by which the country was surrounded so deeply, that he could not with justice to himself or his constituents remain silent on that occasion. The great object before them was, the result of the proceedings on the 16th of August. He alluded to these proceedings at present merely for the purpose of imploring the House not to disappoint and irritate the minds of the people. He hoped and trusted that a fair and impartial inquiry into these proceedings would be instituted. Let witnesses be examined, and let no biassed or party views impede their proceedings—let them have no object in view but the attainment of justice. To him it was a matter of little importance who was in or out of office, compared with his anxiety to secure the peace and happiness of the people. But how were these objects attended to at present? One of the first noblemen in the country had been degraded because he had opposed himself to the conduct of ministers. But it should be recollected that this nobleman was the first to detect and expose the spies and informers who had been sent about the country—that he was one of the first men who had had the courage to give to ministers his opinion of the state of the country, and whose great fault was his calling for an investigation of recent occurrences. For this the noble earl was entitled to the thanks of every friend of freedom, and in retiring from office he carried with him the respect and good wishes of every honest man. That there were circumstances of an alarming nature connected with some of those popular meetings, was the opinion of many; and perhaps, however inadequate the cause was, it might be owing to these circumstances that the country was to be burthened with 10,000 additional troops. But the House, he conceived, could not adopt a measure so unprecedented in time of peace, until they were furnished with satisfactory data. If they produced such data—if ministers showed that they could not carry on the business of the government, without an additional force—then he conceived they had much to answer for, because it was by their conduct that the country was reduced to that situation. Gentlemen might contemplate, with melancholy feelings, those past days when this once flourishing country, directed by wise councils, enjoyed undisturbed tranquillity in time of peace—a tranquillity to which it was now a stranger. It was not surprising that there should be a want of confidence in government, when they reflected on the little sympathy which was shown in the votes of that House to the situation of the people at large. A former parliament did itself no credit by repealing the property-tax, and that which succeeded obtained still less by imposing taxes which fell heavily on the working classes. If the chancellor of the exchequer came down and proposed a property-tax, his vote should be at the right hon. gentleman's service; but on these conditions—that other taxes which bore heavily on the people should be repealed; that the universal desire for economy and retrenchment, in every branch of the state, should be met by corresponding efforts on the part of the government; that the country should not again be insulted by the unnecessary grant of a large sum out of the public money, and that every office which could be abolished should be speedily annihilated. Then, and not till then, would he vote for the property-tax. With respect to the difficulties that threatened the country, he thought they might be overcome, and the breach might be healed, if they did not drive the people to despair, by refusing inquiry. They should conciliate them by granting at least some step towards reform. In his mind, that question was, of all others, of the greatest importance. He would not presume to say what specific plan of reform ought to be adopted; but of this he was confident—that so long as that House was constituted as it at present was, it could not, and it ought not to possess the confidence of the people. Before he sat down he should express a hope, that the noble lord would not attempt to degrade the spirit of the people by force and coercion, but would endeavour to conciliate it by mild and equitable measures. There were some men who were perpetually boasting of their loyalty and attachment to the constitution; but to him it appeared as if those individuals had but a slight idea of the meaning which belonged to those terms. True loyalty consisted in preserving, not in restricting, the liberties of the people; they, however, made it to consist in a blind adherence; and servile acquiescence in the measures proposed by his majesty's ministers. Could, however, any person who had witnessed the trials to which the people of England had been subjected during the last twenty years, and the exemplary patience with which they had sustained them, question for a moment their loyalty or their attachment to the laws and institutions of their forefathers? The patience they had exhibited during the late arduous contest in which they had been engaged, surely deserved some better return than the harshness with which they were treated, now that the contest was over. He therefore could not help imploring his majesty's ministers to institute a full and fair inquiry into the injuries which the people conceived themselves to have sustained at Manchester, and not to treat them with any unnecessary violence or contempt. By conducting such an inquiry without any reference to party feelings or to party views, they would disarm the rage of thousands who were now excited against them, because they thought that they had been treated with harshness. He could assure the House, that into such an investigation he should himself enter without the slightest hostility to any of his majesty's ministers, though he must own that he should bring to it strong feelings of affection to his country, and a trembling anxiety for the safety of the constitution. The noble marquis concluded his speech by observing, that a dreadful storm was now hanging over us; that conciliation was the only method of averting it; and that to recommend measures of conciliation to the government, was the sole object for which he had that evening taken the opportunity of addressing the House.

The Speaker then read the original address, and was proceeding to state, that in lieu of part of the original address, it had been proposed to insert an amendment, when

Mr. Tierney again rose, and said, that he had no wish to leave out any part of the original address: he would adopt the whole of it, and would content himself with proposing, that his own amendment should be received as an addition to it.

Lord Castlereagh rose. He began by observing, that there never was a crisis in which ministers felt a more awful responsibility than they did at the present moment; and never was a responsibility more awful than that which they were now obliged to take upon themselves in discharge of their duty to their king and to their country. Nothing but an imperious sense of the necessity of such a measure could have induced them to have called parliament together at this unusual season of the year; and yet such was the state of the country, that if they had longer delayed the convening of it, they would have compromised their duty to the Crown, and have placed at hazard the safety of the state. Now that it was assembled, he should express a hope, that not only in the debate of that night, but also in the many and arduous debates which were likely to succeed it in the course of the session, the House would maintain that equanimity of temper and candour of argument, which, at the same time that it was most essential to the preservation of its dignity, was also best calculated to effect those objects which every member of it must have in view. Whatever insinuations the right hon. gentleman opposite might throw out regarding the little confidence which the people were inclined to place in that House (and the right hon. gentleman's speech was more calculated to diminish than increase that confidence), he was certain that the House would still continue to act with that calm deliberation and that steady character which had always previously distinguished it; for if they did so act, if they met their difficulties at home with the same manly resolution with which they had met their difficulties abroad; if they persisted in their determination to deal out justice, even-handed justice, to all ranks and classes of his majesty's subjects, and were resolved, when they did interfere in the internal administration of justice, to interfere no more than their interference was absolutely necessary, he was positive that, instead of losing the confidence of the people, they would acquire new and indisputable claims to it, for the House had never yet pronounced a deliberate decision on any question, without being supported in it by the sober opinion of the public. Indeed, so far was the House under the control of public opinion, that no government which opposed it could long exist in this country, it was the basis upon which every government rested; and if the House pursued the same line of conduct which it had pursued before, he would undertake to promise that the same confidence would be now placed in it as had previously carried it and the country through every difficulty. The right hon. gentleman had confessed in the outset of his speech, that there was nothing in the address to the throne which called upon the House to pledge itself as to its future conduct; and in moving his amendment, had given a reason for doing so, which had on the first view of it created great satisfaction in his mind. He had said that the state of the country was so ambiguous, and the circumstances of the times so perilous, that it became every man to speak out frankly and boldly. From this declaration of the right hon. gentleman, he (Lord C.) had expected that the amendment would have contained some definite plan, some specific measures for the consideration of ministers; but, if he understood its meaning at all, nothing was so far from it as any specific or tangible proposition, with the exception of one parliamentary inquiry which was to be instituted into the transactions at Manchester, of the confession which the House was to make of past misconduct, and of the promises which it was to hold forth of future improvement. The right hon. gentleman had also declared a strong wish to examine into the present state of the country; and in stating his reasons why such examination should take place, had much undervalued the circumstances in which it was now situated. What those circumstances were he should refrain from explaining at present; and he trusted that the House would allow him to do so, especially as he should to-morrow place the mass of information on which the government intended to act in the hands of every one of its members in a printed form, and without submitting it to any previous committee for investigation. Besides, his explanation of the state of the country would be better understood if it were combined with the measures which it was intended to propose: those measures he should open to them on Friday; but before any one of them was discussed, the House ought to know the intentions of government, the bearing of which each of them had upon the other and upon the whole, and the dangers which threatened the whole of our system. As, therefore, the term was so short during which he wished the House to excuse him from speaking on the general state of the country, and as nothing specific had been proposed by either the right hon. gentleman or the noble lord opposite, he trusted that the House would extend to him the indulgence which he desired. With regard, however, to the transactions at Manchester, he had no objection to meet the right hon. gentleman at present : and here, he must say, that if his majesty's ministers had not expressed any sentiments of regret on this subject (and no humane or generous bosom could be without them), it was because nothing was more important than to maintain the confidence of the people in the due administration of justice, and nothing was more likely to destroy it than any such declaration of opinion : therefore, if in his answers to the questions of the right hon. gentleman he was compelled to say any thing which had that tendency, he trusted that the House would recollect that it was forced from him, and was not voluntarily tendered. In answer to the question, why Hunt was not arrested before the 16th of August, and why he was arrested on that day, he would state, what he believed to be the fact—that there was no determination or intention on the part of the magistracy to arrest him on the charge on which he was arrested, previously to the 16th of August—that the charge on which he was then arrested arose entirely out of the events of that day [loud cries of Hear from the opposition benches] that it originated from the military array, and the seditious banners which were then displayed ; and from the magistrates looking upon the meeting as of a treasonable nature, even if it did not amount to high treason itself. Therefore, if his assertion could have any effect with the right hon. gentleman he would believe the arrest of Hunt was not decided upon before that day. The right hon. gentleman had then asked another question—why a meeting, consisting of more than 40,000 people (and he had stated the numbers pretty correctly), among whom were many women and children, had been attacked by a military force after Hunt had been arrested and carried off without any opposition ? But that was a false view of the question : it never was the intention of the magistrates to disperse the meeting as it was dispersed, any more than it was their intention on the preceding day to have dispersed it at all. If they had then entertained any such opinion, they would have declared it an illegal meeting, as they had declared that which was convened before it. It was not asking the House to show too much charity to the Manchester magistrates when he asked them to believe this to be the case, especially as there was not the slightest scintilla of evidence to the contrary, except it were the heated evidence of those who had recently been tampering with the public feelings. If they had had any wish to commit an act of violence on the people, surely they would have carried it into execution on a meeting which it is acknowledged on all hands was illegal, and which they warned people not to attend, because it was illegal ; and would not have deferred it to another, when the meeting had become at least of a questionable nature. He put it to the charity of parliament to say, whether the deferring of it to the latter period would not, if they had entertained such intentions, have been most irrational. The truth was, that the magistrates did not determine upon dispersing the meeting until it had assumed a character of tumult and sedition. And he would protest on all occasions, and at all times, most loudly against the doctrine which had been advanced that night, that the arm of the law was to be unnerved by —[Here Mr. Tierney made some sign of dissent.] The right hon. gentleman most certainly had maintained such doctrines : he had asked why had Mr. Hunt, why had parson Harrison, been captured in the midst of the people ? As to Harrison, he had fled from Manchester ; and was taken by the officers in Smithfield, as it was their duty to take him, charged as he was with an offence, whensoever and wheresoever they saw him.—To return, however, to the subject from which he had digressed : as soon as the character of the meeting had declared itself, the magistrates put the warrants into the hands of the constables ; and it was not till they had declared their inability to execute them, that a military force was employed at all. Then comes the right hon. gentleman and asks, why employ the military, and above all, why employ the yeomanry, and not the troops of the line ? Why, formerly the only force which the right hon. gentleman would allow to be employed to defend the internal tranquillity of the country was his majesty's liege subjects armed in defence of their rights and properties. The circumstance only proved, that when his majesty's ministers blew hot, the right hon. gentleman blew cold ; and that all they did was wrong, even when they adopted the suggestions which he had himself proposed. This consideration, however, led him to another fact, to which it was requisite to call the attention of the House: the magistrates had nothing to do with any of this military array or armament, and were not responsible for it, except in so far as they legally were for giving the orders for its acting. It was colonel L'Estrange who selected the Manchester yeomanry for the service of the day, and who thought that he had done the most constitutional thing in the world in employing them. [Hear, hear!].—He would now proceed to state most distinctly, that the magistrates, if it was an illegal meeting and was carrying traitorous and seditious emblems, would have been guilty of a most flagrant dereliction of duty, if they had allowed that meeting to continue assembled one moment after the capture of Hunt. They, however, determined to disperse it, and to disperse it in the most mild and gentle and temperate manner. At the time the riot act was first read, it was read from the window of the house in which the magistrates were assembled: [loud cries of hear from all parts of the House:] it was suggested that this method of reading it was not such as was contemplated by the act: another magistrate was therefore sent into the crowd, and whilst attempting to read it there, was trampled under foot; they then sent a third magistrate to read it at the hustings, in order that no man might remain in ignorance of the fact of its being read. Why was it not read there? Why, because after the caption of Hunt was effected, those troops who effected it were violently assaulted by what the right hon. gentleman had called an unarmed mob. He begged leave to say, that he stated what he believed to be the fact; because, as the whole transaction of clearing the ground did not last five minutes, and as all the business was over in a quarter of an hour, some conflicting testimony might be expected. Still, however, he must repeat, that he believed what he stated to be correct. That, however, was not so much the question at present: the question was, whether the House of Commons was to erect itself into a tribunal to decide on this matter, and exercise the inquisitorial powers which it possessed by investigating it at their bar. Highly as he valued, and far as he would carry these inquisitorial powers, he was not for exercising them on the present occasion, as he did not think that the circumstances demanded it. To go on, however, with his narrative: this unarmed multitude, though the place had only the day before been cleared of all the stones that were calculated to hurt a human being, assailed the military with so many, that the next day two cart-loads were found upon the ground; so that it was clear that the parties had come with stones in their pockets: it was also evident that there were men among them armed with pistols; for from the house behind the hustings pistols were fired upon the troops. Notwithstanding all these circumstances which he had related, he was sorry to say that among several men of high character, for whom he entertained the most profound respect, there was scarcely any cruelty, however horrid—any atrocity, however aggravated, which had not, without the slightest truth or foundation, been attributed to the magistrates of Manchester [Hear, hear!].—Thus much for the character of the meeting. It was thus made evident that government had not taken any steps on the subject till they had convinced themselves of the law of the case, and the illegal character of the meeting which had been thus dispersed. He therefore repeated, that the Manchester magistrates had acted consistently with the law of the land, and with the best possible attention to the interests of the country. He would now apply himself to another important part of the inquiry: that was, whether the course of public justice, and of individual justice, would be promoted, or whether it would not rather be obstructed, by such an inquiry, as was recommended in the amendment of the right hon. gentleman. Before any such inquiry could be entered upon, they ought at least to know the state of the circumstances in which the transactions took place. Although he had no particular knowledge of the charge against Mr. Hunt, and although that charge might be intirely extrajudicial to this question, yet Mr. Hunt could, without any doubt, bring the magistrates before a jury of the country to explain their conduct. Let the House consider what they knew by public notoriety to be now in the hands of public law. In the first place, the House would allow upon the face of the question, that there was none which, prima facie, called so little as this for their interposition. How did the transactions which were to come before a court of justice stand before them at this moment. The magistrates of Manchester, and all who took that view of the question, were ready to go to trial; and who were they who postponed judicial inquiry? The injured, innocent individuals, who complained of the severity with which they had been treated ! All those individuals had put off their trial. Besides, had those persons availed themselves of all the legal means of redress, if injustice had been done to them ? They had indeed preferred bills against some individuals of the yeomanry cavalry ; and the fact of the illegality of the meeting had been found by the grand jury, who threw out those bills. As far as the yeomanry were concerned, the charge against them had been thus negatived by one grand jury of the country : for bills might have been found, and very properly found, against individuals of the yeomanry cavalry, and yet have decided nothing respecting the magistrates or the commanding officers. Because nothing was more clear than that outrages might have been committed beyond the necessity of the case, however proper the conduct of the magistrates and of the commanding officer might have been ; and that individuals might be guilty of murder, while the magistrates and commanding officers were entitled to praise. But while they had preferred bills against individuals, not a single indictment had they preferred against the magistrates or the commanding officer. The first thing that ought to have been done was, to have gone to the officer, as in the riots of 1768, when the officer was tried in the King's-bench and acquitted. Therefore he was entitled to say that the courts of law were open to those who complained, and that they had not availed themselves of them, in the mode which the law prescribed. He was aware of an objection often urged on this point. How, it was asked, could so many indigent individuals support the expenses of legal proceedings ? But, if five yeomen have been indicted, as many magistrates could have been indicted by the same means. If real public justice had been the object, the principals would have been first attacked. But if those who complained were indigent, they knew that in fact a subscription to a large amount, and under various descriptions of objects, had been made, and that there were in consequence ample means provided. Not less than 2,000*l.* had been subscribed ; and this sum surely afforded sufficient means for supporting the expenses of a legal investigation. They had heard, indeed, a most audacious libel upon a branch of the constitutional administration of justice—a libel belied by the whole tenour and chaacter of the administration of justice in this country ; and in no part of the country was that administration more pure than in Lancashire. They had heard a most audacious libel, that the grand jury at Lancaster had not done their duty, and had lent themselves to be the scape-goat for the violators of the law. But if it was so, if the magistrates could not be indicted for murder, yet if they were not justified in law, they could clearly be put upon their trial, by moving a criminal information against them, in the court of King's-bench, for their conduct. The circumstances of their conduct would be before the country as fully upon affidavits, as if they were to be tried for murder or felony. If, however, the court of King's-bench were so dead to a sense of justice and to the demands of the public, as to refuse a criminal information when it ought to be granted (and none could say that the court of King's-bench was dead or remiss in affording every facility to inquiry) into the conduct of magistrates ; yet he admitted that a case might arise, although the House was never, in the first instance, to interfere with the judicial administration, emanating in purity and enlightened by discretion as it was, when the House might properly inquire whether the courts below had done justice. But, to call upon all persons to disclose the evidence to the House which they were afterwards to give in a court of justice, was a proposition so monstrous, that, if delusion had not been carried to such an extent, and if the gentlemen opposite had not lent themselves to that delusion, it could never have been proposed. It was so monstrous a proposition, that if the right hon. gentleman was not surrounded by legal advisers who suffered him to propose to take from the courts of justice the whole body of a judicial question, in order to have it tried here, he could not have believed that they could lend themselves to it. The court of King's-bench, was not apt to overlook the misconduct of magistrates ; but if they were, and if they refused to interfere in this case, every man, even then, who had been removed off that ground by violence, or threats of violence, could bring a civil action for damages ; and the jury, in estimating the damages, would have the whole legal evidence laid before them. Therefore, he begged leave to conclude that there had been no denial of justice. Every effort had been made by industry, ingenuity, inflammation, and tumult. He did not mean to impute this conduct to the right hon. gentleman or to the gentlemen around him; but such efforts had been used to inflame and distemper the great mass of the people. What else could have been the object of the mass of evidence produced at a coroner's inquest respecting not what happened on the spot, but what every individual in the streets of Manchester knew. But there were now several proceedings in courts of justice upon this subject; there were motions with respect to the coroner's inquest, with respect to the conduct of magistrates in a district near Manchester; there were, in fact, many grave and serious questions now before the proper court. He thought that the consequences would be the worst that could be imagined, if they lent themselves to a precedent unknown to parliament. Did the right hon. gentleman consider, that if parliament could take such a step, it was not very decorous, whether it was proper or not, to come to such a conclusion on the address? Would it not have been more decorous if the right hon. gentleman had given notice of a motion to this effect, so that the ministers could have their minds instructed by the legal authorities? But he could not conceive, unless the whole body of the inquiry was to be taken from courts of justice, how the amendment could be supported. Was it contended that they could proceed with the inquiry proposed, while proceedings were actually pending in courts of justice upon the same subject? If parliament, in such circumstances came to a conclusion to punish the coroner or the magistrates, it would form an additional reason for levelling the throne and the constitution. This was the most barefaced trap ever heard of, which the radicals had laid for gentlemen on the other side. Any thing more fatal to public justice he could not conceive, unless they were to hang the magistrates of Manchester without trial or evidence. No step could be more effectually calculated to deprive parliament of all confidence on the part of the public. He therefore had no disposition to fall into the trap. The right hon. gentleman could not impute to his majesty's government a desire of standing between any individuals and public justice; if he did, he did them great injustice. But the right hon. gentleman had said, that they had prejudged the question. Now, he would submit, even to the right hon. gentleman whether, if magistrates were to be placed in a situation in which common justice would not be done to them, it would not be precisely by that course which the right hon. gentleman recommended. It was manifest that, in the temper of this country, the magistrates had not fared the better in consequence of the approbation of ministers. [Cheers and laughter from the Opposition.] He meant that there had been a previous disposition to treat the Manchester magistrates with party-feelings, which he never recollected to have been applied before to a public question. The opinion of government, if it was calculated to close the avenues of law, or defeat the ends of justice, had been improperly given. But the government was called upon to acknowledge the services of the yeomanry corps, who had come from a considerable distance in order to support the government. It had been said that a stipendiary magistracy had presided at Manchester. It was not so: they were the Lancashire magistrates, and of ten who were present, only one was a stipendiary magistrate: they and the yeomanry had come from a distance, and were entitled to thanks for their exertions. Why had not the right hon. gentleman objected to the expression of the approbation of government for the conduct of troops in the riots in Cambridgeshire, when lives had been lost in the Isle of Ely? The approbation of the government had also been expressed for the dispersion of the Blanketeer meeting. The same had been done for the conduct of the troops at Newcastle. It was the practice, whenever the troops were so engaged, that the government should give their opinion of their conduct; and this was the first time when the propriety of that practice had been called in question. In this case the government had not given their opinion till they were satisfied that the magistrates were right in law—till they were thoroughly satisfied that they had acted as became magistrates of this country. If his lordship should advise his majesty to approve of the conduct of a foreign minister, that would not stand against the indignation of parliament and the law of the land. But he did say, that though, as between man and man, no opinion should be given before a legal investigation took place, when disaffection, treason, and rebellion existed, the magistrates had a right to know the opinion of government; and base must that secretary of state be who would not communicate what was the honest and sincere opinion of their conduct. If that had not been done, the magistrates would have been placed in a most dangerous situation by ministers, and against their own conscientious judgment. They would have stood in the new and novel light of magistrates, of whose conduct the government of the country would give no opinion. If the opinion had been given under false reports, or under an imperfect and false view, his majesty's government were entitled, and they would owe it to themselves and to the country, to recall that opinion. But they had not given their opinion upon imperfect information. They had the report, first, of the chairman of the quarter sessions; next, of sir John Byng; then, of colonel L'Estrange; and last, of two gentlemen, one a magistrate, and the other chief constable of Manchester, who were sent up to explain the circumstances of the transaction. Upon this information they had given that opinion. He would not disguise, however, the fact that, after this, the ministers were again drawn to the consideration of the subject. There had not been, at first, that inflammation in the public mind, or it had not burst forth against the same objects against whom it was afterwards directed. For, notwithstanding all that had been said that evening by the right hon. gentleman, that the yeomanry alone were "the bloody dogs," it was, he understood, a moot point at first in the council at Manchester, whether the blame should be fixed upon them or on the regular troops. Though he should have had no hesitation to retract an opinion if he had been surprised into it, yet all subsequent inquiry had confirmed his first impressions, and if he had again to do it, he should have pronounced at least as strong an approbation.—He now came to one part of the subject of the debate, which was painful, not only because it was always painful to speak of a person who was absent, but on account of the estimable character of the person in question; he alluded to the removal of earl Fitzwilliam. The hon. gentlemen opposite would do him wrong, if they supposed that he intended to accuse the noble earl of a breach of public duty, or to detract from the high personal character which he had always borne; but he wished to speak on the subject without reserve, to the right hon. gentleman or to the House. His majesty's ministers had acted on a sense of their public duty—the noble earl, on a different sense of his duty; but, taking into view the state of the county with which earl Fitzwilliam was connected, the ministers were of opinion, that if they had not advised his removal, they must have sacrificed the administration of the laws. Lord Fitzwilliam, in imputing to the ministers the crime of countenancing such measures as those which he imputed to the Manchester magistrates, had shown such a degree of distrust of the measures of the government, and in that particular line of administration, with the execution of which he was connected, that it was impossible for the government, with any dignity, to continue him in his office. It was essential to the due administration of public affairs, and to the dignity of the Crown, that none of its servants should hold opinions of it derogatory to its honour and character. Lord Fitzwilliam, when he went to the meeting at York, virtually tendered the resignation of his office. It was certainly impossible for him to execute its duties with persons of whom he had such an opinion. He fully allowed, that it was not necessary that a lord lieutenant of a county should agree in all the opinions of the administration under which he acted; but if he could accuse an administration of being in that branch of the police in which he was concerned, so sanguinary as earl Fitzwilliam seemed to suppose them, the members of that administration would plead guilty to the charge, if they failed to advise their sovereign to remove him. Giving lord Fitzwilliam all credit for the correctness of his intentions, he should say, that never was any conduct less calculated to advance the interests of the Crown or the people, than the manner in which the meeting was called together in the county of York. The circumstances under which, at the time in question, it was assembled, were calculated to lay the laws at the feet of that body of men who were the greatest enemies of the constitution. He desired to know, whether it was true that the persons who called that meeting, preferred the concurrence of the Radicals to that of others who were (equally with themselves) friendly to the constitution, and who were willing to join with them on certain terms? This party said, "We, too, are willing to agree to petition for the calling of parliament, for we are willing to leave to the discretion of parliament the question of inquiry into the business at Manchester; but on this condition, that you recognize the real state of the country, and profess unshaken attachment to the constitution." He did not mean to assert that the persons who refused these offers, and called the Yorkshire meeting, were not friends to the constitution; but (and he would show by-and-by how cautious gentlemen should be of getting into bad company) they preferred a coalition with the Radicals. What was the consequence? At a meeting of 20,000 persons, which he might call a traitorous meeting at the town of Birmingham, a meeting held with the usual apparatus of banners, &c., lord Fitzwilliam was exhibited in a new and singular combination as a Yorkshire reformer. Who had ever heard lord Fitzwilliam vote for reform? Yet on one of the banners of the assemblage was the inscription, "Lord Fitzwilliam and the Yorkshire reformers." But, indeed, lord Fitzwilliam did not disguise his sentiments, for at the end of the day's business at York, with a view of all the circumstances of the meeting, he proposed the thanks to the sheriff for assembling it. Never was the king's commission so degraded as when this nobleman, with Mr. Wooller on the hustings near him, offered his thanks to the meeting for being allowed to address them in connection with the radicals. It was the first county meeting which had been disgraced with all those emblems of flags and drums which had characterised assemblies of a different description. It was only, he understood, through the favour of the fugleman of the radicals, that any one had a chance of obtaining a hearing, and his hon. friend (Mr. Stuart Wortley) was, he believed, in the condition of obtaining an audience. He did not wish to mince the matter. The noble lord had on this occasion, by his conduct, and the resolutions to which he gave his sanction, disclosed opinions which put an end entirely to that confidence without which it was impossible, in offices connected with the preservation of the peace, to carry on the government. An account of this meeting had been published by Wooller in the "Black Dwarf," and extensively circulated in the north of England. The writer first quoted from what purported to be a correct report of the speeches delivered, and then introduced his own remarks.

Thus his grace the duke of Norfolk was described as having said, that "at Manchester the swords of the military had been opposed to the government of the law." Upon this, the reformers were told, that in the case of their grievances not being redressed, the noble duke stood pledged to follow the example of his ancestor at Runnymede, and defend in arms the liberties of his country. The account went on to state, that Mr. Lawrence Dundas had said, "that the question now was, whether their dearest rights should be maintained or they should voluntarily become the slaves of a military despotism; and that what had been gained by the blood of their forefathers must not be lost by their cowardice." Mr. Fawkes was represented to have expressed himself to this effect—"that the louder they complained, the sharper did their enemies make their swords, and that he would rather perish in the temple of liberty than see it converted into a barrack." To this was added a quotation from Cowper, and the justness of resistance by force, when petitions were rejected, was declared to be the creed of Cowper, of Mr. Fawkes, and of every reformer. Mr. Ramsden was reported to have said, that there never had been such an outrage committed on the people, as on the 16th of August, and that such outrages had in former times been the means of depriving monarchs of their thrones. To lord Milton was ascribed the observation, that the people had the power of controlling their government, and the inference which the writer drew from this observation was, that the noble lord was bound to make that power effectual by putting himself at the head of those who were disposed to exercise it. It was thus that men of high station and character sometimes exposed their conduct and sentiments to misrepresentation, and subjected themselves to the belief of acting for other than their real purposes. The necessity of upholding the empire of the laws, and the important charge of securing the public peace, left his majesty's ministers no alternative, and they were compelled to adopt what had been described as a harsh and improper measure. It was impossible that the noble earl, after the sentiments he had avowed, could continue to act confidentially with his majesty's government. He trusted that he had now adverted to all the points of this subject, so as to answer satisfactorily the objections of the right hon. gentleman. With regard to the general state of the country, he believed it to be critical in every point of view. He was far indeed from thinking that all who attended at these popular meetings, belonged to the number of the disaffected, or entertained sentiments in unison with those publicly professed. He should regret extremely to despair of the mass of the population; and there was, he apprehended, no ground for such a feeling. The best hopes might be entertained from the adoption of such measures as should protect them against the arts employed to delude them. He had lived long enough in Ireland, during a disastrous period of its history, to know how far delusion might be carried by popular agitators; and he had seen those who had been so deluded afterwards become faithful subjects, and zealous supporters of the laws. He had also the proud conviction that a great portion of this country was utterly exempt from the taint, and was animated by a spirit of attachment and zeal for the constitution, that required only the fostering assistance of parliament to render it effectual for our defence. But, at the same time, it was not to be concealed that a deliberate conspiracy did exist for overturning the government, and that there prevailed in many places a disposition to second this design. In such circumstances it would be impossible without the assistance of parliament, that any administration should answer for the public safety. Without it there could be no security against those scenes of bloodshed and confusion by which other countries had been desolated. On the other hand, by pursuing a course of policy adapted to our present exigencies, and firmly meeting the danger which threatened us, we might fairly expect to find ourselves, at no distant period, in a situation of perfect domestic tranquillity. The constitution, borne triumphant through the perils to which it was now exposed, might then continue to extend its blessings to the latest posterity. With all these views, and more especially with reference to the great and fundamental principles of justice, which would be compromised by that House taking into its own hands the subject matter of a judicial inquiry before other tribunals, he felt it his duty to support the original address.

Mr. Boote Wilbraham said, that as a member of the grand jury whose conduct had been impugned, and being connected with the county of Lancaster, he was anxious to state the views by which the magistrates had been directed, and was sure that, whenever an inquiry should take place, they would come out of it not only with the credit of having acted properly, but with the general admission that they would not have discharged their duty had they acted otherwise. There would be many future opportunities of entering fully into these explanations. He was at present merely desirous of removing any unfavourable impression that might be entertained previous to those explanations being made. It had been asked, why the magistrates had not attempted, long since, to offer some defence to the charges which had been so generally brought against them. To this he replied, that they had not been called on in a manner that afforded them a fit occasion for so doing. Were they to enter into a controversy with writers in public journals, and sit down to refute the calumnies that had been daily circulated against them? Had they appeared at any public meeting, did any man believe that they would have been able to procure for themselves a patient or dispassionate hearing? The magistrates would hereafter show, that they had proceeded on a just conviction that the meeting of the 16th of August was illegal. The ostensible object was undoubtedly reform; but the real object, at least as far as the minds of the lower orders were affected, was ascertained to have been plunder, and the destruction of property. There were depositions which clearly manifested this fact. Their purpose, indeed, had been openly declared; threats had been used, and many of the most respectable inhabitants had been intimidated. It was also ascertained, that those who threw out these menaces, were not distressed or unemployed persons, but spinners and others who were by no means in want. Application was made to the magistrates for protection, on the part of twenty or thirty individuals, who considered themselves and their property in danger. These were some of the most considerable inhabitants of Manchester, who had distinguished themselves by their energy and exertion on former occasions in preserving the public peace. It was not denied that the meeting assembled in large bodies, or that they marched in military array. When they arrived at the hustings, they erected their standards; and as they filed off, left a guard six deep to surround and defend them. As they marched through the streets, many were heard to exclaim, that a new order of things was at hand. Were the magistrates under such circumstances to remain silent and inactive? To what reproaches would they have subjected themselves, had they not taken precautions against the mischief that was likely to arise! Many, perhaps, recollected—he was old enough for one—the riots of 1780, when the lord mayor was prosecuted, whether civilly or criminally he forgot, for neglecting to take such measures as the occasion called for. The constables in this instance declared their inability to execute their office, and this might readily be believed when it was considered that there were but 300 in a crowd amounting to 50,000. The assistance of the military power was then granted; it advanced, accompanied by the peace-officers on foot, nor was a blow struck till they were assailed with stones, brick-bats, and other missiles, [brought to the spot for that express purpose. The ground had the day before been cleared of all such substances. One man was knocked off his horse, and his companions apprehended for a moment that he was killed. There was, in fact, more forbearance displayed by the yeomanry than could have been under all the circumstances expected. They at length attacked the multitude in order to effect their dispersion. He did not know with which side of their swords they struck the people; but it was a subject of admiration to many who witnessed the scene, that so large a multitude should be dispersed with so few injuries. He had in his possession authentic returns from the infirmary, by which it appeared that the whole number wounded or hurt was twenty-six. Some of these had received their hurts from being thrown down in the confusion. He did not mean to deny that there might have been some other instances of bodily harm, or that individuals amongst the yeomanry might not have given too great a loose to their resentments. Every exertion, however, had been made to restrain them, and to put a stop to such proceedings. The cause of the yeomanry being employed in this service, was quite accidental, the regulars happening to have taken a wrong route, and arrived last upon the ground. They came, however, early enough to act upon the orders they had received; and in the execution of this duty, it became very difficult to say whether the blows received were inflicted by them or by the yeomanry. Still, he believed, that neither had any intention to commit deliberate or unnecessary wrong. Many exaggerated statements had gone abroad upon this subject, which tended very considerably to increase the general irritation. It had been asserted by an hon. member of that House at a public meeting in Norfolk, that a woman had been attacked and severely cut, and that she and others would have shared a worse fate, but for the interposition of a gallant officer. This statement continued in circulation for a fortnight, when there appeared a letter from the gallant officer, major Cochrane, denying the truth of the matter, and adding that no such circumstance had occurred: As to the bills which were thrown out, he should say, that he happened not to have taken any part in them, and he had done so, on the ground that an objection had been made to him at first as being a near relative of one of the magistrates whose conduct was attacked. This, however, he could state with the most perfect conviction, that never were bills found where a grand jury had acted with more strict impartiality.

Mr. Coke observed, that it was he who had made the statement respecting the alleged attack on the woman, in which major Cochrane was said to have interfered. He had found afterwards that the whole was a mistake, and he would most willingly have given the contradiction to it, if it had not been made by major Cochrane.

Lord Milton had not intended to take any share in the present discussion, and was only induced to alter his intention, by having heard that something had been said during his absence from the House, respecting a communication between himself and those who acted with him at the York meeting, and some of those gentlemen who had signed the declaration in that county. It had been said, as he was informed, that the gentlemen who signed the requisition, had, in their communication with those who signed the declaration, refused an offer made, which would unite all parties. The circumstances of that case he would state to the House, and he appealed to his hon. friend opposite (Mr. Stuart Wortley) for his recollection of the transaction. On his application to him, his hon. friend's words were to this effect: "If you and your friends agree to add the declaration to your resolutions, I will endeavour to persuade my friends to adopt those resolutions, and I think they will adopt them." To this he (lord Milton) objected, conceiving it impossible that such an agreement could well be made. How could they define and distinguish in the case they wished to state? For the House would perceive that those declarations of loyalty on one side seemed to imply disloyalty on the other. The proposition was one, which, under all the circumstances, they could not agree to; yet there was no indisposition to act with them. Indeed, in the declaration, which had been signed, not by the hon. gentleman, but by a noble lord (Lascelles), there was an admission of the necessity of inquiry.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, that after the appeal which had been made to him by his noble friend, he felt it his duty to offer a few observations. He admitted that he had offered to him, that if they (the requisitionists) would agree to the declaration, he would endeavour to persuade his friends to assent to the resolutions. In this he had done nothing more than merely say, he would endeavour to persuade them, which was all he could promise. This was done at Wakefield; and on the next day, to prevent any misapprehension, he put the proposition down in writing. He asked him in effect—Will you throw off the support of those who have thus agreed to this offer? Will you, without forfeiting any principle which you have ever avowed, throw us off, and only support those who have really no other object than the injury of the constitution? With respect to the address which had been moved, he was glad to perceive that there was no opposition to it. The object of the right hon. gentleman seemed to be, to assent to this address, on the ground that an inquiry should take place into the proceedings at Manchester. Now, he had no objection to inquiry; but he conceived that of all the places where it could take place, the bar of that House would be the worst. He did not, and would not shrink from the avowal of this opinion; and he believed that but for the shuffling of some of those persons who were concerned in the transactions, an inquiry would have taken place long ago. He had seen inquiries take place at the bar, and he had not witnessed one in which the parties had not covered themselves with disgrace. [Cries of "No, no."] He alluded not to the House, but to the parties examined. Here was a court, consisting of 658 judges, all of them examining and deciding upon, but few of them agreeing as to the same particular points. In a court of law there were certain rules by which to determine, and certain practices to observe; but in this House the members were under no such restraint, and each followed that line which he conceived best. Could an inquiry so conducted be considered as the best mode of eliciting truth? Cases had occurred of alleged violence on the part of some of the authorities, where applications had not been sought in the House of Commons. The case of the dispersion of the meeting at Coventry was one in point. Distress there did exist, but it was not from the really distressed that the loudest complaints were heard; and here he conceived the right hon. mover of the amendment was mistaken in his view of the case. They who were loudest in their cry were those who had other objects in view besides a relief to the country. It was now he would agree with the right hon. gentleman, time to speak out, and every honest man ought to declare his opinion. And as his opinion, he would state, that the spirit which was abroad, and which already so much disturbed the country, was a republican spirit—one which sought the overthrow of the constitution, and the destruction of all property. There were, he would admit, many, and among them some of those whom he loved best, who conceived that a moderate reform was necessary; but they sought not that reform by acts of violence and were to be distinguished from those who, under the mask of reform, sought only the destruction of property. He would refer the House to the consideration of the resolutions of a meeting which took place in Halifax, he believed in October last, where the property of the earl Fitzwilliam, was in so many words pointed at, as if for partition. He would not deny the clear right of the people to petition the crown or the parliament, but he maintained that those itinerant preachers of sedition who went about inflaming the lower orders ought to be put down. Such persons as Wooler or Hunt might be tempted to their present courses by avarice or ambition, but they should be put down. The hon. member next adverted to the two-penny publications which were circulated so widely, and observed, that they ought to be repressed. He would not say that they ought to pay a tax equal to newspapers, but they ought to pay some tax, and he would most willingly assent to any measure of that kind. He agreed with the noble marquis as to the necessity of some measure by which the poorer classes would be relieved from their present burthens, and for many of those burthens a fair tax on property should, he thought be substituted. He had conversed on this subject with men of all parties and they almost all seemed to be of opinion that such a tax would be the best under the present circumstances.

Sir James Mackintosh said, that among the many extraordinary novelties which he had heard that night, there were none which gave him more surprise than part of the speech of the hon. member who had just concluded. That hon. gentleman had stated, that no inquiry which he had seen conducted at the bar of that House had ever ended but with disgrace; that one of the greatest functions of an important branch of the legislature could not be exercised but with disgrace.

Mr. Stuart Wortley here observed, that his remarks referred not to the House but to the party.

Sir J. Mackintosh continued—The explanation of the hon. gentleman did not alter the view which he had taken of this extraordinary assertion. What could the hon. gentleman have meant but that the disgrace would attach to the House? The very assertion itself was used to show that no inquiry ought to take place in the House. And why? Because, forsooth, no inquiry had been conducted by that House without disgrace. What was it whether the disgrace of an inquiry fell upon A, B, or C; it was still, according to the argument of the hon. gentleman a disgrace, caused by an inquiry at the bar of the House. Now, he asserted, without fear of contradiction, that a more gross attack on the constitution was not contained in any of those seditious libels which had been alluded to, and in disgust for which he fully participated. What did it amount to? Why to this—that the House could not engage in one of its most important functions, that of inquiry, without disgracing itself or the object of the inquiry. He could not conceive a more seditious libel than was contained in this elaborate argument; or, he should rather say, this animated invective on the inquisitorial powers of the House of Commons. But this was not the only novelty in the hon. gentleman's speech. There were some others equally curious. The hon. gentleman had admitted at York the necessity of the very inquiry which he now deprecated as a disgrace to the House. He had agreed to a declaration which, as it were, pledged the parties signing it to inquiry, and upon that very ground he might call upon the hon. member for his vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. Stuart Wortley here interrupted the learned gentleman and said, that the declaration was drawn up in such a way as not to pledge the persons signing it to a particular vote for inquiry.

—Sir J. Mackintosh resumed.—He protested that every thing of judicial knowledge which he possessed was still more confounded by the explanation of the hon. gentleman. It was hardly possible to imagine any thing more strange than this conduct of the hon. gentleman. He, according to his own admission, stated, that he seemed to agree in York to a principle which he at the same time intended to defeat in London. Did he mean at that time that the inquiry to which he should give his assent should be a judicial one? If he did, was it that the House of Commons should prosecute the inquiry in a court of law? a proposition which, when considered as made at a county meeting, was almost too absurd to be supposed to have existed in the mind of any. But, if the hon. gentleman had meant by inquiry an investigation by parliament, that was clear and intelligible. Yet, how did he now strive to get rid of it? It had been objected to his right hon. friend that he was not decisive in his amendment. He (sir J. Mackintosh) conceived him decisive and explicit. His right hon. friend was at all times so clear in his reasoning, that it was impossible to mistake him. He denied also that the amendment or the observations which accompanied it, were of a vague character. They spoke a disposition to conciliate, and by that conciliation to render coercive measures unnecessary. If the noble lord (Castlereagh) was not satisfied with the observations of his right hon. friend, would he attend to those of the noble marquis? He trusted that the manly, humane, and feeling speech of that noble lord—a speech which was worthy of his high rank and extraction—would not pass without effect. To the principles there laid down he fully subscribed. To institute inquiry into real or imaginary grievances, would do more good than all the coercive measures which it would be in the power of the House to enact. He conceived that coercive measures would be productive, not of quietness, but of increased discontent. The history of the world in ancient and modern times, particularly in the latter, gave ample ground for a doubt of the policy of coercive measures. To those who weighed recent events in this and other countries, that doubt must appear extremely natural. Coercion produced that kind of feeling which often rendered its increase necessary; and thus a system of action and counteraction was kept up, till it ended at last, through the bloody road of anarchy, in absolute despotism. He did not mean to say that this consideration should render statesmen inactive in times of popular ferment, but it should render them cautious in the adoption of measures by which that ferment should be allayed, and mindful of the fatal consequences which might result from an overstrained exercise of power. There was nothing so dangerous in a free state as to close the door against inquiry into any real or alleged grievance. With regard to the meeting of the 16th of August, he would not venture now to declare whether it was or was not an unlawful assembly: he should confine the few observations he had to make to the consideration of four points; and he should endeavour to show, first, that there was sufficient cause for inquiry; secondly, that no effective inquiry had yet been instituted in any of the courts of justice; thirdly, that there was one most important part of these melancholy transactions, which could not undergo an investigation in a court of law; and fourthly, that upon principle and uniform practice, this and the other House of parliament had inquired into such matters. As to the first point, the very existence of contradictory statements on the one hand and on the other, was a sufficient justification of the proceeding, especially as they were connected with some facts which were not denied by either party. It was, he believed, an undisputed fact, that a meeting was convened at Manchester, for the purpose of considering a public grievance, and that the assembly, not having previously broken the peace by proceeding to any violent acts, was dispersed by an armed force, acting under the orders of the magistrates, and that this dispersion was attended with violence and bloodshed. That an inquiry was requisite few could doubt; and the only question was, in what manner that investigation should be made. With respect to the second point, that no effective proceedings had yet been instituted in any court of law, he was fully sensible; there were two prosecutions now pending, relative to this affair; the one an indictment against a man of the name of Owen, for perjury, and the other against Mr. Hunt and his associates for a conspiracy to subvert the laws and constitution by force and terror; but he wished to impress upon the House, that neither of these proceedings had any relation to the important point to be considered—the mode of executing the warrant, and of dispersing the meeting. The prosecution against Owen was for a matter wholly distinct from these two considerations; and with respect to the case in which Mr. Hunt was concerned, supposing that a verdict of acquittal should be found, what proof could it be that the magistrates had been guilty of improper conduct? In the event of a conviction, the same observation would apply, because Mr. Hunt and his associates might be guilty of the crime of conspiracy, and yet the magistrates might have committed a great impropriety in the exercise of their discretionary functions. It would be recollected, that there had been two warrants against Mr. Hunt, under the first of which he had been committed on the 16th of August as the ringleader of an unlawful assembly, and was bound over to keep the peace until the period of trial should arrive. This warrant did not allude to any previous conduct, but confined itself entirely to his behaviour at the meeting. It did not contain any accusation of conspiring to subvert the government; the charge was simply that he had been present at an unlawful assembly. On the 20th August he was again brought up, and was then informed by Mr. Norris, the presiding magistrate, that there was further evidence against him, and that he would be remanded for high treason. On the 27th, a fresh warrant was made out, and Mr. Hunt was committed for a conspiracy to subvert the constitution. It followed, therefore necessarily, that the evidence intended to be produced was believed subsequently to the commitment under the first warrant. Upon the best consideration, therefore, which he could give to the subject, he could not conceive any more fair or equitable mode of investigation than a parliamentary inquiry. For his part he could not understand how these legal proceedings could be conceived for a moment at all to involve the real merits of the case. The noble lord opposite had, in the course of his speech cited names of very high rank and respectability; and had hinted at indictments which might be instituted against the yeomanry. But even if such a prosecution were commenced, how would that affect this question? The conviction or acquittal of the yeomen would not decide the question as to the propriety or impropriety of the conduct of the magistrates. How, then, did the question stand with respect to these magistrates? They had an undoubted jurisdiction, and for the improper exercise of their power, they could not be rendered amenable in a court of law, without a proof of malice. If it appeared that they had behaved more rashly in this affair than usual, or had been overheated by passion, this was no crime, and could not be punished by a court of law; for he never yet heard of a criminal information filed against a magistrate for want of calmness, moderation, or forbearance in the exercise of his magisterial powers. It never could become a question in a court of law, whether a magistrate having before his eyes between 40 and 50,000 people, a great portion of whom were women and children, and curious, idle, and innocent spectators, exercised his discretion properly, by directing the execution of a warrant, the consequences of which might naturally have been foreseen. It was a fact which all admitted, that these magistrates saw the whole of the transaction, the execution of the warrant, and knew the irritable disposition of the people. Were not, then, all these circumstances so many reasons for further deliberation before the warrant was executed? It had been said, he knew not with what truth, that one of the magistrates had been impeded, and that another had been knocked down. Allowing for a moment that this were the case, was this a sufficient justification of their conduct? Was this an answer to all the accusations brought against them? Were they on this account to be allowed to do that in five minutes which the Riot act required to be done at the expiration of an hour? It was indeed said, that there might be danger in delay; but who would be so bold as to venture to assert that the danger was so great that the time required by the act could not be allowed to elapse? Could the people, surrounded as they were on every side with troops, have created any disturbance? He really should be almost inclined to think that the attack was made more in the wantonness of triumphant strength than in consequence of the existence of any real danger. With these reflections upon his mind, he could not help contrasting the conduct of the Manchester magistrates, with that of the magistrates of Glasgow and Paisley. Those gentlemen had conducted themselves with a most praiseworthy forbearance: they had shown true courage and sound discretion, and had permitted every thing short of actual violence, rather than spill the blood of their fellow-countrymen. This was the firm, manly and intrepid conduct of British magistrates, and it was not until the 16th of August that this temperate conduct and praiseworthy forbearance was departed from, and a scene of violence, attended with acts of bloodshed, commenced. With respect to the number who were wounded on this memorable occasion, an hon. gentleman opposite had stated the whole amount to be twenty-six, according to the list of the infirmary. In making this statement the hon. gentleman should have recollected that this return could not possibly include the whole number of wounded, as it must have embraced a circuit of from ten to fifteen miles round Manchester. With respect to this point he had kept his understanding in suspense, being well aware, that in such cases as these, exaggeration might inevitably be expected. In this way of viewing the subject, he found great consolation, as it stripped the case of many points which would otherwise tend to embarrass it. The noble lord opposite, to his utter astonishment, had asserted, that the proposal for a parliamentary investigation was a perfectly novel proceeding. This was to him, of all the other statements made by the noble lord, the most extraordinary, because he was satisfied in his own mind, and he hoped also to convince the House, that it was almost the uniform practice of both Houses of Parliament to investigate such subjects as the one now presented for consideration. On this point he had collected some precedents which he would shortly cite with the leave of the House. The first was one of rather a singular nature, inasmuch as it applied to the magistrates of the county of Lancaster. That county had been remarkable for disaffection of various and opposite kinds; it was at present supposed to be hostile to the constitution; and it was formerly charged with entertaining too strong an attachment to the exiled royal family. In 1704, the House of Lords addressed her majesty for a copy of the commission of peace. A list of the names of the magistrates of the county was furnished; and from this list several names were struck out. This was done after a strict inquiry had been instituted; and he saw no sound reason why that course should not in the present instance be followed. The next instance of this nature was in the case of the execution of Porteous, in 1737. An inquiry was instituted, and the result was, that a bill of pains and penalties was passed. The House had not yet forgotten what was the mode of proceeding in 1794, when the secret committee sat on the state of the nation. Did not their reports tend to influence the judge, the jury, and the public, on the subsequent trials for high treason, and was not the same evidence produced on the trial as was made public from the labours of the committee? Of this he did not complain, because it was the regular constitutional course; but he might, if it were necessary, allude to many instances of a similar nature, all having the same tendency to influence the public mind. It was also well known to be the common practice of that House to address his majesty for the purpose of obtaining the prosecution of an individual: and it was in the knowledge of honourable members that the attorney-general was frequently instructed to prosecute for bribery and other offences. This was the common practice; but could this be said to be prejudging? No, it was an accusation only which the House had full power to make. If this was prejudging, a grand jury might be said to prejudge in finding their bill, or the counsel for the prosecution in stating the case to the jury. This was a view of the subject, the fallacy of which a very little reflection would readily demonstrate. The noble lord had told the House, that such a demand as was now made was novel; but would the noble lord state any instance since the revolution, where a meeting, legally and peaceably assembled, was dispersed by a military force? He did not ask this as a matter of law but as a matter of fact. The answer must be obvious. Was it not, then, he would ask, worth while to consider, that when those hasty thanks were communicated to the magistrates, a most dangerous example was set to all the other magistrates of the country; and was not the praise of such conduct as he had described, a tacit censure upon the excellent magistrates of Glasgow and Paisley? In the cases where the latter had acted, there had been such a violation of the law on the part of the populace, as would have justified an immediate resort to severe measures, and have raised every hand against them. Yet they were treated with lenity; and what was the consequence? No serious injury ensued. The noble lord had said that ministers had not disgraced earl Fitzwilliam. True, they could not. He had also added, that the conduct pursued towards him did not throw an additional lustre on his popularity. He (sir J. Macintosh) believed it did. But then it should be asked, was such the intention of the noble lord and his colleagues? Did they mean to honour, or to debase him? For his part, the dismissal of earl Fitzwilliam appeared to him to be as gross an outrage on honour and virtue, on rank and fortune, as had ever disgraced any administration in this country in modern times. It was a mark of that kind of exclusive and proscriptive policy, which ministers seemed determined to adopt towards all those who should presume to hold an opinion of their own. Lord Fitzwilliam had not fawned upon the government in the days of its power, but he stood by it in the time of danger. He was one of those who were described by his great friend (Mr. Burke), who said, that the hour of danger was the time to distinguish the true friends of the government from the time-serving and slippery sycophants of the court. The noble lord had called in new evidence against earl Fitzwilliam. He had had recourse to the evidence of Wooller; as if he did not consider his own sufficient. It was rather surprising that the noble lord had not had recourse to the editor of the "Cap of Liberty," the "Medusa," and other journals equally respectable. They might have borne equal testimony against the noble earl; but the fact of the noble lord having adopted this new ally in his war against earl Fitzwilliam, proved, that in the strict and honourable discharge of his duty, the noble earl had not lent himself to either the court or the levellers; but had condemned the excesses of both, and thereby lost the favour of each. The hon. and learned gentleman then observed, shortly upon the general satisfaction with which the vote of that evening would be received, if it embraced the amendment of his right hon. friend. The question, he said, was one of the most important which had ever occupied the attention of the House. If the inquiry should be gone into, it would rub out as foul a blot and black a stain as ever disgraced the history of this country. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded amidst considerable cheering.

Mr. Plunkett* commenced by observing, that the question before the House had not been very fairly treated. Much had been introduced which did not necessarily connect itself with the subject, and which had a tendency to divert the attention of the House from the deeply important matters which pressed for their consideration. There had been some address in making the case of lord Fitzwilliam so principal a topic. As a ground of argument, applicable to the present question, it could not be justly resorted to by any person who did not go the length of asserting, that the dismissal of that nobleman would warrant parliament in a refusal to consider, or to make provision against, the dangers with which the country was threatened, and which were announced in the speech from the throne. No person, on any side of the House, had laid down so extreme a position; on the contrary, the amendment of his right hon. friend admitted the danger, and the necessity of meeting it by suitable provisions. He would therefore, in his view of the subject, relieve himself from a discussion which he could not approach without feelings of great embarrassment. His habitual reverence for that distinguished nobleman was such, that he could scarcely hope to bring his mind, fairly and impartially, to any investigation which affected him. He considered his character as uniting every thing noble and generous in freedom, with every thing which could exalt or dignify the aristocracy of the country; and he therefore took leave to dismiss this subject as one not connected with the debate; and, in doing so, he felt much satisfaction in the statement of the noble lord (Castlereagh) that the dismissal of earl Fitzwilliam was founded, not on any personal imputation, but on a difference of opinion with his majesty's government, on points involving the exercise of his duties as lord lieutenant of the West Riding.

Again, he thought the subject had, in another respect, not been very fairly treated by his right hon. friend, or by his hon. and learned friend who immediately preceded him. It was stated, in the speech from the throne, that a revolutionary spirit was at work in the country, which threatened its safety and its existence; and the truth of this statement was not denied, but indeed admitted, by the amendment: Was it then perfectly fair to call the attention of the House from the consideration of this public danger, and its remedies,—from the machinations and arts of those who were preparing measures for the subversion of the state, and the overthrow of every constituted authority,—to the plans and objects of that portion of the peaceful and loyal subjects of this country, who respected the law and constitution, and were desirous of improving them? This latter description of persons were entitled to the most attentive and respectful consideration. However he might differ from them, on the subject of parliamentary reform, he considered their objects as honest, and their means of effecting them as constitutional. Whenever, at any proper time, and in any proper form, their claims should be brought before parliament, they should be listened to with attention, and with respect. Their proposals, if reasonable, should be yielded to; if not so, should be met by fair argument and calm discussion: and the result, in either event, would be satisfactory and conciliating. The people of England were a reasoning and reasonable people: but was it fair, either to them or to the country, to confound their cause, and their objects, with the persons whom we now were called upon to deal with, whose undisguised aim was to pull down the entire fabric of our constitution, and to effect a revolution by force? Against this immediate and overwhelming danger it was the first duty of parliament to provide. And to turn aside from the discharge of this urgent and paramount duty, to the discussion of subjects of inferior importance, and of distinct consideration, would be an abandonment of the interests of the country. When he saw a revolutionary project ripe for execution,—when he saw that sedition and blasphemy were the instruments by which it worked, and that open force was to be employed for its accomplishment,—he felt it to be trifling with the duties of the House, and with the safety of the country, to turn our view to any other object, until the terrors which hang over our existing establishments were first dispelled.

No person, he was happy to see, denied the existence of these dangers; but he thought there was some tendency to underrate their extent, and to undervalue their consequence. It was said, that the public mind in general was sound: he trusted and firmly believed it was so. He was convinced that the strength and spirit of the loyal subjects were sufficient to put down the enemies of law and of order; he therefore was apprehensive, not of revolution, but of the attempt at revolution, which he believed in his conscience would be made, if not prevented by the vigilance and energy of parliament: and what he contemplated with the deepest alarm was, the miseries which such an attempt, in its progress to certain and necessary failure, must produce. If this mischief should once burst forth, he anticipated a series of horrors which must shake the safety and happiness of this country to its foundations. The very circumstances which must ensure the ultimate failure of the enterprise aggravated its dangers. Revolution, always calamitous, yet, when pursued for some definite purpose, conducted by abilities, tempered by the admixture of rank and of property, may be effected, as it had before been in this country, without any incurable shock being given to the safety of persons or of property. But here was a revolution to be achieved by letting loose the physical force of the community against its constituted authorities; a revolution for the sake of revolution, to take away the property of the rich, and to distribute it among the rabble; and this, too, no ordinary rabble, but one previously debauched by the unremitting dissemination of blasphemous libels, and freed from the restraints of moral or religious feeling. On this subject he felt sufficient confidence at once to express his opinion, without waiting for any of those documents which the noble lord proposed to lay before the House. There were facts of public notoriety, known and seen by every man who did not choose to shut his eyes. Had not meetings been proposed for the purpose of assuming the functions which belonged only to the sovereign power of the state—meetings, which if they had been actually held, would have been acts of high treason? When it was found that matters were not sufficiently ripe for this undisguised act of public rebellion, had not the same masses of the populace been again convened, under the direction of the same leaders, under the pretext of seeking Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments,—their very pretexts such as the constitution could not survive, if they were effectuated, but their real object being to overawe the constituted authorities by the display of their numerical strength, and to prepare for direct, immediate, forcible revolution? Had we not seen the same itinerant mountebank, who set their powers in motion, publicly assisting at the orgies of the blasphemous wretch lately convicted? and could we doubt that treason was the object, and that blasphemy and sedition were the means? When he saw these fiends in human shape endeavouring to rob their unhappy victims of all their consolations here, and of all their hopes hereafter,—when he saw them with their levers placed under the great pillars of social order, and heaving the constitution from its foundation, he was rejoiced to see parliament assembled. Their first duty was to convince these enemies of God and man, that within the walls of parliament they could find no countenance; and through the organ of parliament to let them know, that nothing awaited them but indignant resistance from the great body of the people.

They were bound to assure the throne of their loyal and cheerful co-operation for these purposes; and on this ground alone the amendment was objectionable, even if the measure suggested by it were in itself desirable; inasmuch as by tacking it to the address, and not proposing it as a separate resolution, it declared the measure of inquiry so essential, as to preclude all exertions for the safety of the state, until that inquiry should be disposed of. But, waving this objection, he should proceed to consider it on its own merits.

It was said, then, that the dispersion of the meeting at Manchester, of the 16th of August, called for parliamentary inquiry;—and here he begged leave to remind the House, that parliamentary inquiry, though certainly a proceeding recognized by our constitution, was, still, not the ordinary mode of investigating, either the conduct of magistrates in the execution of the laws, or the conduct of those who were the objects of the execution of those laws. A case, therefore, for inquiry, was to be made out by those who called for it. What, then, was the inquiry proposed? Was it into the conduct of government, for thanking the magistrates? Such a proceeding, he owned, appeared to him most premature and uncalled-for. If the magistrates had issued orders for dispersing the king's subjects peaceably and legally assembled;—if, in consequence of such orders, the blood of innocent and unoffending persons had been shed, the conduct of ministers in advising his royal highness the Prince Regent to thank them for such acts would call for inquiry and for censure. If, on the contrary, bodies to the amount of 20,000, or 70,000, he cared not which, but to an amount beyond the means of the civil power to deal with, had marched in regular columns, and in military array, with seditious banners, into the heart of one of the most populous and most inflammable towns in the empire; if these men had been previously drilled to military exercises;—if they had been shortly before convened for a treasonable purpose;—if they resisted the authority of the peace-officers executing the warrant of the magistrates;—if, in short, the case stated by the noble lord, and by the honourable member for Dover, was correct, then he had no hesitation in saying, that his majesty's ministers were not only justified in returning thanks to the magistrates, but that it was their bounden duty to do so; and that those gentlemen, acting in the discharge of a most important duty, in a crisis of public peril, and undertaking an awful responsibility for the public service, were entitled to have the sense of the executive government on their conduct. When it was said that this is prejudging the question, it seemed to be taken as granted, that the executive power of the country is not in any degree lodged in the government. Would it not have been their duty to have given previous advice and instruction to the magistrates on such a subject, and with a view to such an emergency? When they direct the public prosecutor to proceed against any individual, can that be considered as a prejudging of the question? To this extent it is the exercise of their proper function, which they cannot neglect without an abandonment of duty; and if they felt, under all the circumstances, that the conduct of those most meritorious public servants deserved their praise, it would have been unjust and mean to have withheld their expression of it. How, then, could the propriety of the letter of thanks be judged of until the facts were ascertained? True, it was said; and therefore inquire. Certainly; but how? Clearly by the regular course of law, and by the regular tribunals of the country, unless some case were previously established, showing that these tribunals were inadequate or unsuited for the purpose. Bills had been found against several of the persons alleged to be actors in this seditious meeting: on these trials the legality of the meeting would be necessarily the subject of investigation. And why was it that these trials had not taken place, and the public mind, through the regular constitutional channel of a trial by jury, been informed of the real nature of these transactions? Why? because the persons so accused had availed themselves of the delay which the law unfortunately allows, and had postponed their trials until the Spring assizes. But it is said, that although the legality of the meeting might be decided on in those cases, still the conduct of the magistrates in dispersing it might be illegal; and this would not necessarily, in them, come under discussion. Why, then, were not proceedings taken on the part of the persons alleged to be aggrieved or injured by the acts of the magistrates? The hon. and learned member made the absence of such proceedings a ground for parliamentary inquiry; but was not the fair inference from the absence of such proceedings this, that no reasonable foundation for them existed? But the grand jury had thrown out the bills preferred on behalf of these persons: Was this a ground for parliamentary inquiry? Was it to be presumed that the grand jury of the county of Lancaster had violated their oaths? An artifice had been resorted to, for the purpose of rendering the administration of justice suspected in the public mind, by publishing the informations which had been sent up to the grand jury; but every gentleman must be aware of the difference between an information, in which the party states the facts according to his own views, and a viva voce examination before the grand jury, in which the entire truth is extracted from the witness. But, suppose the grand jury had erred in ignoring the bills, fresh indictments might be sent up to any succeeding grand jury. Was the entire county of Lancaster to be pronounced incapable or unwilling to exercise such functions? But magistrates refused to receive informations: was not their conduct examinable in the court of King's-bench? And might not all the facts connected with such a transaction be fully examined on affidavits? and, if any doubt existed, by a jury, on an information under the sanction of the court? Was the court of King's-bench also to be included within the ban of this proscription of all the constituted authorities? But the hon. and learned member said, that the court of King's-bench would not interfere, unless the magistrate acted wilfully; and that he might commit an error which would not subject him to punishment: was this, then, a ground for parliamentary interference, to stop the course of law, and subject the public functionary to an extraordinary visitation of public vengeance? Were the different points of the argument of the hon. and learned member altogether reconcileable? When his object was to make out a case so important as to call for parliamentary inquiry, he stated the conduct of the magistrates as a daring violation of the subject's privileges, a triumph of authority over law, a foul stain upon our laws, forming a black era in the annals of our country; but when it became an object to shew that there might be a case in which the courts of law would be incompetent to investigate the truth, then this foul deed, this portentous violation of the laws and of the constitution, dwindled into an error in judgment, too slight and too pardonable to warrant the interference of the court of King's-bench. Was such an error, if it did exist, he would ask, a case for parliamentary inquiry? Was this the way in which the conduct of magistrates was to be examined by parliament? He owned he was not one of those who were disposed to examine too critically the conduct of magistrates acting in perilous times, under heavy responsibility; and sure he was, that if the benignant principle of the law shielded their errors, it was not the province of parliament to deprive them of that protection. Further he would ask, if any individual was aggrieved, where was the bar to his remedy by civil action, in which the whole merits of his case would be discussed in a court of law, and decided on by a jury of his country? What pretence was there for saying that justice had been denied, or even delayed? Unless the House was prepared to bring to its bar the grand jury of Lancashire,—unless they were prepared to say that the whole body of public functionaries, petty juries, grand juries, magistrates, and judges, were linked in one common conspiracy against the peaceable petitioners, who assembled at Manchester on the 16th of August,—they had not ground or principle on which they could order this inquiry. He deprecated such a proceeding, as calculated to give efficacy to the plans of the revolutionary party for the degradation of the public functionaries, and to stamp, with the authoritative seal of parliament, what hitherto had rested in vulgar calumny, and in popular clamour. He believed that such an inquiry, instead of being calculated, as was alleged, to allay dissatisfaction, and to conciliate the public mind, could have no other effect than to raise the hopes and spirits of the revolutionists, and to strike damp and panic into the heart of every loyal subject. Besides this, the course was wild and impracticable. How was this inquiry to be conducted? At the bar of the House, or in a committee? Was this inquiry to supersede the proceedings already instituted in the king's courts? Or, were the two classes of proceedings to be carried on simultaneously? If the former was to be the course, the laws were to be robbed of their authority, and the subject of his redress, by a proceeding utterly unsuited to the purposes either of punishment or of compensation. If the latter, we were to have the anomalous and unprecedented spectacle of persons being tried, on charges affecting their persons and properties, perhaps their lives, in proceedings before juries, and with witnesses on oath, in the regular courts of law, while the very same facts were undergoing a discussion, without oath, before the extraordinary tribunal of parliament. Was it possible that either public or individual justice could be obtained by such a course, or that any result could be derived from it, calculated to maintain the authority of the laws, or the dignity of parliament? Such a proceeding, he must say, appeared to him wild, unprecedented, and impracticable.

His hon. and learned friend had adverted to three cases, as precedents to warrant such a course as that now recommended. The first was a case in the year 1714, in which the House of Lords, for the purpose of procuring the removal of magistrates who were supposed to entertain Jacobitical principles, had addressed the throne for a list of the magistrates, and entered into a strict inquiry; in consequence of which, several of those magistrates were dismissed. Was there any trial then depending in a court of law? Was there any specific fact that could be inquired into in a court of law? Or, was it any thing more than a proceeding to enable parliament to advise the Crown, with respect to the wholesome exercise of its prerogative?—The second was the case of the murder of Porteus, by the mob of Edinburgh (which had derived much celebrity from a late popular work). Was that a proceeding affecting any trial depending, or with a view to any individual punishment? It was, as fairly stated by the hon. and learned member, an inquiry, in order to ground a bill of pains and penalties against the town of Edinburgh, and which was accordingly passed.—The third instance alluded to, was the inquiry instituted before the secret committee in 1794. That was an inquiry for the purpose of grounding measures for the public safety; and was with reference to the general state of the country, not into the conduct of local magistrates, and on a particular occasion. Again the danger of its incidentally affecting the rights of individuals, who were liable to be tried in the courts of law, was so strongly felt, that the inquiry was a secret one; when published, the names of individuals were suppressed; and even under all these circumstances, the possibility of an impression unfavourable to these individuals having been made by the report, was so strongly felt, that Mr. Erskine relied on it, and successfully, and in some instances, as he (Mr. P.) believed, acquittals were obtained on that ground.—When his hon. and learned friend, with his extensive knowledge and research, could produce no other instances than these, he felt himself justified in repeating the assertion, that the measure was unprecedented.—But there was a case not alluded to by his hon. and learned friend, as he recollected, about the year 1715, in which a parliamentary inquiry having been directed, into the nature of a certain meeting at Oxford, which was alleged to be riotous, a number of affidavits were produced on one side, and after an unavailing demand of examination on the other, the inquiry was found so impracticable that it was dropped, and no further proceeding founded on it.*

* The reference appears to have been made from memory, and, though substantially true, was certainly inaccurate in expression. The facts were these:—A tumult having arisen at Oxford, on the prince's birth-day, and the loyalty of the mayor and of the heads of the university being called in question, the lords of the council examined into the case on affidavits, not with reference to the riot, but with respect to their conduct as to rejoicing on the prince's birth-day,—a matter which could not be the subject of any legal inquiry. The council came to the following resolution: "Resolved, that the heads of the university and mayor of the city neglected to make any public rejoicing on the prince's birth-day; but some of the collegiates, with the officers, being met to celebrate the day, the house where they were was assaulted, and the windows were broken by the rabble, which was the beginning and occasion of the riots that ensued, as well from the soldiers as the scholars and the townsmen; and that the conduct of the mayor seems well justified by the affidavits on his part." On the 25th March, 1717, the Lords addressed the Crown, that the proper officer should lay before the House the complaints and depositions relative to the riots and disorders complained of at the city of Oxford, and the proceedings which had been had thereon. In consequence of this address, the documents, consisting among others of fifty-six affidavits by the officers and soldiers, and fifty-five affidavits on the part of the mayor and city, were laid before the House of Lords, and referred to a committee of the whole House. On the 3rd of April, 1717, the committee repealed two resolutions: viz. an approbation of the resolutions of the lords of the council, already stated; and, secondly, that the publication of depositions, while the matter was depending in council, was disrespectful to the prince, and tending to sedition. A petition against this re-

The case for inquiry, he therefore contended, was unsupported by precedent, and was not bottomed on any ascertained fact, or even on any statement made by any member in his place, of any case which, if true, would warrant its adoption. Indeed, he had not heard any member assert the legality of the Manchester meeting. He was confident that no man, acquainted with the laws and constitution of the country, would venture to do so.

The House, he trusted, would excuse him, if he trespassed a little further on their patience, by stating his opinion, as to these public meetings. The right of the people of this country to meet, for the purpose of expressing their opinions on any subject connected with their own individual interest, or with the public welfare, was beyond all question; it was a sacred privilege, belonging to the most humble, as fully as to the highest subject in the community: they had a right to the full expression, and to the free communication, of such sentiments; to interchange them with their fellow subjects; to animate and catch fire, each from the other. He trusted that to such rights he never should be found an enemy. But he must say, that these rights, like all others, to be exercised in civil society, must be subject to such modification and restriction as to render them compatible with other rights, equally acknowledged, and equally sacred. Every subject of this realm had an undoubted right to the pro-solution was offered on behalf of the vice chancellor, the mayor and magistrates, who desired to be heard in reply. Their application was refused, and the resolutions already stated were adopted by the House, and no further proceedings were taken. And even from this mere adoption of the resolution in council twenty-eight peers dissented, assigning this among other reasons, namely, that the matters of fact were not sufficiently inquired into, from want of opportunity of replying to the affidavits; and because, by such proceedings, the magistrates may be discouraged from doing their duty on such occasions. These facts appear on the Journals of the Lords; and it is conceived they substantially warrant the statement of this case, as one tending to show the futility of such inquiries, although they do not confirm the exact words of the statement.

tection of the laws, to the security of his person and his property, and still more, to the full assurance of such safety; and he had no hesitation in asserting, that any assembly of the people, held under such circumstances as to excite in the minds of the king's peaceable and loyal subjects reasonable grounds of alarm, in this respect, were illegal assemblies, and liable to be dispersed as such. He thought it important that it should be understood, that these rights were restricted, not merely to this extent; namely, that they must not assemble for an illegal purpose; that they must not assemble with force and arms; that they must not use seditious language; that they must not revile the laws or public functionaries; but, beyond all this, that they must not assemble under such circumstances, whether of numbers or otherwise, as to excite well-grounded terror in the minds of their fellow subjects, or to disturb their tranquil and assured enjoyment of the protection of the laws, free from all reasonable apprehension of force or violence. A vulgar notion may have prevailed, that if the avowed and immediate purpose of such meetings were not illegal, or if they had not arms in their hands, or if no force was actually used, or immediately threatened, the assembly was legal:—no opinion could be more unfounded. And he did not fear contradiction from any constitutional lawyer, when he asserted, that any assembly of the people, whether armed or unarmed; whether using or threatening to use force, or not doing so; and whether the avowed object was illegal or legal, if held in such numbers, or with such language, or emblems, or deportment, as to create well-grounded terror in the king's liege subjects for their lives, their persons, or their property, was an illegal assembly, and might be dispersed as such. Such had been the law, as laid down by the ablest of our lawyers, and of our judges, from the earliest period of our jurisprudence, and in the best times of our history and constitution, before the revolution, and since the revolution, independent of the Riot act, or of any statutable enactment, by the principles of our common law, which was always founded on the principles of common sense. The application of this principle to each particular case must always be a matter of discretion; but, in cases like the present, it could not admit of doubt or difficulty. When meetings became too strong for the civil power to deal with them, the laws must prohibit them; if not, recourse must necessarily be had to military force. When the citizen became too strong for the law, the magistrate of necessity became a soldier; and those who justified these unrestricted meetings were the worst enemies to the liberties of their country, and laid the foundation of a military despotism. If bodies of the people, not convened by any public functionary, but called together by mountebanks, whose only title was their impudence and folly, were entitled to assemble, not in thousands, but in tens of thousands; to march, with banners displayed, in military array, into the hearts of populous cities; and if the laws were not competent to assure the people of this country against the panic and dismay excited by such proceedings, there was an end to the constitution.—He implored the House to protect the country from the effect of these desolating plans which were now in operation. Even though they should not break out in actual rebellion, their mischiefs were beyond calculation. The principles of respect for the laws and orders of the state, the reverence that was due to the sacred obligations of religion, these were not the results of momentary feelings, which might be thrown aside and resumed at pleasure; they were habits which, if once removed, could not easily be restored. If those sacred sources, from which were the issues of public happiness and virtue, were once tainted, how was their purity to be restored? He had reason to believe, that the blasphemies, which had excited the horror of all good men, had been fashioned by these miscreants into primers for the education of children, that these helpless beings, in receiving the first elements of knowledge, might be inoculated with this pestilence. He again implored the House to act with decision and energy, while yet it was in their power. If the great foundations of public safety were once shaken, the united exertion of all the honest men of every party might come too late. On these grounds he deprecated the amendment, as calculated to give encouragement to the worst enemies of the state; and cordially concurred in the original address.

Mr. Scarlett began by observing, that with many of the magistrates of Manchester he had long been in habits of intimacy, and every one of them he knew personally. He should certainly be most unwilling to see them judged by the exaggerated and distorted statements that had been laid before the public. It was not, however, because he thought them guilty, that he wished for an inquiry, but in order that circumstances might appear that would destroy the delusion which had taken hold of the public mind. His hon. and learned friend coming from a distant part—distant, he meant, from the scene of these proceedings—did not appear to be informed so intimately of the facts of the case as to warrant the decided manner in which he had spoken of them. There was one recommendation of his hon. and learned friend which he certainly never expected to hear on this side of the channel, and that was, “that they should decide on the facts first, and then inquire.” [A laugh]. Without saying, that he imputed to his majesty’s ministers the intention of governing the people by force, he might remark, that such an inference had been drawn by part of the public from the proceedings in question; and since it was so alleged, it was necessary that an inquiry should take place, in order to remove that dangerous delusion; and if, on inquiry, it should appear (which he could not suppose) that government had entertained such an intention, that government should meet the censure which it deserved. He was sorry to observe the manner in which his hon. and learned friend who spoke last had argued on this subject. He (Mr. Scarlett) did not mean to treat this as a legal question; he conceived it to be paramount to all special pleading, of which his hon. and learned friend’s speech had too much the air. He should not enter at large into the character of the meeting at Manchester, but from what he had heard he thought it likely that the motives of the persons who called it were criminal, and that many of the persons attending it had criminal intentions. But many such meetings had been held before and since; and he was surprised that the persons attending these meetings had never been punished. In July last, a few days after the prorogation of parliament, a meeting was held in Smithfield, at which it was resolved that the laws were not to be obeyed after January, 1820, and that no taxes were to be paid after that date; and having never yet heard of any proceedings to punish the persons who had passed these resolutions, he was surprised that a meeting should be put down by force, at which no such resolutions had been passed. The first meeting advertised would undoubtedly have been illegal, and on this account the object was changed, and the second Manchester meeting, of the 16th August, took place. What followed? Hunt and his associates were arrested, and after the warrant of the magistrates had thus been executed, the people assembled were cut and trampled down by the yeomanry. The noble lord had asserted that the magistrates never contemplated the dispersion of the mob by the military. Would the public give the noble lord credit for this important fact? Would they not require that it should be proved at the bar? As a lawyer he agreed that the Riot act need not be read before the dispersion of an illegal meeting, and he also agreed that if in a contest with constables in dispersing an illegal meeting, the civil power destroyed life, it was justifiable homicide; but he denied most firmly that, if persons continued on the ground after the arrest of the ringleaders, the yeomanry, by any law of this country, were authorized in cutting them down. Those who remained were guilty of a misdemeanor, but only of a misdemeanor; and it was quite too much to say, that to prevent a misdemeanor life might be destroyed with impunity, though it was otherwise in cases of felony. It might be said that the yeomanry only endeavoured to arrest; but did they secure one individual, or did they take a single man to the New Bailey? Certainly not; and, in this view of the question, supposing the meeting to have been illegal, the military had been guilty of a high offence in the deaths they had occasioned, and the wounds they had inflicted. What complexion, then, did the transaction take? The people meet to petition. The magistrates issue a warrant to arrest certain individuals; and that being executed, the yeomanry disperse the crowd at the edge of the sabre: three days afterwards, the thanks of the Prince Regent were given, both to the civil and military authorities; and what was the unavoidable inference, but that opinions, however absurd or preposterous, were to be put down by the bayonet, and that ministers intended to act on a system of military coercion? Did not this demand inquiry? Did not this call upon the whole nation to insist that inquiry should be instituted? Where, then, ought it to be conducted?

Where, but in that place which was the professed sanctuary of the rights of the people—the House of Commons; where but before the grand inquest of the nation, the guardians of the constitution, and the liberties it conferred? The noble lord had talked much about the law which he did not seem to understand; but was it meant to be said, that the right of the people to meet and petition was to be left to a private action, commenced by some starving weaver, or some old woman who might take upon herself to be the championess of the nation? A great constitutional right was at stake, and the House of Commons was the only proper forum for inquiry. After some further remarks upon the point whether the Court of King's Bench would grant a criminal information against a magistrate, unless malice or corruption were proved, the hon. and learned gentleman proceeded to notice the dismissal of earl Fitzwilliam. It was known that there was not a man in the country more opposed to the visionary and absurd schemes of the radicals, yet ministers had removed him; and, what was the inference from this fact, but that, as they intended to substitute a military for a civil force, they did not think that he would be an instrument in their hands sufficiently complying? They feared that his ardent love for the constitution would oppose a barrier to their plans in Yorkshire, and that he would support the resolutions of the House of Commons in 1680, when it was declared that those who misrepresented the objects of the people, when they met for redress of grievances, betrayed the liberty of the subject. If it were quite clear that the magistrates would come out of the inquiry pure and unsullied, they would not thank the Prince Regent's ministers for their injudicious friendship in refusing to allow them to justify themselves to the world. But, notwithstanding their refusal, it became the House of Commons to act for itself, to consult the wishes of its constituents, and he never should think the worse of it for sympathising with the people.

The Attorney-General rose, amid loud cries for the question, and for an adjournment. He congratulated the House on the general admission that the meeting at Manchester, on the 16th of August, was illegal; and he imagined that the hon. and learned gentleman who spoke last must have forgotten that the efforts of the yeomanry were not directed, in the first instance, to disperse the meeting, but to repel an attack that had been made upon them. The fact had been asserted, and had not, and could not be denied. And because the gentlemen on the other side might not have obtained information enough to satisfy them, that was no adequate ground for inquiry at the bar. He denied that a case of suspicion had been made out against the magistrates, and said that the presumption, after the decision of the grand jury of Lancaster, must be all in their favour. The question of the legality of the meeting would soon come before a court for decision; and he insisted that that was not only a competent, but the most competent tribunal.

Sir W. De Crespigny now moved an adjournment of the debate. The motion being seconded by sir Robert Wilson, and supported by Mr. M. A. Taylor, a division took place: Ayes, 65. Noes, 453. Majority against an adjournment, 388—When the gallery was re-opened,

Mr. Wilberforce was in possession of the House. He objected to its yielding to the clamour out of doors by concurring in the amendment. He insisted that the great body of the nation, at least the great body of the thinking part of it, approved of the steps the magistrates of Manchester had taken, and would be dissatisfied if inquiry at the bar were instituted. He knew that the House of Commons acted, in many instances, as the grand inquest of the nation; yet when gentlemen considered that they would be called on to investigate the conduct of the magistrates in their official capacity, and that in so doing they would be obliged to examine men, not on oath at the bar—men too, it should be observed, who professed the new system of morality, who defied the laws of God and man—perhaps they would pause before they determined to exercise those functions, by agreeing to the amendment. With respect to the transactions at Manchester on the 16th of August, he felt as deeply concerned at the circumstances of that unfortunate day as any gentleman possibly could; but, if he asked himself how the peace of the country was to be preserved, the answer must be, that if they assented to any such motion as the present, and thus sanctioned the proceedings of those bad men, who wished to produce anarchy and confusion, it would be the means of creating more discord and bloodshed than any other measure that could be devised. He admitted that there was considerable distress in the country, and if, in our present situation, it could be done without detriment to the state, he would be willing to take off some of those taxes that bore on the lower classes. But gentlemen should recollect, that the exigencies of the government must be provided for, and that it was easier to remove a tax than to propose a substitute.

Mr. Hume rose amidst loud cries of "Question, question." He said, that, in order to give every member an opportunity of stating his opinion on this question, which, at that late hour, it was impossible to do, he would move an adjournment of the debate.

The Speaker.—What does the hon. member move?

Mr. Hume.—That this debate be adjourned to this day.

The Speaker.—I beg leave to submit the difficulty that arises on this question. The House has already decided that this debate should not be adjourned.

Mr. Hume.—Then I beg leave to move that the House do now adjourn.

The gallery was then cleared for a division, but none took place. While strangers were excluded, the question was debated, whether it was consistent with the rules of the House for a gentleman to persist in moving the adjournment, minute after minute, in order to prevent the consideration of a question, as was done by the party in opposition when Mr. Fox was last in power. After Mr. Hume, Mr. W. Smith, Mr. Bennet, lord Castle-reagh, Mr. Scarlett, Mr. Bankes, and Mr. W. Wynn, had delivered their sentiments, it was agreed that the debate should be adjourned till to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 24.

ADDRESS ON THE PRINCE REGENT'S SPEECH AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION.] The adjourned debate on the Address having been resumed,

Mr. V. Blake said, he rose to order, for the purpose of protesting against the vote of last night on the question of adjournment.

The Speaker observed, that if in the impression he had taken of the hon. gentleman's object, he was incorrect, the hon. gentleman had risen on the point of order, with the view of altering and rescinding the vote the House had passed last night. If so, that was a course in which, according to the rules of proceeding, the hon. member was not at liberty to take.

Mr. Blake said he rose to protest—

The Speaker said, it was open to the hon. member to submit a resolution to the House, to prevent any repetition of such a proceeding; but it was requisite, either that a regular notice of such intention should be given, or, at all events, be made the subject of a separate consideration. But no question, save one of privilege, could precede the regular discussion fixed for the day.

Mr. Hume then rose. He began by saying, that his object in pressing the motion of adjournment last night, was to afford many gentlemen the opportunity of meeting the statements and assertions of the noble lord opposite, with the information they possessed, and the conviction they entertained relative to the transactions which formed so prominent a part of his speech. He felt at the time the correctness of the course he pursued, and he was now convinced, that, when the papers presented that evening were read and distributed, the public would see the propriety of the proceeding. In the course of his speech, the noble lord had made statements, and had converted allegations into facts, upon which, from the information he had received, the noble lord would feel the necessity of affording the House further explanation. He was extremely sorry, that in the Speech from the throne, there were some points with which he could not agree; and he did consider it the duty of that House to pause before it gave to them its sanction. The Speech from the throne, stated, that a hostile spirit was abroad; he was sorry to acknowledge that such a spirit existed, but it was for the members of that House to reflect upon the causes which occasioned such discontent. What had they done during the last session to appease it? Had any effort been made to mitigate, much less remove, the accumulated sufferings which pressed so heavily upon the people? To what a situation had such a policy reduced the kingdom! Those hon. members who had so recently travelled through various parts, could bear evidence to the state of agitation that prevailed. The din of war was to be heard in every town!—military recruitings were to be seen every where, as if the government were preparing for an arduous contest! And against whom? Against our fellow-subjects! In a period of profound peace with foreign nations, we were adding to our military force—with a declining revenue we were increasing our military expenditure. When that expenditure amounted to twelve millions, the ministers of the Crown were embodying an additional force of 10,000 men. To such a ruinous proposition he could never give his assent.—The next point in the Speech to which he objected, was one which he felt could not be substantiated; he alluded to the passage in which the distresses of the country were attributed to the embarrassment of foreign states. In what way could such alleged embarrassment affect the internal peace and welfare of this country? Did the noble lord in adverting to foreign embarrassments, allude to France? He could not. There was no country in Europe more embarrassed than Great Britain. The true source of our difficulties and distresses was to be traced to our overwhelming taxation, and to the denial of a proper reform in that House. The question was not that the proposed Address was objectionable; but should the amendment be added, in his judgment that amendment was consistent, proper, and moderate.—It was stated last night by the noble lord, that the magistrates had given no orders to the military to dismiss the meeting at Manchester. If that was the case, in what a situation was the country placed! It was that day placed under military authority. Where, then, was the constitutional security? What could have prevented the military, if they pleased, from turning round on the very magistrates themselves and attacking them? In two of the letters from the magistrates presented that night, it was stated that the warrant for the apprehension of the parties was executed without any difficulty. How did this statement correspond with the assertions of the noble lord? He would not rest satisfied with the assertions of the noble lord, or of any man; he must have proofs on which to form a satisfactory opinion; he must give credit to the statements of eye-witnesses of the facts, who had no interest in any misrepresentation. Where was the proof of the magistrate being trampled upon when in the act of reading the Riot act? Where was the proof of what the noble lord asserted, that it was read three times? Nothing of the kind was to be found in these letters; they merely glanced at it in these words:—"in the mean time the Riot act was read, and the mob dispersed." A right hon. and learned gentleman, for whose character and talents he entertained the highest respect (Mr. Plunkett) had asserted last night that the meeting of the 16th of August was illegal. He had heard him with surprise state, that meetings might be illegal in four ways, namely, by numbers, by devices, by threats, and by language. What was the numerical criterion? Was a meeting of 30,000 legal; and did an additional fifty constitute its illegality. He denied the law which recognised such a principle, or the page of the statute book that constituted a precise number a proof of illegality. The whole population of the country were supposed, and might, if there was accommodation, be assembled in the court of King's-bench. Did the number there make the assemblage illegal? He acknowledged his ignorance of any such principle; he believed it was not law, at least on this side of the water. If the assembly of the 16th of August was illegal, ministers were highly culpable for not dispersing others equally large or larger, subsequently assembled with the same banners and ceremonies. From the papers, it was clear that, on the morning of the 16th of August, no notion was entertained that the projected meeting was illegal. What, then, had altered its nature before noon? and where were the overt acts that warranted the attack upon the defenceless multitude? He was bound to take the report of the magistrates as the most correct; and he regretted to observe the light and trifling manner in which the important subject was treated by many of them. He gave the noble lord credit for being sincere when he said, that he believed the information he had obtained; but he entreated ministers not to be too credulous. He begged to ask what confidence ought to be placed in Mr. Norris and men like him, who, on the 17th of August went to the Exchange, and had it and all the shops closed, because he was informed that 50,000 radicals were on their march to the place. Were men to be relied upon who talk of danger which they fear, and who are in such a state of terror themselves, as scarcely to know whether they stand upon their heads or heels? The hon. member for Bramber had said last night, that the plan of the Manchester radicals was to remain on the ground until midnight, and then to fire the town; but what authority did he adduce for his statement? Did not the absolute ridiculousness of the plan give it a sufficient contradiction? Was this spirit, which was so much complained of, to be put down by heaping injustice on injustice? There were thousands and tens of thousands of individuals in the country, who suffered the most poignant distress, and, afflicted as they were it was really surprising that they had not been goaded on to acts of violence before this time. There were, he believed, many individuals who wished to take advantage of their distresses to inflame and irritate them; but if their efforts had any success, it was to be attributed to the conduct of his majesty's ministers. They were itinerant quacks, or field orators, who stimulated the passions of the people; but they would have been banished from society—they would not have been listened to—if they had not derived a spurious importance from the conduct of his majesty's ministers. The hon. member for Bramber had viewed, with dreadful alarm, the occurrences which had recently taken place, and wished the House to look on them with a similar feeling. But he would ask, could any just comparison be drawn between the state of England at the present moment, and that of France at the period of the revolution? In his mind, there could not. If the government of France, in that momentous hour, had conciliated, instead of oppressing and insulting, the people, in all probability the serious consequences which followed would not have been produced. If ever there was a question which called for mature and serious consideration before gentlemen came to a decision, it was undoubtedly the present. By agreeing to the amendment, of which he heartily approved, they would not pledge themselves to any line of conduct in future. They must be well aware that, from one end of the country to the other, an anxious desire to obtain justice, whoever the offenders might be, had been decidedly expressed. He begged to caution those members who imagined that a contrary spirit prevailed, and who were opposed to an inquiry into the circumstances which happened at Manchester, against being influenced by such a delusion. Let them look to the way in which counter-addresses had been got up in different parts of the kingdom. In most instances, the parties who were anxious to have them signed had not appeared openly and boldly. They had not declared, in the face of day, what they meant to do. No; they felt that injustice had been perpetrated, and they knew that it demanded inquiry, although they took measures which must defeat that object. He would not decide whether it was or was not proper to institute an inquiry at the bar of that House; but if it was not fitting that such a proceeding should be adopted, they could, as they had done on other occasions, order prosecutions to be instituted before a proper tribunal.

Lord Castlereagh said, he wished to say a few words in explanation. He was sure the hon. member who had just spoken had misrepresented him, not intentionally, but in consequence of having misconceived what he had stated on the preceding evening. He wished to set the hon. member right, rather because his observations affected the interests of others, than from any feeling personal to himself. He had last night stated, and he had good authority for doing so, that the meeting was dispersed in a manner not originally contemplated by the magistrates. Their intention was, that the assembly should be dispersed in the ordinary legal manner, the riot act being read, and every necessary form gone through. It was, as he had stated last night, the conflict with the troops at the hustings, which produced that state of things not originally contemplated by the magistrates. The hon. member had inferred, what was not warranted by the facts, that the meeting was dispersed without the interposition of the magistrates. That was not the case. He thought, however, that when the troops were attacked, they had a right to repel force by force, even if there were no magistrate present. The hon. member had accused him of not having produced proof of every fact he had stated. This would not have been consonant with the course he conceived it right to adopt. He contended, that the House of Commons was not the place where such proof ought to be adduced, and he merely undertook to repel assertion by assertion, in order to clear the characters of a number of individuals from the unjust attacks that had been made on them—attacks that were not warranted by the circumstances. The hon. member had argued, that because he admitted the meeting to have been dispersed in a way not at first contemplated by the magistrates, he therefore conceded the point, that it was not dispersed in a legal manner. He had conceded no such point. He said, that the military, when assailed, were justified in repelling force by force; and he would now state, what he had forgotten to mention on the preceding night, that it was by the order of the magistrates that the meeting was dispersed. The facts were these:—A small force about forty of the Manchester yeomanry was appointed to accompany the peace-officer to the hustings. When they arrived there, a conflict took place between the people and the yeomanry. A magistrate who was in conversation with colonel l'Estrange and colonel Dalrymple, at a window which afforded a full view of the place, saw these forty yeomen, in the midst of 50,000 persons, assailed, and he might say, overpowered. He observed to the officers, "Don't you think those yeomen are placed in a most perilous situation?" They agreed with him that their situation was critical and dangerous, and, in consequence, an immediate order was given to support the yeomanry and disperse the assembly. The 15th dragoons and the Cheshire Cavalry advanced to the rescue of the Manchester yeomanry; and in so doing, acted distinctly under the authority of the magistrate, who, on a fair view of the case, felt himself bound to give the necessary order. The hon. member seemed to consider, that the documents now laid before the House contained the whole of the information on which government formed its judgment. What he had stated last night showed the contrary. Government proceeded in a considerable measure, on the statements of the two individuals who had been sent up to give necessary information, and who were enabled to state the facts. How was it possible that a magistrate, at 12 o'clock at night, after what had occurred in the course of the day, and while the town was still in a riotous and tumultuous state, could detail, in a hasty letter, all the circumstances connected with the case, and which operated in his mind in forming a judgment of what ought to be done? He entreated the House not to give way to the idea that the case was to rest on the documents now laid before them. He had always stated that it was not, and he further said, that the transaction was not to receive judgment in that House. Government conceived, from the facts laid before them, that the conduct pursued at Manchester was right; but that opinion did not conclude the conduct of the magistrates, which was still open to investigation.

Earl Temple apologized to the House for presuming to occupy any portion of its valuable time; but, under the peculiar circumstances in which the country was placed, he conceived it to be the duty of every member of parliament to state, and to state openly, his reason for the vote he meant to give. He had heard the speeches of different gentlemen who had addressed the House, but none of them had given him so much surprise as that delivered by the right hon. gentleman on his right hand. He had absolutely treated the situation of the country with levity. Were they, then, to look lightly upon those who went about the country preaching doctrines destructive of the constitution? Were not persons of that class to be considered dangerous to the state? He could not look upon the machinations of persons of that description as matters of indifference. The occasion was one which demanded the prompt aid and assistance of every member of that House to put down the spirit of insubordination which prevailed to an alarming extent; and unless the government of the country were firmly supported at this crisis, neither he nor any other man could foresee or answer for the consequences that might follow.

Mr. Bennet said, that having procured much information on the subject now under discussion, he was anxious to set the hon. member for Dover (Mr. B. Wilbraham) right on several points, which he had stated incorrectly on the preceding evening. Although he would not go the length of declaring that all the statements which had been presented to the public, with respect to the sufferers at Manchester, were true in every part, yet this he would say, that a case was substantially made out, which demanded inquiry; that case was supported by the evidence given on oath at the coroner's inquest, the proceedings at which, taken in short-hand he had read; it appeared from that evidence that great cruelty had been exercised. The hon. member for Dover began by stating, what he thought, on cooler judgment, he would reject, namely, that the persons who assembled at the meeting had no other object but that of plunder:

such was the general and sweeping declaration of the hon. member. He (Mr. Bennet) would not assert that alarm might not be created by the meetings of large bodies of the people; but this he would say, that nothing could be more degrading to the character of the country, or more injurious to individuals who were employed in administering justice in those parts of the kingdom where these meetings were held, than to declare that assemblies of persons, consisting of he knew not how many thousands, were formed merely for purposes of plunder and devastation. That, when great numbers of persons met together, there might be some bad and mischievous individuals amongst them, he meant not to deny; but he would confidently maintain, that the great majority of them assembled for the purpose of stating their political opinion. They held opinions which he certainly detested—opinions that were injurious to the best interests of the country; but he believed they adhered to them from honest and conscientious feelings; and he felt that he had no more right to put them down by force, than he had to persecute a man who held religious opinions of a different nature from those which he acknowledged. He believed those people met together for the purpose of taking the best means of carrying into effect those political sentiments which they supposed to be correct. The hon. member, who had thus accused between 30,000 and 40,000 persons, proceeded to give an account of the meeting. He stated, that the advance of the cavalry from the front of the house to the hustings, was attended by no attack on any person. This was not correct. It was proved by one of the witnesses who appeared for the magistrates, that not only great personal alarm was excited, but that violence was committed. James Hall, who gave his evidence before the coroner, who had been placed in a situation where he could watch the meeting, for he was but fifty yards from it, distinctly stated that he saw Meagher, the trumpeter, knock down a man, with, as he thought, the flat of his sword. That was before the cavalry arrived at the hustings. But this was not all. It was stated in evidence that three individuals were cut down by the yeomanry as they advanced. A woman with a child in her arms was also wounded; and, although the grand jury had thrown out the bills preferred on her behalf, still he had a right to state it as a substantial matter that called for inquiry; when persons filling the situation of magistrates, and individuals who held the rank of ministers, offered statements to the House that were contradicted on oath, no doubt could be entertained that there was substantial reason for inquiry and investigation. If ever there was a case that demanded a severe scrutiny, it was that which now occupied the attention of the country, connected as it was with the loss of so many lives. The hon. member had stated, that there were but twenty-six persons hurt, who were taken to the infirmary. He believed that not less than fifty eight persons were admitted, in consequence of wounds and bruises. It was a fact, that eight persons had lost their lives, and he was sure he spoke within compass when he said, that between 3 and 400 individuals were rode over, wounded by sabres, or otherwise maimed. A committee had been formed at Manchester, to ascertain the number of the sufferers. The list prepared by them had not yet been sent to London, but it would be transmitted in the course of a few days, and then it would be seen whether his statement, or that of the hon. member who said that very few accidents had occurred, was the correct one. It would be found that a great deal of unnecessary cruelty had been resorted to. The people who attempted to escape by a passage not more than forty feet wide, were driven together in one mass, to the imminent danger of their lives. This was the only real outlet; the others were difficult of egress, in consequence of the situation of different houses. But one effect could be produced by a body of cavalry pursuing a great concourse of people into such a narrow pass; and it was in evidence that the poor creatures were forced down, and were seen lying in heaps, one on the top of the other, black in the face, and with all the appearance of suffocation. So great was the pressure, that the railings were broken down, and numbers of the people were dragged, wounded, and bloody, through the panels of doors, which had been forced in by their efforts. Two individuals were, on oath, accused of having cut at every person who passed. This was all stated before the coroner's jury, and no attempt was made to controvert it. Respectable persons living within eighteen or twenty yards of the hustings, were unjustifiably assailed. Gentlemen turned round on those who condemned such proceedings, and, because the facts he now adduced were not stated in the course of the debate; because individuals had not an opportunity of critically reading the evidence, they thought proper to taunt them, affected to believe that not the shadow of a case could be made out, and declared the whole of the statement that had been laid before the public to be false. The hon. member had stated, that a yeoman of the name of Hulme, had been struck from his horse by the blow of a stone, before the cavalry made any attack. The hon. member's information was incorrect. It was proved, on oath, that Mr. Holme was one of the persons who was actively employed in dispersing the meeting, and that he rode into the yard of the Quakers meeting house, cutting and hacking the people, whose blood now lay on the stones and rails. It was in a street near the yard that he received his wound, long after the military had advanced, and Hunt and Moorhouse were in custody.—He would not now go into a detail of the evidence, which at a future period must of necessity be fully considered. He agreed in the statement of those who held that a meeting, by reason of the language and conduct of the person who attended it, might become illegal; but he was not prepared to say that there was any part of the proceedings at Manchester, that stamped the meeting there with an illegal character. It had been observed, that the meeting of large bodies of men was attended with inconvenience, if not danger. There was no person but would allow that the assemblies of great numbers of people, in a manufacturing district was exceedingly inconvenient; but inconvenience did not constitute criminality. It was also observed, that those people came to the ground with flags and banners. He admitted that they did, and that some of those banners had very improper inscriptions on them. But such a parade never could justify the severe measures that had been adopted. Again they were told that the people advanced to the place of meeting in military array? But how was it possible for 5,000, or 6,000 persons to move, except in an irregular and tumultuous manner, without they were put into something like military array? He did not, therefore, think, that the mere circumstance of their being attended by music, or their marching eight or ten a-breast, with their arms linked together, was a sufficient reason for calling the meeting at Manchester an illegal assembly. The noble lord had told them, that the magistrates did not originally intend to disperse the meeting; but were compelled to do so, when it assumed a character similar to that stated by certain individuals who had given their information, all of whom, except Mr. Owen were concealed. Now, the meeting began to assemble at half-past eleven o'clock, and continued till one. Had not, then, the magistrates, long before one o'clock, an opportunity of satisfying themselves whether the meeting was legal or illegal? If they conceived it to be the latter, why did they not stop the people as they were advancing to it? Or why not order the Riot act to be read, and prevent the meeting altogether? There was no necessity to apprehend Hunt at the meeting. He might have been arrested on the charge now preferred against him, without any difficulty. In his opinion, if the magistrates conceived that such a meeting was illegal from the first, they had acted most indiscreetly in not preventing it. It was now distinctly known, that the Riot act was never read till the charge of the soldiers took place. Three persons were wounded by the advance of the cavalry before it was read. Mr. Hay's statement put it beyond a doubt that it was not read till after the charge. One of the magistrates, a clergyman, Mr. Ethelstone declared that he read it; but he had not said, when or where—nor had he ventured to swear to the fact. He did not mean to say that the Riot act was not read at all; but he believed that the reading did not take place until after the yeomanry had begun their attack on the people. The noble lord had spoken of the attack on the military, and the hon. member for Dover also stated, that such an attack was made. He (Mr. Bennet) did not believe it. Nadin, in his evidence, deposed, that he only knew of one stone being flung. Another witness, Mr. Eutwisle, spoke of stones, brick-bats, and sticks being made use of; but he was not borne out by the testimony of any other person, and he was contradicted by the testimony of most respectable merchants, who, out of curiosity, proceeded to the field where the meeting took place. He believed the real facts of the case were these—that after the persons on the hustings had been seized, the multitude was attacked, and the word was given by some person or other whom he knew not, "have at their flags." The constables then seized the flags, and the yeomanry made an irruption into the crowd, and committed the evil which was now so universally deplored. That proceeding lamentable as it undoubtedly was, originated, he had no doubt, from a loss of temper on their parts, and an ignorance of the kind of enemy with whom they had to contend. This view of the subject received great illustration from a statement made by Nadin, in the evidence which he gave on the inquest at Oldham: he had there stated, that it never was in contemplation to allow the yeomanry to advance without the support of the dragoons; that no order was ever issued by their commandant, captain Birley, enjoining them to march; that owing to some impetuosity, which he pretended not to explain, they made a simultaneous rush forward; that immediately afterwards, they lost their head, and became ungovernable; and that they became so from that want of command over them, which regular troops never experienced.—The hon. member then observed, that after having made these remarks on this subject, he felt it necessary to say a few words more upon another, which had been mentioned by the right hon. gentleman opposite, and his hon. friend who had preceded him—he meant the seditious and blasphemous publications which had been so much complained of. There was not a man in that House who felt greater abhorrence than he did of such publications; still he begged leave to say, that he had, while in Lancashire, been informed, that irreligious doctrines were not prevalent among the lower orders of the community in that county; and that this information had been derived from many individuals who had taken a philanthropic interest in the union schools established there, and who had particularly inquired into the nature of the religious works circulated among them. It was difficult, he allowed, to disprove the existence of irreligious principles; but if he might be allowed to judge of what the principles of the people were from the primers which were used by them in the education of their children, and which were now in his possession, he would say, that there were no books in the English language better calculated than they were to instruct youth in their moral and religious duties. There was no union school in which the lessons did not commence with a hymn, a religious hymn, in which the gospel was not regularly read, and in which a sermon was not regularly preached. Perhaps it would be interesting to the House to know something of the origin of these union schools. Most of them would be aware of the difficulty which had once existed in getting the children of the poor to the Sunday-schools; that difficulty had, however, soon abated, and the poor were made sensible of the benefits which accrued to them from education. Out of that conviction the union schools had arisen; they owed not their origin to the charitable endowments of the rich, but to the con-joint exertions and subscriptions of the poor; and if the right hon. gentleman would either communicate to him in private, or would favour him in public with the name of the school in which this blasphemous primer was said to be taught, he would undertake to show him that his information was incorrect, on the testimony of the patrons and inspectors of the school, who, he had no doubt, would be able to satisfy both the House and the country that no such work had ever been taught, either by their direction or with their knowledge. To the poor, indeed, religion was their best consolation; as it taught them that there was another world beyond the present, in which they might expect to enjoy those benefits and blessings which were denied them here. He could show, that in no part of England was this consolation more strongly enjoyed than in the county palatine of Lancaster; and that in no part of it was a religious feeling either more general or more warm than in the manufacturing districts. He did not know whether what he had now stated would carry conviction to the mind of the right hon. gentleman; but he would undertake to convince him in private, if he had not already convinced him on the subject; and therefore he trusted the House would give him credit for the assertion when he declared, that whatever mischief certain designing men might have intended to propagate by the dissemination of irreligious and blasphemous publications, the inhabitants of no county stood more clear than the inhabitants of Lancashire on the question of irreligion. It was requisite to state this fact thus publicly, because nothing had inflicted so severe a wound upon the minds of the persons of whom he was then speaking, as the slanders which had been uttered on this subject.

Indeed, the public press had long teemed with the foulest calumnies on this head; and, what was still more worthy of reprobation, the authors of those calumnies knew them to be destitute of all foundation, even at the very moment that they were committing them to paper.—There was likewise another subject on which he was desirous of speaking, shortly. He felt it his duty to state, that it was his decided opinion that it was impossible to govern England in 1819 by the same means as it had been governed in 1719; neither was it any reason that the county should suffer bad government now, because our ancestors had at that time, or formerly, suffered a worse. There was a degree of intellect now in the country, which rendered it necessary that the House should look into the state of the representation, and should examine whether it was not expedient, from the more general diffusion of wealth and property, to give to wealth and property more weight in the representative system. From a contrast which had lately fallen under his view he had learned, that the county of Lancaster, with a population amounting to little short of a million inhabitants, sent fewer members to parliament than those which were returned by five great families in Cornwall. This system could not be what it ought to be; and some alteration in it was absolutely necessary, if the government wished either to retain or recover the affections of the people. That alteration, however, ought not to be annual parliaments or universal suffrage; as such innovations would lead to anarchy one day, and to military despotism the next. Still, though such was his opinion, he felt himself bound to recommend to the House, if it wished to avoid civil dissention, if it wished to avoid that greatest of all evils, the shedding of English blood by English hands, to examine fairly and freely into the state of the representation, and to show the people that, though it would oppose all such innovations as would tend to subvert the constitution, it was quite alive to that greatest of all great questions—the propriety of giving to the people a better, a greater, and a more general control than they now possessed over parliament, by extending, to a certain degree, the power of suffrage [Hear!].—He could not conclude the remarks which he had to offer to their notice, without earnestly imploring them to pause before they decided. No man could look at the present state of the country without alarm, and therefore it became doubly necessary that they should adhere to safe counsels. Nothing that looked like an empty display of power, nothing that resembled a wanton abuse of patronage, ought to be exhibited: above all should be avoided such measures as the dismissal of earl Fitzwilliam from the lieutenancy of the West Riding of the county of York; because that situation was not bestowed on that illustrious nobleman as a mere honour or civic decoration, but as a pledge that, though he was employed by the Crown, he was still to remain the servant, the faithful servant of the people. Indeed, by adding great virtues to his great possessions, he was also calculated, in more ways than one, to be their natural leader.—The hon. member then went on to say, that he cordially supported the amendment which had been proposed, though he hardly understood how to tack it on to the address, since he disputed the facts, protested against the conclusions, and abhorred the remedies which were proposed in that document. Indeed, he did not understand how he could support any thing which he detested so cordially. What he wished to obtain at present was, union among all ranks and classes of the people; and therefore he could not support the address, as he considered it more calculated than any thing else which could be devised to spread disunion and contention among them [Hear, hear!].

Mr. Boote Wilbraham said, he would not again have intruded on the notice of the House, had it not been for certain statements which had just fallen from the hon. gentleman who had preceded him; and expressed a hope that the House would pardon him, if he transgressed a little beyond the limits of a mere explanation. He allowed that the hon. gentleman had one advantage over him: he (Mr. B. Wilbraham) had not been at Manchester at all this year, whereas the hon. gentleman had been there for some weeks.

Mr. Bennet.—I was not there for twenty-four hours.

Mr. Boote Wilbraham.—He knew, however, that the solicitor who had conducted the prosecution at Oldham had been frequently with the hon. member, and therefore that he was well acquainted with the evidence which had been given there. The hon. gentleman had applied to him regarding some facts which were stated to have occurred before the grand jury: those facts he did not feel himself at liberty to communicate, from having been upon it. He would, however, read to them one instance of falsehood, out of many, which had been communicated to him by a noble friend. The House would recollect the indictment which had been presented against Edward Tebbutt, by Elizabeth Farren, who had been hurt in consequence of having fallen into a cellar. After Pearson's fishing advertisement for indictments, this woman had said she was cut by a man in large whiskers; whereas, Tebbutt never had large whiskers in the course of his life.

Mr. Egerton said, that he should not be doing his duty to the magistrates of the county which he had the honour to represent, if he did not declare, that they were as anxious as the House could be to have an inquiry instituted into their conduct; at the same time he thought it right to say, that this was not the proper court in which to institute such an inquiry. If their conduct was investigated in the proper court, and evidence regularly heard regarding it, he had no doubt but that they would come out of such investigation with the purest and most unsullied characters. The worthy member then detailed the proceedings of the magistracy of the two counties of Lancaster and Chester, previous to the 16th of August, as also the military array and tumultuous march of the reformers on that day; and argued, that if the magistrates had not dispersed them in the manner they did, they would have incurred a most dreadful responsibility. He also urged, that all the injuries sustained on that day ought not to be attributed to the magistracy, because, whenever a panic was created among a large multitude, the rush to escape was always attended by dangerous consequences.

Sir W. De Crespigny said, that the best way in which he could characterise the dispersion of the meeting at Manchester by the magistrates and yeomanry, was by calling it an illegal attack upon an unarmed multitude [Coughing.] He trusted that the House, upon so momentous a question as the present, would support him, whilst he mentioned certain facts, which he pledged himself to be able to prove at the bar of the House. A venerable gentleman, a clergyman, had gone to the meeting out of curiosity and a desire to see Hunt. He had waded through the crowd till he arrived at the hustings, and just as he got there, Hunt ascended them. Having satisfied his curiosity, he was departing, when he was induced to turn round, by hearing a body of cavalry advancing with great velocity. The yeomanry halted; a short address was made to them; and then a voice called on them to advance. Shortly afterwards he saw Hunt taken, the flags struck down, and the yeomanry turning their havoc upon their own countrymen and townsmen. He then endeavoured to make his escape as fast as his feeble limbs could carry him, by the street opposite to the hustings. When he got there, he found the soldiers posted across the street; he asked them to let him pass; they refused, and forced him back to the field from which he had just escaped; he went back in the expectation that he should immediately be cut down. When he got there, he recollected that he had a friend who lived on the spot; to his house he directed his steps, and was fortunately seen by his friend whilst on the road. The door was opened to receive him, when a yeoman pursued him so eagerly, that he forced his horse up to the steps. From all this, he was of opinion, that inquiry was necessary; and he could not think that any gentleman in that House could bring himself to vote against the amendment. Was there one man in that House, was there one man without that House, who did not demand an investigation of matters so deeply affecting the dearest interests of the nation? He would conclude by seconding the amendment, which was essential to the defence of the rights of the Crown, of the people, and of the constitution.

Lord Nugent observed, that his majesty's ministers had asserted that the meeting on the 16th of August was illegal. But, not satisfied with asserting the illegality of the meeting, they had asserted that the illegality had been admitted by his hon. and learned friend who had spoken last night. He most unequivocally denied this assertion. No such admission had been made. He allowed that if the noble lord opposite established his statements, then the meeting was illegal; but the proof of those statements depended upon the result of an inquiry. If on inquiry the noble lord's statements should be made out, all would be satisfied. But inquiry was indispensable for this purpose. The noble lord's evidence was not admissible on the subject. It was not admissible in the first place, because it was not evidence in chief, but the remote testimony of consequential circumstances. It was not admissible in the second place, because the noble lord had made himself a party to the transaction in question, by giving his approbation, when that approbation could not be the result of investigation and inquiry. Stress had been laid on the grand jury of Lancaster having thrown out the bills of indictment against the magistrates, as if the grand jury had been trying the legality or illegality of the meeting. But no such thing had come under the consideration of the grand jury. They were called upon to inquire only into the grounds for putting certain individuals on their trial for a capital offence, he believed, under lord Ellenborough's act. Could the noble lord suppose that the grand jury could, on such an occasion, have gone into all the circumstances of the meeting? But, granting that they had, and that they were of opinion that the meeting had been illegal, he begged to be allowed to say, that the unanimous declaration of another jury, upon evidence on both sides of the question before them—he meant the coroner's jury—had pronounced the meeting to have been legal. The opinion of the latter jury was at least equal to that of the former on this question, admitting the former to have declared the meeting illegal. But supposing it demonstrable that the meeting had not been legal, even then, granting that, and granting that the Riot act had been read, audibly and sensibly to the audience, and granting further that one hour had elapsed after it was so read before the dispersion, still not one step was taken towards exculpating ministers for their hasty approval of those proceedings. The case before them was of the greatest importance. A meeting had been put down by the sword—a meeting assembled to discuss objects which every enlightened and honest man must endeavour to prevent, but legally assembled to discuss those objects; such a meeting was dispersed by the sword. He would not state it as a case of rumour of bloodshed, of the ignorant, the unwary, and the helpless—men, women, and children mixed in indiscriminate carnage. It was not necessary to state it so as to excite feelings perhaps already too prevalent. But it was a case which called imperiously for the explanation of one thing—why military force had been at all employed. And if military force was to be employed, why the Manchester yeomanry, the most improper of any, were employed? Useful as yeomanry corps might be, attached as he was to such means of defence, he must say that the yeomanry were the most improper that could be employed on this occasion. Many of them were under the influence and direction of prejudiced men; many were themselves masters, offended and irritated by their workmen; all had feelings of affection or hatred to gratify. Here he would state a fact which he had from the most respectable authority—an authority which he pledged himself to produce at the bar of that House, if inquiry was granted; upon that authority he stated that rations of wine and brandy had been issued to these men before they were called upon to perform this business. Such, indeed, had been the treatment received by the constables from the soldiery, that several of them assembled next day and broke their staves, declaring that they would no longer act under the magistrates. He did not mean to say that they, in doing so, were right, but he mentioned the circumstance to show the feelings entertained of the conduct of the magistrates. He pledged himself to produce to the House his authority for this fact also, if an opportunity should be given for doing so. Upon the fact, then, that many lives were lost by the sword, his Royal Highness was advised to give thanks to those whose swords those lives had been taken away. The House had been told that these circumstances were not a fit matter of inquiry by parliament—that the courts of law were open to the sufferers; but let the House recollect the quarter from which this statement came. Who was the great authority who now pointed to this resource? Who was this ultima ratio juris? Why, it was the very authority who two years ago had introduced indemnity bills for the purpose of preventing all legal redress! Let it be also recollected that when actions were brought against lord Sidmouth and other magistrates, this high authority told them that juries were not the fit tribunal for such questions. Then they were to come to parliament with their complaints. The language of ministers then was—"these are not matters to be decided in a court of law, that is not the proper tribunal, come to parliament, there it is that you are to look for redress." But what was their language now? "You have no right to discuss these matters in parliament, the courts of law are the proper tribunals to which to appeal!!" Thus, as it suited their convenience, ministers drew directly opposite conclusions from the same premises. But was this to be tolerated? Was there to be one law for the magistrates and another for the people? What did the address recommend? Was the liberty of the press to be limited? Were bills to be introduced to give magistrates indemnity for the past and security for the future? Was the Habeas Corpus Act again to be suspended? He sincerely hoped that no attempt would be made to resort to any of those measures. Again, it had been urged that there was a spirit of blasphemy and irreligion widely disseminated through the country. Was this a fact? That there was a feeling of dissatisfaction in the country he admitted; but from what did it arise? Let them not mistake causes for effects. This spirit was created by misgovernment. The people of this country were naturally of a religious, peaceable, and loyal disposition, and generally desirous to obey the laws. This had ever been their character. What was it that had changed their character? He was sorry to hear the hon. member for Bramber, on a former night, support with that eloquence which was so peculiar to him, the opinion that blasphemy and irreligion so generally prevailed. The hon. member's religious horror seemed to have overcome the conviction of fact and evidence. But he hoped that, upon more deliberate consideration, the hon. member would suffer himself to be convinced of the propriety and justice of inquiring into the circumstances of the transactions in question. Let him look at the trial of that poor wretch who had stood charged with publishing blasphemy; let him look at the effect of blasphemies on the crowd assembled in the court; let him recollect the thrill of horror which was excited among them; let him recollect the instant verdict of guilty found against him, while no sympathy or regret was expressed by the spectators. Let the hon. member look at these things, and he would find in them no proof of the prevalence of sedition and blasphemy. He admitted that in a few of the manufacturing districts there were some feelings of this kind entertained; he also knew that there were

persons who for certain purposes pretended to do honour to the rotten bones of the infamous Paine. But how were these opinions to be met? Alas! not by chains, and dungeons, and bayonets. The remedy was, employment for the laborious poor. Let ministers take measures to revive our manufactures; let them open commercial treaties with South America in the one hemisphere, or oblige our faithful ally on the other to open her ports to our trade. He congratulated the House on having assembled so early; but in order to be of use, they must meet the difficulties fairly which pressed upon them. They must look the situation of the country in the face, and induce ministers to do the same. Let ministers look fairly at the situation which they had themselves occasioned. Their measures had given rise to principles, and called forth characters, previously unknown in this country. Let them now look at those principles and characters which their misgovernment had brought into action. Let them look at the poor meeting to petition for objects which, if granted, would soon present the image of ruin to the country and to themselves. But they must also look to the causes of these evils. Let them find confidence to say, and let them find an audience to believe, that these things were owing to the sedition and turbulence of such men as lord Fitzwilliam. They had been told that this subject did not belong to that House. It did, however, most evidently belong to the very question now before them; for that noble earl had been dismissed for petitioning for the very same inquiry, the expediency of which was now under discussion. To say one word upon the character of that illustrious person was indeed unnecessary. But when they saw a nobleman dismissed whose whole life formed the basis of his popularity, and dismissed for an act deserving thanks from his sovereign and his country, it was impossible not to view the occurrence as an indication of the character of the transactions at Manchester, and of the intentions of ministers. When ministers attempted to degrade lord Fitzwilliam for expressing old English jealousy of military attacks on the people, they degraded only themselves. Let the House consider the purpose for which they met. If they separated without inquiry, they might give rise to violence and bloodshed, which every member of that House must deprecate. Let it not go forth to the public, that a number of persons were killed, that his majesty's ministers issued thanks to those who had killed them, and came to that House and desired the House to make itself a party to screening them; and that the House consented to suppress inquiry for that purpose.

Mr. Warren remarked, that the hon. members on the other side had set out by admitting the illegality of the meeting on the 16th of August, but having slept upon the matter, they now came down with a retraction of that admission. Notwithstanding this, however, he had no doubt but he should satisfy the House of the illegality of that meeting. Indeed, if any doubt were entertained on that point, the speech of the right hon. and learned member was calculated to remove it, notwithstanding that that speech was spoken of by another hon. and learned gentleman as special pleading. The hon. gentleman who had opened the debate to-night said, Where is the law? Where is the statute by which a meeting of the description of the 16th is declared illegal?—There was certainly no statute, if that was any satisfaction to the hon. gentleman; but his right hon. and learned friend had argued, that the meeting was illegal on the principles of the common law. But he wished to call to the recollection of the hon. gentleman, that letter which was written by Mr. Hunt, the head of the radicals—that itinerant orator, that mountebank, as the right hon. gentleman opposite had properly called him, before the meeting of the 16th. At Coventry, in his way to Lancashire, he wrote a letter, in which he asserted that it was necessary to make a demonstration of physical force. If the hon. gentleman knew that on the 9th it was intended to add a representative to the House from a borough, which now sent none—was that legal? Even the persons intending to assemble, themselves shrunk from that attempt; and on the 16th, the professed object for which the meeting was called, was conceived in different terms. But would any man say, that the subject discussed on the 16th was different from that proposed to be taken on the 9th? Was any man blind enough to say, that the same object which was proposed to be discussed on the 9th, was not in reality discussed on the 16th? With respect to the meeting on the 16th, it could not be denied but that on that day several thousand persons were assembled—some said 70,000 in all—in Manchester, with Mr. Hunt at the head of them, and that they marched in a sort of military array—that some of the persons who assembled at that meeting had been trained before. Let them consider next what the banners were. One of them had a female figure on it with a bloody dagger in her hand—that was necessarily connected with an alteration of the law. Another had on it an inscription of “Equal Representation or Death.” Now he would ask any hon. member, if Mr. Hunt had said to the meeting, we will endeavour by every means in our power to obtain an equal representation, even if we should be put to death in making the attempt, would not that have been a seditious speech? But what was the difference between a sentiment of this kind in the mouth of a speaker or on a banner? What was the difference between words uttered in a speech at a meeting, and words emblomed on the banner under which the people met? The meeting was clearly an illegal meeting. Then were the magistrates justified in the course which they pursued? On the statement of circumstances calculated to excite alarm made to them on oath, they issued a warrant to arrest Mr. Hunt. So far, at least, the magistrates had conducted themselves with prudence and propriety. The next question was, as the meeting was illegal, in what manner it was to be dispersed? If the meeting was illegal, as he conceived it was, it became the duty of the magistrates to disperse it. The magistrates had two different steps to take—one was, to arrest Mr. Hunt; another, to disperse the meeting. Then came the question, whether the manner of the dispersion was such as to be justified by the circumstances which then occurred, or not? And here he contended, that the House was not the proper place for an inquiry into this part of the subject, as the courts of law were open. This was a matter to be determined by judges and juries, and not to be inquired into at the bar of the House. An hon. and learned gentleman had said, that the magistrates might have acted in such a way as to call for an inquiry into their conduct at the bar of the House, though the wrong done by them might not be such as could be taken cognizance of by courts of law. But would any member say, that any thing could be an offence here which was not an offence at common law? If inquiry was entered on, and it should appear that criminality attached to the magistrates, what would be the result? The House must order them to be prosecuted. And thus, after all the evidence taken at the bar of the House, they must be sent back to the tribunal, out of the hands of which the inquiry was taken. The decision of the grand jury on the bills sent up to them was, so far, a proof that the magistrates were innocent. It had been asked, how it happened that the attorney-general had been able to have a variety of bills found against a variety of persons, while Mr. Hunt was not able to succeed in the same object? It had been suggested, that it was because this individual had not property sufficient to enable him to prosecute, now, the very attempt already made by Mr. Hunt showed that that there was money somewhere to enable him to carry on the prosecution if necessary. One attorney, or more had been employed; so that it would not appear that there was any want of money to carry proceedings on, if they had been thought likely to succeed. The inference was, as no steps had been taken, that the magistrates were innocent. This was a prima facie case in favour of the magistrates. Was it to be laid down as a rule, that whenever, by any accident, a loss of life or limb took place, the House were called on to interfere? A right hon. gentleman, who spoke very early in the debate, had said, that the House was in such a situation from the state of the representation, that it had lost the confidence of the country, and that very little regard was paid to its decisions; and yet, in the very same breath in which he said the country reposed no confidence in the House, did he propose to bring forward this inquiry. Such was the consistency of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Phillips said, that if he comprehended correctly the purport of the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down, that hon. and learned gentleman had certainly misunderstood his hon. friend. It did not follow, from the hon. and learned gentleman's own showing even, that the conduct of the magistrates of Manchester was justifiable; because, admitting that the meeting of the 16th of August was an illegal meeting, it did not necessarily result that it was a riotous one; for although in his own view of the law, a riotous meeting was therefore an illegal one, yet it was not thence to be inferred, as matter of course, that if illegal, it must be riotous. Admitting even that the meeting was illegal, did the magistrates exercise a sound discretion in proceeding as they did with that meeting; he felt a great delicacy in delivering any opinion on the conduct of the magistrates of Manchester, because he was aware, that the conduct of the people at Manchester and its vicinity, some time previous to the meeting of the 16th was such as to excite a very general, and, as he thought, a very well-founded alarm. The moment he was informed of the drillings, and other transactions carrying on in Lancashire, he was convinced that they were of a character incompatible with good order and tranquillity; and he had no hesitation in now declaring his belief, that never was there a time at which it was more important to the real welfare of the country, that the civil authorities should be protected, supported, and upheld; and that under the difficult circumstances in which they were placed, the magistrates should proceed in such a manner as to command the approbation of all respectable men. He had up to this time cautiously avoided doing or saying any thing respecting the proceedings of the 16th, least they might be considered to pledge him to do or say any thing on the subject; for he conceived that he had an important duty to discharge in that House, and that he ought not to do any thing which might have a tendency to bias him on the subject, or which might operate as an obstacle in the way of his obtaining from individuals a communication of such facts as they might be able to give him. In comparing the information which he had received upon the subject—with the papers before the House—he did not mean to state the thing more positively—but there did appear to him to be such differences as authorized inquiry. He had his views of the facts; but without stating what they were, he might be allowed to observe, that it appeared to him, the noble lord who had spoken in an early part of the evening must have been very much misinformed. In what the noble lord had said he seemed to have detracted very much from the value of the thanks which had been given to the magistrates. Now, he found it stated on the one hand, that the warrants could not be executed without the assistance of the military power; and on the other, that an avenue was preserved from the House where the magistrates assembled, up to, or very nearly up to, the hustings upon which the parties were stationed. This appeared from Mr. Hay's letter. It had never been clearly explained what was the motive upon which the magistrates had acted in that case. It would have been surely advisable, before the military aid was called in, to have tried whether, by means of this avenue, the warrants, as had been stated to be the fact, could not have been executed by the civil power alone. It had never been asserted, that in the first instance an attempt was made to execute the warrants, without the military, and that such attempt failed. It had been asserted, that the persons who were near the hustings were locked arm in arm, and that it was on that account impossible to approach the hustings. On the other hand it had been said, that the persons in question were locked arm in arm to preserve a space open to the hustings. But whatever was the fact, it would at least have been advisable to see whether the warrant could not be executed by the civil power alone, before calling in the military. Another assertion which had been made was, that the yeomanry, in their attempt to seize Mr. Hunt, were assaulted and resisted. It was asserted on the other side, that no resistance was made by any part of the meeting, at least until after the advance of the yeomanry to the hustings. Persons who went there merely to make their own observations, not one of whom approved of the meeting, but even disapproved of it as much as he himself did, and were friendly to ministers, did assure him that not a single stone was thrown in the advance of the yeomanry to the hustings. This was a fact of infinite importance. What, he would ask, was to have prevented the civil power, when there was no opposition to the advance of the yeomanry to the hustings? The noble lord had said, that the magistrates read the proclamation in the Riot act three times over, in order that the persons on the ground might be aware that the meeting was illegal. It was really most unfortunate, however, that the poor people assembled at the meeting were not at all aware of any such proclamation having been made. One poor man who went there for the protection of his own property which happened to be situated in a place immediately adjoining the house in which the magistrates were, had told him that he was on the ground from eleven o'clock till the meeting was over, and yet he had never heard the Riot act read—that no one near him had ever heard it read—and he had never seen any one who heard it read. The noble lord had said the magistrates had no intention to disperse the meeting in the manner it was dispersed. Was it not, then, most unfortunate, if the Riot act was read to give notice that the meeting was illegal, and that it would be dispersed unless the people retired quietly from the ground without delay, that the notice was given in such a manner as to prevent the possibility of its being heard? Mr. Hay's letter made it extremely doubtful when the Riot act was read, whether it was read before the advance of the military, or during that advance, or after it. It contained no correct information as to the time when the Riot act was actually read. He really could apply no particular meaning to the letter—it was impossible for him to judge, either what time the Riot act was read, or what time the resistance on the part of the people began. On this subject, therefore, it was impossible for him to form a judgment without farther facts—and he therefore conceived that an inquiry into the case became necessary. It did appear to him that an inquiry by the House of Commons was the only manner in which the popular irritation which now existed could be allayed; or justice done in the matter. The situation in which the magistrates had been placed was certainly extremely arduous, and he should be extremely rejoiced to find from the result of such an inquiry, that they had exercised that sound discretion which every one would wish they might prove to have done. He considered that the House would not perform the duty they owed to themselves and to the country, if they did not direct such an investigation to be instituted; and he called upon them to remember what had been said upon that point by a well-known, able, and luminous writer, the power of whose oratory had often been felt within those walls: "A vigilant and jealous eye over executory and judicial magistracy; an anxious care of public money, an openness approaching towards facility to public complaint: these seem to be the true, characteristics of a House of Commons. But an addressing House of Commons and a petitioning nation; A House of Commons full of confidence, when the nation is plunged in despair ..... who, in all disputes between the people and administration, presume against the people; who punish their disorders, but refuse even to inquire into the provocations to them—this is an unnatural, a monstrous state of things in such a constitution." He really could see no danger from an inquiry. At all events an inquiry could not throw the public mind into a more alarming state than that in which it was. The working people had been taught to believe that their condition would be benefitted by that species of reform which they supported, and they were, therefore, disposed to do all they could to promote it. They were zealous, he granted, in furthering the object they had in view. There were indeed, some who might endeavour to increase the exciting discontent, for the purpose of pushing the poor people on to objects which they did not contemplate; but though there might be individuals who had such mischievous intentions, he could not believe that the many thousands who advocated parliamentary reform, were not sincere in their objects. In the manufacturing districts, a great and most lamentable change had taken place. The people, from receiving high wages had come to receive low wages. If their condition was the same as it formerly was, the House would have heard nothing of this discontent. But they must not deceive themselves—the real difficulty they had to contend with was the severity of taxation, operating on all classes, but most on the lower classes. Low as wages were in England, they were still lower on the continent; but then on the continent provisions were cheaper. This was the difficulty. But what was the remedy? It was not easy, he confessed, to find one. But at all events every retrenchment which was practicable ought to be made. Even when the retrenchment was comparatively of a trifling amount, yet for the sake of principle, it ought to be made. But he was sorry to say, that even the most trifling savings, were always opposed, however frivolous the grounds on which such opposition was made. Nothing tended more to spread discontent among the people than this disposition on the part of government. He did really believe, that in the manufacturing districts it was almost universally supposed, that nothing but plunder and the grossest pe-

culatation were going forward. This was a gross infatuation, he was ready to allow, but still it was believed; and he thought that the House of Commons were called upon to show by their conduct that they were entitled to the confidence of the country. The House of Commons, by their conduct on one important subject, might regain that confidence, he meant, by agreeing to that reform which was now so generally desired. He knew he was delivering a very unpopular doctrine. But if it was not popular in the House, it was very popular out of it, not merely with the lower classes, but he believed with an infinite majority of the middling classes throughout the country; and in all our difficulties we must rely on the exertions of the middling classes. He believed an infinite majority of the middling classes were for a moderate and temperate constitutional reform. And why should parliament be unwilling to consent to such a reform? Why should not the representation be suited to the varying circumstances of the country? It would certainly be a most wonderful circumstance if they had had the good luck to hit upon that representation which would not admit a possibility of advantageous change. We ourselves had witnessed a very important change in the representation of Ireland, which had become more popular, without any bad effect having resulted from it. What great mischief could arise if Scotland were gratified—if an attempt were made to improve its representation—if that could be called representation which was not representation? What great harm could happen if the representation of some of the notoriously corrupt and trading boroughs were transferred to Manchester, Birmingham, and some other places? He believed, if a serious attempt at this sort of constitutional amendment were made, it would do more to put down the evil disposition which he was sorry to say did exist in some districts, than any other course which could be adopted. It had been wisely said, that the bulk of mankind were little curious about any theories when they were happy, and that it was a sure proof of a misconduct on the part of those who governed them, when a whole people were discontented. The advice which the noble marquis who spoke last night, gave the House, and which was worthy of the noble family to which he belonged, was most judicious, and every way deserving of their attention.

The Solicitor General confessed, that the course of observations which had been pursued by the hon. member for Shrewsbury, appeared to him to afford a practical illustration of the mischief of indulging in comments on the proceedings at Manchester. There was a judicial proceeding at this moment depending before the coroner, which might affect the lives of the individuals, against whom it was directed. That proceeding had been adjourned at a certain stage, evidence having been heard on the one side, and partially only on the other, in consequence of most unjustifiable conduct on the part of some persons, tending to pervert the due course of justice. It was a proceeding which had been for a time deferred. While, however, it was yet pending, possessing as it did so grave a character, an hon. member had thought himself justified in bringing before that House, and through the House before the public, a part only of such evidence, coupled with inflammatory statements, tending to defeat the ends of justice in a manner almost unprecedented. The whole system of proceeding adopted by honourable gentlemen on this occasion was most extraordinary. He felt a great satisfaction at the tone and temper adopted by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, with respect to the character of the meeting of the 16th, in the course of the debate of last night. For three long months the country had been told, in every form in which it could be told, that that was a peaceful and legal meeting; and that the magistrates were not justified in interfering with it. He felt, therefore, grateful for the observations of yesterday, by the gentlemen on the other side, beginning with the right hon. gentleman who opened the debate, in which it was implied at least that the meeting was illegal [Mr. Tierney here said across the table, "I never said any thing of the kind."] —He had not said that the right hon. gentleman stated the meeting was illegal; but, from the course of observations pursued, it was quite clear, as he thought, what was passing in his mind on the subject. The hon. gentleman who succeeded him had not stated that it possessed a legal character. Of how much consequence would it have been to their argument, if they had stated it was a legal meeting. When, therefore, they did not take that course, it was a fair presumption, they considered the meeting illegal. But an hon. and learned friend of his had not been so guarded—he had admitted, in the most distinct and unqualified manner, that the meeting was not of an illegal character—he had not only allowed, in the outset of his speech, but afterwards, in the most unqualified terms, in the course of it, that it was an illegal meeting.

Mr. Scarlett rose to order. He appealed to the chair whether, after the explanation which he had given last night in consequence of what he supposed an involuntary misunderstanding of what he said, any hon. member was justified in repeating the misrepresentation.

Mr. Banks said, that the interruption was irregular on the part of the hon. and learned gentleman. It certainly was not competent to any member to interrupt another member while speaking (though it was sometimes done by permission of the member speaking), in order to explain any misrepresentation, but it was competent afterwards to rise and give the explanation.

The Speaker concurred in his opinion. If for convenience, or by courtesy, an opportunity was allowed a member to correct any misunderstanding of a member addressing the House, this was to be thankfully received; but though it was an ordinary courtesy of the House to allow a mis-statement or misapprehension to be instantly corrected, as often saving time and further misapprehension, this could not be demanded as a right by any member.

The Solicitor-General continued, if his hon. and learned friend had waited for the sequence of his assertion, he would have endeavoured to show that his hon. and learned friend was not warranted in the premises he had assumed. He had assumed that the meeting was not illegal on the statement of the noble lord. He would recall to the memory of his hon. and learned friend what that statement referred to. The facts mentioned by the noble lord all related to the events which had occurred after the meeting had assembled. His hon. and learned friend had thrown out an argument of an extraordinary character, viz. that an impression had gone abroad that the ministers were determined to put down meetings for redress of grievances by force of arms, and he had hinted that the legal advisers of the Crown might have been the cause of this determination. What did his hon. and learned friend find in the character of the legal advisers of the Crown to countenance such an idea? He felt himself bound not to let such an insinuation pass without repelling it. It had hitherto been the policy of the gentlemen on the other side to pass lightly over the question of the legality of the meeting of the 16th, to create an erroneous impression, that the magistrates without sufficient warrant “let loose,” as the phrase was, the military on the people. It was impossible to judge the magistrates fairly without examining the character of that meeting. That it was an illegal meeting alone might not be deemed sufficient by the House to warrant the proceedings which had taken place; but to him it was completely evident that the character of the meeting was almost treasonable, and that the magistrates were not only justified, but that they would have been guilty of a complete dereliction of their duty if they had taken a course different from that which they had. As other parts of the argument had been exhausted, he should refer briefly to the facts on which his inference was founded that the meeting was illegal. He should go back to the time of the prorogation of parliament. The moment the parliament was prorogued, the reformers commenced their operations. This he asserted, not from private information, but from the acts and documents of the reformers themselves. No sooner had that event taken place, but meetings were held, most alarming in their numbers and the nature of their proceedings. The avowed object of them was reform, on the principle of annual parliaments, universal suffrage and vote by ballot; in other words, the overthrow of the constitution. The meetings were conducted by persons who made a trade of attending them; by persons holding the most inflammatory and seditious language—“The parliament had forfeited its claim to obedience—the prince had forfeited his claim to allegiance—Charles and James had been, one beheaded, the other exiled, and the present sovereign must meet with the fate of one or other;”—this was the language used, not on one, but on every occasion, and it was promulgated and enforced in publications, in a cheap form, circulated with an activity, of which the House could have no conception. The overthrow of the government by physical force was over and over avowed as a legitimate object. Another formidable engine was found in the union societies, who corresponded with one another, and acted in concert, than which nothing could be imagined more dangerous to a state. This was the state of affairs at the beginning of August, and it was then that a meeting was planned in order to use their own language, to make a display of their force, and to overawe their adversaries. In judging of the character of a transaction, it was of use to look to that of the actors. An individual was sent for, who had no connexion with the county of Lancaster, Mr. Hunt. To show that the meeting had not merely an illegal, but a traitorous character, they should look to the conduct of this person. Hunt was the person who had presided at a meeting held in July, in Smithfield, in which resolutions were passed, that the parliament was not entitled to the obedience of the country, that after a certain time the laws should not be obeyed, and that the national debt "impudently so called," was not binding on the nation. It had been argued that the law officers had not been mindful of their duty, in allowing such resolutions to pass unnoticed. The law officers had not been negligent, they had endeavoured to obtain evidence, to connect the resolutions with the principal actors, in order to proceed by criminal information; but it was only on the eve of the 16th of August, that they had obtained that evidence, and it was only on account of the events of that day, which seemed to be on a greater scale, that the prosecution was given up. This was the person who was selected to preside at that meeting. Another person of the name of Harrison was present at that meeting, of whom the public had heard much. It had been thrown out, that this person had been allowed to retire from Stockport, that the warrant against him might be executed at the meeting in London. This was not correct. He absconded, and the officers who followed him first found him on the hustings at the Smithfield meeting. This Mr. Harrison, the day before the 16th August, was haranguing the people at Stockport, who intended to be present at the meeting, and insisted that parliament ought not to be obeyed. Another individual was present whom they had heard of, Mr. Johnson; he was not present at Smithfield, but he had sent a letter to that meeting, in which he declared, that he would be satisfied with nothing less than annual parliaments, universal suffrage, and vote by ballot, and that the reformers in the North were in ecstasy at being joined by their brethren in the South. Another individual was Mr. Carlile, to whom he would not allude merely on account of the offences of which he had been found guilty. This individual had a shop in the metropolis, on which had been inscribed Office for the Sale of Republican and Deistical Works. He conducted also a paper called the Republican. He knew not whether it had met the observation of gentlemen in that House; for it was the peculiar evil of these cheap publications, that while they found a circulation among the classes most exposed to their noxious influence, they had no circulation among those whose information might enable them to expose and counteract them. In this publication he had poured forth his sentiments profusely—"We had a mock king, and a mock parliament—it was now time to take up arms to play the man."—These were no unfavourable samples, they were rather tame and insipid compared with the general character of the work. There was a letter addressed particularly to the soldiery, in which he told them they were bound to obey the king, "but not a boroughmongering faction," for that was the name which this writer gave to a faction which was supposed to rule over this House, but under that name he included all legal authorities. Such were the persons who were invited to attend a meeting called under these circumstances. Another fact to show the character of the meeting, was, that persons for weeks previously, had assembled in the night, and in retired places, 5 or 6,000 at a time, to learn the military exercise. This fact was at first doubted, and it was asserted to be only a fiction of government for their own purposes; but the matter was placed beyond controversy by the evidence of persons who had witnessed, and who were severely ill-used for having come to view those drillings. The assertion of Hunt with respect to those meetings was, that the men were only "playing at soldiers;" that they had nothing else to do, and resorted to this practice for amusement; but it was most important to consider, that a great many of the persons so engaged were men who had served in the line or in the local or general militia, and that they went through their exercises as well as the most disciplined troops. From the papers on the table, however, it would appear that mere amusement was not the object they had in view, for it was proved that they intended to resist the soldiers on the 16th of August. On the morning of that day most of the shops in Manchester were shut, and at an early hour large columns of men were seen with music and flags (of which he would speak presently), marching to the town in different directions—not arm in arm, for the sake of order, as had been asserted, but in regular military array, commanded by officers, and obeying their orders with all the regularity of disciplined soldiers. They did not proceed immediately to the hustings; that would not have answered their object; but marched through various parts of the town, taking their station at particular points, and waiting the arrival of more troops. Now, he would assert, that if any number of men assembled, so as to excite terror in the minds of peaceable subjects, such an assembly was in point of law illegal, and in fact a riot. There were many authorities which he might cite for this opinion, but he would only mention one. It was that of a great lawyer and distinguished judge: he meant lord Holt—a man who had been pre-eminently distinguished as a friend to the liberties of the people. He trusted the House would bear this opinion in mind, and referring it to the meeting which took place on the 16th, they would find it exactly applicable to the character of that meeting. The meeting assembled as he had described, was arrayed under banners; one was inscribed “Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments and Election by Ballot;” that is to say, an overthrow of the constitution. This was the object; the means were explained by other banners:—“Let us die like men, and not be sold like slaves;” “Equal Representation or Death.” The evident meaning of the whole united was, that they would have no compromise; that they would have equal representation at the hazard of their lives. Could any one doubt that such inscriptions, sanctioned as they must have been, by the immense assemblage before whom they were carried, were calculated to strike terror into all peaceable subjects? The magistrates, then, had no discretion on the subject; they were bound both by common and by statute law to disperse such a meeting. The civil power was called out, and a military force stationed to aid them if necessary: for as lord Holt said, in the opinion on this subject to which he had alluded, “Who can moderate the event? who can foresee the result?” Yet the magistrates acted with a caution approaching to timidity. They had on that day received communications as to the nature and object of the meeting, from several of the most respectable inhabitants of the town; and on these they had granted the warrant to apprehend the parties. He had heard it said, “Why arrest them then? Why not wait till the meeting was over? To this he would say, Why should they have waited? Were they to have waited till the speeches of the several orators had produced their effect on the surrounding crowds? Why wait until the mischief had broken out? If they had done so, and violent disorders had ensued, what would have been said on the other side? Why, that there had been a neglect of duty, and we should have heard of the expediency of filing criminal informations for that neglect. What had been the consequence in the riots in 1780, when the magistrates had been so neglectful of their duty? What was the case three years ago in Spa-fields. The orators were allowed to assemble; they did so, and one of them jumped from the hustings, called upon the multitude to follow him, and the result was that the metropolis was thrown into alarm and confusion for four or five hours. But it was said, why not try the civil power? He answered, that there were many things which it was not necessary to try, because it was evident they could not succeed. Nadin the officer declared that it was impossible to execute the warrant without the assistance of the military. The men were united six deep about the hustings. The hustings had originally been placed in a different part of the field, and a double line of special constables was opened to it, but this did not suit the purpose of the directors of the meeting; the hustings were removed, and this cordon was formed round it to cut off communication.—The yeomanry troops, before they had attempted to strike a blow, were attacked by the crowd with stones and brickbats, some of them unhorsed and their horses thrown. At this time the 15th hussars came on the ground, and colonel Dalrymple was requested to send some assistance to rescue the yeomanry. Here was a riot created in resistance to a warrant. It had been said, that excess had been committed. Why, if it had, were the magistrates to be blamed? They had not ordered such excess; and if it was said to have been committed by the soldiers, was there not a coroner's inquest sitting, to inquire into the charges against these soldiers? The grand jury had, it was said, thrown out some bills preferred against those soldiers; was not that a prima facie case in their favour? Whatever the events of the 16th of August were, no inference could be drawn from it, as to the inclination of the ministers to suppress meetings by force, for except that a meeting was to take place, they had no previous knowledge of the arrangements of that day. Whatever the magistrates did, was done by their own authority, with a view to guard against the mischiefs which were apprehended from the meeting.

Mr. Scarlett, in explanation, denied having ever said, or meant to say, that his hon. and learned friend, the solicitor-general, or his hon. and learned colleague, had advised his majesty's ministers to resort to military force against the people. From all he had known of his hon. and learned friend, he believed him incapable of such conduct, unless, indeed, his opinions had lately undergone a very material alteration.

Sir Francis Burdett said, it was not his intention to trespass long on the indulgence of the House; at the same time, he should feel himself guilty of a dereliction of his duty as a member of that House, if he did not accept the invitation which had been thrown out, and speak his mind freely and plainly on the very critical circumstances in which, it was admitted on all hands, the country was at present placed. With respect to the causes of the difficulties and the dangers of the country, he differed in opinion from many of the hon. gentlemen who had preceded him. The causes were now too obvious to escape the observation of any enlightened person not interested in that system of wasteful expenditure which had brought upon the country an amount of taxation which it was not able to bear, and to which some gentlemen ascribed that disaffection which was said to prevail in the country—a disaffection which, if it really existed (and he denied its existence to the extent alleged), must be remedied by measures very different from those which were likely to be now proposed. In cases of rooted evil like this, wise men would look to the cause, while ignorant men would resort, not to a correction of the cause, but to palliatives which were ultimately productive of a greater evil than that which they were intended to diminish. A great many strange assertions had been made in the course of the debate, some which would formerly have been deemed inconsistent with constitutional doctrines; some which even, when he was first a member of that House, would not have been hazarded, or if hazarded, would have been received with a disapprobation, that would have prevented repetition. There had been so many contradictory statements of facts, so many contradictory modes of argument, on the question before the House, that the necessity of inquiry was sufficiently proved by those who opposed it. Among the reasoners upon the subject, there had been two, whose arguments might be classed together, the hon. and learned gentleman who last spoke and his hon. and learned friend, if he would now permit him to call him so, the chief justice of Chester. He had been long enough a member of that House not to be surprised at any thing, but nothing could be more calculated to surprise him than to witness his hon. and learned friend rising to make that speech which it had been his good fortune or bad fortune to hear: for from what he had formerly known of that hon. and learned gentleman, he should have expected very different sentiments from him. The speeches of those two hon. and learned gentlemen were in direct contradiction to the speech of the noble lord. The right hon. gentlemen on the other side might perhaps congratulate themselves on the accession of legal aid which they had acquired, and, indeed, it was evident that that accession to their strength was increasing every year; but upon great constitutional questions, he might be permitted to say without offence, that there were no members of that House to whom he listened with less deference, than to gentlemen of the long robe, however willingly he might bow to their authority on legal questions. He certainly did not think, that on the present occasion these learned gentlemen had aided the line of defence pursued by the noble lord. By the course which the noble lord had adopted, all proceedings antecedent to the arrest of Mr. Hunt were to be put out of the question entirely: and it was admitted that till that time the magistrates had no right to interfere.

But what said the hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down? He said that all the meetings previous to that of Manchester on the 16th August had been not only riotous and tumultuous, but treasonable; he said that treason had been concocted before the meeting at Manchester took place. But where were the proofs of this treason? "Those were cruel times when men were traitors without knowing it." The unfortunate persons at Manchester were not aware of their treason. On the contrary, they proved by their conduct that they meant to act consistently with the laws. It was true, indeed, that they meant to act in such a manner as should give effect to the purpose of their meeting. But let the House look at the situation of the people. Perhaps for fifty years, but in a more marked manner for ten or twelve, the opinion of the people had been declared in favour of a reform in parliament. It was not his intention to enter at present into the nature of the reform which they required; but it would be admitted that those opinions did not furnish a sufficient ground for putting them to death by the sword, and that admission was sufficient for his argument. The hon. and learned gentleman had said, that on former occasions magistrates had not acted with sufficient promptitude and effect; but surely it was no argument to say, that because the people had not formerly been punished with sufficient severity, they ought in this case to be visited with a punishment greater than they deserved. There might be, on the part of the executive government, sins of omission as well as of commission; and he believed they had to answer for many of the former description; but their having neglected to discharge their duty on one occasion, could never authorize them to exceed it on another. The hon. and learned gentleman had talked of the banners displayed on this occasion as indicative of the feeling by which the people were actuated; as if the people had never before assembled under banners, expressing their sentiments. Why, one of the most obnoxious of these banners bore the inscription "Death or Liberty;" and that, surely, was a sentiment inscribed on the heart of every Briton. Whether it was desirable that such meeting should take place was quite a different question: what he said was, that they did not afford a sufficient cause for subjecting the people to military execution. They might be made the ground for enacting new laws, but not for violating the existing laws. The argument of the hon. and learned gentleman was a strange prelude to the proposal for increased legal power. Far from showing that the power of the law was deficient, he showed quite the contrary. The law, according to him, was surely strong and severe enough. On a great constitutional point like the present, he was ready to meet any gentleman in that House or elsewhere, for such a question required no legal knowledge; all that was necessary was honesty, joined to a common understanding. The conduct of the chief justice of Chester had greatly surprised him on this occasion, and he was afraid that the learned gentleman had been rather unfortunate in his debut. When he considered the great judgment which the hon. and learned gentleman had displayed on other occasions, and his former opinions upon constitutional questions (which he could never cease to remember), he thought it wonderful, since the hon. and learned gentleman might at a future period have to decide as judge upon the question of the Manchester proceedings, that he should have thought the present a proper occasion for declaring his opinions on the subject. The hon. and learned gentleman had declared that he had no doubt that the meeting was illegal: and this point ministers had imagined they might obtain as it were surreptitiously, supposing that no hon. gentleman would rise to deny the illegality of the meeting. The hon. and learned gentleman had argued as if the meeting at Manchester were admitted to be illegal by their opponents on that side of the House; but the fact was not so; for the argument on that side had been, that whether the Manchester meeting were legal or illegal, a parliamentary inquiry should be instituted under all the circumstances of the case. If that meeting were legal a fortiori such an inquiry should take place in consequence of the extraordinary means adopted to disperse it. But was it not matter calling for inquiry, how it happened that ministers should have advised the Prince Regent to return such an extraordinary answer to the address of the city of London, or that his Royal Highness should have been persuaded to express his satisfaction at the conduct of the magistrates and yeomanry of Manchester. For what was his Royal Highness thus persuaded to applaud? Not the discretion, moderation, or forbearance of the persons alluded to, but their promptness in shedding the blood of their countrymen. Yes, this was the conduct, which, as it was held forth to the country, gave satisfaction to the royal breast. What responsibility was not incurred on the part of ministers by whose advice the Regent had been induced to put forth such an extraordinary publication? The House had been told, that the Riot act was read before the yeomanry were ordered to make a charge upon the people. But the reading of the Riot act did not authorize the shedding of the blood of men, women and children. Such a proposition could not be seriously maintained for a moment. But how could the reading of the Riot act warrant the cutting down of even the peace-officers employed by the magistrates themselves, for some of these officers were among the sufferers at the Manchester meeting. Yet, where was the evidence that the meeting was such as called for the reading of the Riot act at all? The mere assemblage of people could not be said to imply a riot, unless such meeting appeared to be collected for a riotous or illegal purpose; or, otherwise, if a parcel of old women assembled, it might be maintained, that the Riot act should be read to them, lest they should set fire to the town. The Riot act, that disgrace to the Statute book, was never, with all its faults, intended for the purpose of authorizing military execution. What did it say? Did it say that if the people did not instantly disperse, they were to be cut, maimed, and killed indiscriminately; and if so, that no inquiry was to be demanded? No; it said that you were to give them warning, to read the act, and to allow them time to disperse. If they did not disperse, what then was to be done? Put them to death? No: they were to be taken into custody; and all violence necessary for that purpose might be used, but they were not to be wantonly sabred, trodden down, and shot. As to the military, the Riot act did not notice them even, for, at the time it was passed, it was never contemplated that the military were to interfere on such occasions. Nothing of the kind appears in the act itself. It was a lawyer (Lord Mansfield), whose authority was often quoted for maxims by no means congenial with the British constitution, who first laid it down, that as soldiers did not, as such, forfeit their privileges as citizens, they might be legally employed in aid of the civil power. But, as soldiers were now transferred from the pale of the constitution, and placed under an arbitrary jurisdiction, which could enforce obedience, and impose punishment, by means unknown to our established laws, they ought not to be employed in the manner in which lord Mansfield and the hon. and learned gentleman on the other side recommended. He by no means entertained the apprehension of the conduct of British soldiers which the Roman poet's description of the language of a mercenary soldier would induce—

“Pectore si fratris gladium juguloque Parentis

“Condere me jubeas, gravidaque in viscera Patri,

“Conjugis, invita peragam tamen omnia dextra.”

He was satisfied that the feeling and principle of his military countrymen were quite of a different description. He hoped that no minister would ever dare to employ them for the purpose of oppressing the people; and, if ever a minister of this country should dare to make the attempt, he was persuaded the soldiers would not allow themselves to be made the instruments of subverting the constitution. Such was his firm impression.—But to return to the Riot act, severe as that law was, and inconsistent as it had always been deemed with the benevolent principles of the British constitution, it was now it seemed regarded as too lenient by the ministers and agents of our government. For the Riot act did not warrant military execution, but merely provided, that if the people did not disperse within an hour after that act was read, they should be taken into custody, not to be sabred, but to be brought to trial. Such, however, was not the view taken of the subject by the magistrates of Manchester, when they let loose the yeomanry upon the meeting of the 16th of August.—But it was said that the force employed on that occasion had in view the dispersion of a dangerous—nay, treasonable meeting. Now, if it were the object to prevent this meeting (and prevention would have been much more easy than dispersion), how came it that Mr. Hunt, who was deemed the principal of the meeting, was not taken into custody before the meeting took place? If the head had been arrested, the natural probability was that the body would not have moved. The noble secretary for foreign affairs had made rather a skilful defence upon the occasion;

but his hon. and learned friends beside him had in the course of their observations, betrayed that the noble lord's main positions were untenable. It was known that Mr. Hunt acted in this instance with much more discretion than the magistrates. He went to the magistrates of Manchester previously to the meeting, and told them that if they had a warrant against him to serve it then, because if it should be done at the meeting, he could not answer for the consequences. His hon. and learned friend (the chief justice of Chester), and the solicitor-general, had, with others, maintained that the meeting at Manchester was quite illegal; if so, then why was not that made known to the magistrates before the meeting, and then Mr. Hunt might have been prevented from attending it? His majesty's ministers had no doubt frequent communication with the Manchester magistrates, and why then was not the opinion of the Crown lawyers made known to those magistrates in due time?—Had this been done, what mischief might not have been prevented? The Solicitor-general had observed, that it would have been very wrong to postpone measures until mischief was actually done, and this observation the hon. and learned gentleman made with a view to justify the sudden and forcible execution of the warrant against Mr. Hunt in the midst of the meeting. But he would ask that hon. and learned gentleman, whether according to the principle of his observation it would not have been better to execute the warrant alluded to before the meeting was convened, than to order its execution when the assemblage of the people were so dense that the yeomanry could not advance without force, and as their defenders had said, without sabring the people. Why, he would again ask, had not ministers instructed the magistrates of Manchester that the whole proceedings were illegal? Why had Mr. Hunt been allowed by the magistrates to go on in those treasonable practices till the very point of time when the warrant could not be served without shedding blood? The discharge of this duty was delayed till the people were wedged close around the hustings, and then it was executed by dashing in among them, sabring them, and trampling them to the ground. Military execution, it seemed, was the method adopted of serving a legal warrant. It was said that the military would not have interfered, if the people had not placed themselves so close together as to prevent the officers from reaching the hustings; and all he should say on that was, that such a position was not a very strong indication of their intention to use force. As to the line of troops drawn round the meeting, to prevent the people from dispersing, it could be called nothing but a plan to shed blood. The House had the authority of an hon. baronet on the floor, that the people were not allowed to disperse, the only outlets from the place where the meeting was held being actually blocked up by the soldiery.—According to the hon. baronet's statement, indeed, a body of people endeavouring to find their way by a particular outlet were actually sabred. His hon. and learned friend and the solicitor general had specially rested their opposition to the proposed inquiry on this ground, that any persons aggrieved might obtain redress through an appeal to a court of law, but it held out no great encouragement for such an appeal, to find the meeting at which so many suffered, denounced as illegal, by those through whom alone redress could be obtained. Those who called for parliamentary inquiry considered that many of the parties who had suffered on this occasion were unable to obtain justice at the expense which attended proceedings in the courts of law. It was true the men whom Meagher, the trumpeter, had shot from his window, if they could afford to prosecute him, might get a verdict against him; and the women who had been sabred by the yeomanry, if they could identify the persons who cut them down, might obtain redress from the laws. But what was all this to the House of Commons? What had this to do with the complaint of the people of England? What had this to do with the breach of the constitution involved in the whole of the transaction alluded to? What had it to do with the conduct of ministers, who, he firmly believed, were at the bottom of this transaction? The attainment of redress by individuals could not acquit the ministers and magistrates, or vindicate the constitution, and therefore the House was in his opinion bound to institute the proposed inquiry. To satisfy the country this inquiry ought to be gone into. The lieutenant of police, lord Sidmouth, who exercised a sort of authority hitherto unknown in this country, whose whole system appeared to be borrowed from France, should be called upon to account for his conduct, and by what means could that be done, unless the House of Commons institute an inquiry. The solicitor-general in dilating upon the means through which redress might be had for the sufferers at Manchester by the ordinary course of law, had particularly dwelt upon the inquest, in the conduct of which a London attorney (Mr. Harmer) had acquitted himself in a manner so creditable to his talents and zeal. But how could the conduct or result of that inquest serve to satisfy the injured constitution of the country? Was it possible that any man with a drop of English blood in his veins can deem such proceedings sufficient to satisfy the claims of justice for the outrageous conduct at Manchester? As to the argument derived from a supposed prejudging of the question, he conceived that when he said a murder, or any other criminal act had been committed, he did not prejudge the person accused. All he said in such a case was, that he accused that person who had about him all the circumstances that subjected him to a suspicion of guilt; he only brought the accused person before the proper tribunal to be judged. In the same terms here, he said that blood had been wantonly spilled at Manchester; but he did not, therefore, prejudge the matter. If that House would not listen to the subject, the public would sit in judgment upon them. If they heard only the ex parte statements of the magistrates, let them not think that even an unanimous vote (which, thank God, it was not in the power of ministers to obtain, would have any effect in satisfying the public. The whole matter formed a great constitutional question; and neither the verdict of the coroner's inquest, nor the verdict of any other jury could adequately answer the object involved in such a question. But with respect to the inquest, he could not help referring to what had been urged by his hon. and learned friend, as well as by a right hon. and learned gentleman, one of the representatives of the sister country, and who spoke with ability on every subject. Those hon. and learned gentlemen had admitted that there would be some ground for the proposed inquiry, if it appeared that justice was delayed or denied. Now he would ask, whether justice had not been delayed in the conduct of that inquest? It had, indeed, been most unaccountably delayed; and therefore, upon the ground stated by those hon.

and learned gentlemen themselves, he felt it necessary to call for parliamentary inquiry. His hon. and learned friend had observed, that it ill became his quondam reforming friends to press so anxiously for the preference of an investigation by that House.—There might be those who maintained, that little confidence was to be reposed in that House; but he believed there were none who thought that nothing at all for the good of the country, or the cause of justice, was to be expected from it; and, notwithstanding the very exceptionable manner in which that House was constituted, he cannot suppose that any body of British gentlemen, influenced by common sense and common shame, could enter into an investigation of that nature, without coming to a result satisfactory to their countrymen. By engaging in the inquiry, the House could not suppose that it would become fairly liable to the charge of prejudging any question. If, indeed, such a notion of prejudgment were just, no accusation whatever could be presented for any description of crime. But it was mockery to say, that accusation was in any degree tantamount to prejudgment; and the idea was only held out with a view to delude good feeling into the adoption of an exceptionable proposition. Some one must accuse before the House could be called upon to inquire. The accusation was matter of notoriety; and, in answer, various statements were made to the House, upon the whole of which it was their duty to inquire, with a view to satisfy the public mind.—The eyes of the people were now in a peculiar degree fixed upon them; and it behoved them as they valued their character, cautiously to consider the vote they were about to pronounce. The opponents of reform were in the habit of saying, that although the House might perhaps be constituted in a manner not to be justified in theory, its conduct was practically good. Let the House then answer the advocates of reform by practical acts. A right hon. gentleman on the other side, who had too much good sense to attempt the defence of the present extraordinary system of borough representation was in the habit of maintaining, that whatever might be its theoretical defects, it worked well for the country, and he therefore deprecated any change. Now he would call upon that right hon. gentleman to urge the House to show to the country on this important occasion, that notwithstanding its imperfect constitution, it could work well for the country and for public justice. With respect to the verdict of the grand jury at Lancaster upon which so many gentlemen seemed to think that they could ride over all the complaints from Manchester, he must express his decided dissent from the opinions of those gentlemen. But while he expressed that dissent, he hoped not to be understood as in any degree to malign the character or question the motives of that grand jury. The gentlemen who composed that jury might have decided very conscientiously, as no doubt they did, and yet those whose cases were submitted to their consideration might have very strong grounds of complaint. For those complainants might not have made out their case to the satisfaction of the jury, from the want of sufficient evidence. But were such sufferers to be precluded from any opportunity of obtaining redress? He could not for a moment believe that the grand jury acted under the influence of any prejudice, or that the gentlemen of which it was composed could possibly be reconciled to violate their oaths; but the difficulties connected with the construction and character of lord Ellenborough's act were such, that a bill presented by a woman who was sabred had been thrown out, although the injury sustained by the woman was quite obvious. It did appear, that throughout the whole of the proceedings, every impediment had been thrown in the way of a legal investigation. A right hon. and learned gentleman had stated, that he was not aware of any delay of justice having taken place with reference to the proceedings at Manchester. Was it, then, no delay, no deviation from the ordinary course, first to use every means for rendering the coroner's court private, and then to adjourn the proceedings under the inquest for several weeks? Who wished for secrecy? They who had sinister designs. Who courted publicity? They whose objects were fair and legitimate. In this case a direct attempt had been made to conceal evidence, and even a power exerted of committing men simply for taking notes of what was passing. He was at a loss to understand what good reason could be assigned for such unusual and arbitrary measures. Here, then, was an instance of positive extraordinary delay; an absolute refusal, nobody could tell why, to proceed with the subject matter of a judicial inquiry. Whether this delay would be prejudicial or not, was not now the question; but it had an appearance of mystery; it created suspicion in the public mind. It only served to render the demands for inquiry louder and more imperative. The court of King's-bench had, however, been applied to, and had directed the subject to be brought before it, and he should therefore dwell no longer upon it at the present moment. It appeared to him, upon a review of all the accounts and arguments which he had heard respecting this melancholy occasion, that on the one side persons charged with violating the laws had not been convicted; and on the other, that an object professedly legal had been effected by military force. An hon. gentleman opposite said no; why then not ascertain the fact by evidence at the bar? He was glad to hear the right hon. and learned gentleman admit that to meet for the purpose of expressing their complaints, and to petition for redress, was one of the great constitutional birthrights of Englishmen. But then, according to the right hon. and learned gentlemen, that liberty was attended with so many restrictions and provisos, that although it was admitted in the abstract, in practice it was impossible. He had heard of the danger of numbers assembling together—the precise amount which came up to the point of danger was not stated, but as far as he could understand the notion, it was when they became too strong to be controlled by the civil power. If the people met in parishes, or in small bodies, then their assemblies were described as contemptible. The House had seen its tables—aye, its floor, covered with petitions, each signed by only 20 individuals. How were those petitions received? Was it not said that they did not proceed from the people, that their signatures were obtained by management, and that no interest was taken in the subject by any great portion of the community? The people at large, it was loudly maintained, did not want any reform, because they petitioned only in small numbers; but they no sooner assembled in multitudes, for the same purpose, than they were charged with treasonable intentions. It was then considered that they might meet in vestries, and that this proud privilege and mighty birth-right would be most conveniently exercised by joining a couple of constables to every party of three persons! The people were accused of a disposition to subvert the constitution. But this charge was totally unfounded, for the fact was, that the people did not desire to make any change in the constitution, seeking only to acquire their due influence in that House by improving the system of the representation. He was convinced, indeed, that the people were never more loyal than at the present moment. There might be what was called training, he believed not to any material extent, but this did not alter his opinion of the general feeling of the people. For how many years had the people been petitioning in vain for a reform in parliament! An hon. gentleman had complained that the reformers spoke harshly of a borough interest; but that interest with all the corruptions attending it, was as well understood by them as it was notorious within the House. The noble lord had also censured the irreverent manner in which the composition of that House was sometimes alluded to—that same noble lord who had been detected in bartering the patronage of government for parliamentary support. He did not mention this topic for the purpose of intimating that the noble lord had escaped a punishment which he deserved. He did not wish to see him punished for doing what was done by every other minister of the Crown. But there sat the noble lord “with all his blushing honours thick upon him,” whilst sir Manasseh Lopez was condemned to pay a fine of 10,000*l.* and to be imprisoned for three years—for doing what? Why, compared to the noble lord, Sir M. Lopez was pure as snow. In such a light, he was all innocence; he had endeavoured to bribe a few electors; the noble lord to corrupt the representative body itself. The only defence of the noble lord against impeachment was, the notorious and acknowledged rottenness of the system. This, in his opinion, was a sufficient defence; and if it were proposed to bring the noble lord to punishment, a question that might arise were he to change sides, such a proposal should not have his support. He was not the man who would cast the first stone, but he had a right to complain that a system of such gross hypocrisy and scandalous injustice continued to be upheld. The rational part of the public would sooner or later be satisfied, and to turn a deaf ear to their remonstrances was not the way to silence them. Englishmen were not to be suppressed; they would not cease from complaining because their complaints were unheeded, nor could any thing be gained by rendering them hostile to the government. Was it not doubtful whether the taxes could continue to be paid, if fresh expenses were incurred by the augmentation of our establishments? If new and severe laws were passed, he feared that they might lead to retaliatory acts on the part of the people, which would be made the pretence of still further oppressions; and we should find ourselves at length engaged in the same bloody course which had been run in Ireland, and which terminated in rendering the Irish parliament so disgusting to the country, that it was induced to abdicate its functions and commit political suicide. His earnest hope was, however, that the English people would not be reduced to the same state of suffering, of despair. There was one certain mode of alleviating their grievances. It was remarkable, he might here observe, that it had become a prevailing fashion amongst many, to mix up reform and irreligion, as two things necessarily connected. Some persons appeared to consider them like church and state—inseparable; but, for his own part, he could not imagine how the destruction, of christianity should be favourable to the cause of reform. The result would, as he apprehended, be entirely the reverse. In point of fact, the same opinion was entertained in the time of Charles 2nd when it was the policy of the court to favour every species of irreligion with a view of extinguishing all zeal for a free government. Christianity was felt to be a religion of liberty: it taught a doctrine abhorred by many—the natural equality of mankind. But it likewise inculcated justice, it recommended charity, and forbade the imputation of evil motives to others without sufficient ground. It was scarcely consistent with its spirit to throw out charges of disaffection and disloyalty against all who were not loyal par excellence, which he understood to mean supporters of his majesty's ministers. His own conviction was, that the people throughout the country were strictly loyal, and firmly attached to the constitution. But then they wanted that constitution; they desired to see King, Lords, and Commons. They were as unwilling that the Commons should be excluded, as that the King should be excluded. There was no nation on the earth that looked with more regard to those above them, when any sympathy was manifested with their condition, or when either virtue or talent was displayed. This was, indeed, only a further proof of their good sense; and he verily believed that his majesty's ministers were much perplexed to find them so loyal and tranquil as they had been. The Treasury prints, when Mr. Harrison was arrested at Smithfield (an arrest that might have been more properly made after the meeting), upbraided the people with cowardice for not resisting it. The noble lord was at his wit's end because they had not justified his epithets of seditious, treasonable, and so forth. With regard, too, to the doctrines which were objected to them, was it not matter of historical fact, that parliaments were once held annually in this country? This assertion would not, he apprehended, now be denied. Was it not also known, that no less a person than the celebrated Selden had maintained the principle of universal suffrage? He did not say that such measures were in his opinion advisable; but those who applied hard names to them proved nothing but their own ignorance. Although these doctrines were professed, he had little doubt that the bulk of the people, with their known good sense, would be satisfied with any reform that should establish an effectual control over the government, in the Commons' House of Parliament. It was natural that much should be claimed when every thing was refused; but there was a broad line of debateable ground between abstract principles and practical good. When the latter was sincerely aimed at, compromises between opposite interests and opinions necessarily followed. That it would not be difficult to satisfy the country, he was persuaded; and he believed such an effect would be beneficial to all parties, not even excepting the government. The tendency and spirit of the Christian religion were to spread general liberty throughout the civilized world; there was no ground for supposing that the people were insensible to its influence, no ground for those unqualified accusations which almost seemed to describe that House as the only part of the country that was uncontaminated. But even if that were the case, it might require consideration to decide upon the most effectual remedy. Was it possible to refute opinions or convince men of their errors by physical punishments? Actions and not opinions were the proper objects of legislation. The country was now threatened by the noble lord with all sorts of new restrictions, and this was supposed to be the true way of raising the character of parliament in public estimation. Parliament had, unfortunately, never assembled of late years without some new infringement on the rights of the subject, though on every such occasion it had likewise added with an unsparing hand to the amount of the public burdens. He could hardly conceive how the minister had screwed himself during the last session, up to the point of enforcing 4,000,000*l.* of fresh taxes, in the actual situation of the country. He said 4,000,000*l.*, because, including the charges of collection, that was the sum taken or attempted to be taken from the people's pockets. A noble lord who never uttered sentiments unworthy of his name and family, had invited his majesty's ministers to propose a renewal of the income tax. He could not join in this invitation, which he doubted not his majesty's ministers would very willingly accept, and exchange their late unproductive taxes for so certain a resource. But it was a complete mistake to suppose that the poorer classes did not feel the effects of a tax on income, and little better than a fallacious jargon to talk of a salt tax or any other tax as alone affecting them. The rich man's pocket was the fund out of which the poor must always derive the means of their subsistence. At present, however, the country had nothing before it, but fresh taxes of some description, and increased military establishments. It became matter of serious and important consideration to those who had the best sort of property, property in land, what ought to be done in justice and policy to satisfy the claims of the public. They saw lord Fitzwilliam dismissed from office, because he had expressed himself publicly in favour of inquiry; and they saw that although he had been no favourer of parliamentary reform, every public meeting had sympathized with his unmerited disgrace. The people knew how to honour and respect private virtue, although associated with political opinions different from their own. Persons in high stations might always exercise material influence over them. It was long in this country before different classes could be placed in hostility against each other. If gentlemen would act with the same independence as lord Fitzwilliam, the government would soon be compelled to adopt measures of amelioration. Upon the whole, he certainly entertained as strong objections to the address as those stated by his hon. friend, the member for Shrewsbury. He thought at least that some compunction or regret at what had occurred might have been expressed if it had been only from respect, or mere decency towards the public sentiment. He agreed with his hon. friend in disputing the facts on which the government were proceeding, and in abhorring the remedies which there was reason to apprehend. As to the particular nature of the remedies intended, he would not pretend to have a knowledge of them, but their general character there was too much reason to anticipate. "Quod alia scelera, his remedia, vocantur." Whether they were to go the length of not allowing Englishmen to meet, whether public meetings were to be reduced to that minimum which must destroy their very character as public meetings he did not know, but if such was the course intended to be pursued, he could see nothing but anarchy as likely to result from it. The only course which, in the present condition and feeling of the country, parliament is called upon to adopt, appeared to him to be, to satisfy the public mind upon the subject of the transactions at Manchester, by entering into a comprehensive inquiry into the nature and character of those transactions before they proceeded to the discussion of those financial and other questions which it was understood were about to be submitted to them; and which it was certainly high time to investigate.

Mr. Wynn rose, to reply to several observations and arguments of the hon. baronet who just sat down. It was unjust to say that that House had, for the last quarter of a century, met only to infringe the rights of the people, whereas it was well known, that during that period it had been principally occupied in preserving liberty at home, and vindicating the freedom of Europe. He was sorry to find the hon. baronet was so well disposed to join in those outcries, which were truly characterized in the address then under consideration. The meeting at Manchester, considering the circumstances by which it was preceded and attended, was illegal even by the common law, which said that numbers were force, and force intimidation; and he contended that they were treasonable to the king and the constitution. The hon. baronet had adduced no arguments to show that the meeting was not illegal. It was the uniform doctrine in this country, that if a large body assembled in arms, with a view to carry any particular point, that body was guilty of treason.—To support this position, he cited the opinion of justice Foster, as quoted on a former occasion by Mr. Fox, upon whose assertion he was entitled to rank that learned judge among the brightest authorities on constitutional law. It was true that each circumstance of terror, if taken by itself, was not perhaps of a criminal character. But all the circumstances when combined, when viewed as all tending to accomplish the same treasonable object, could not be shown to have any other than a criminal colour. What, in fact, was the effect of that meeting; were not shops shut up? Did not several peaceable and respectable families quit Manchester in consequence of that meeting? Could it then be said, that that meeting produced no intimidation? The constitution of England was called, and very justly so called, a free constitution. Why? because it secured property. The right of the people to meet, was derived from that constitution; but if their meeting tended to endanger that property which the constitution declared should be secure, how could they be said to act under the sanction of British law? In this instance, the effect produced, proved, beyond question, that danger to property was generally felt in Manchester.—The inconvenience and terror which might be caused by such large and frequent assemblies, afforded sufficient proof that they could never have been contemplated by the constitution, and that the right of attending such meetings armed, was a still more glaring and audacious violation of the law of the land. The hon. baronet had asked why the magistrates, if they interfered at all, did not interfere sooner? The answer to that was plain—it was because those banners and circumstances of terror were not till then displayed, which could justify their interference. He would be one of the last men in the country to infringe the liberty of the subject; but if liberty was abused, it must be abridged for the moment. According to the new doctrine attempted to be established, if meetings were held every week, for the professed object of changing the order of succession to the Crown, such meetings would not be suppressed as illegal. If there was a prima facie case of blame, he did not deny that it might afford a fit ground of inquiry in that House; but the general principle was, that the House ought not to interfere except where the person or the case was too great to be dealt with out of it. With respect to the question of reform, if any reform were really necessary to the safety of the state, the constitution would supply it. It contained within itself a perpetual source of improvement. True, the remedies which it sanctioned, did not come forth all prepared and formed, like Minerva from the head of Jupiter. It was devised to meet new mischiefs, and to apply new remedies, but not in a precipitate manner. The remedy grew out of the constitution gradually, but full of vigour, and formed for permanence. He was not disposed to make concessions at this moment, as they might open a door to incalculable mischief. If any injury was done, the courts of law were open to redress them; and where they were adequate, as in this case they were, he thought it would be a misapplication of the powers of the House to interfere with their jurisdiction. Objections were taken to the employment of the yeomanry. But when an addition to the military force of the country was called for, the argument was the other way, and it was then held by those who now urged this objection, that the yeomanry were the most constitutional force known in this country. He would conclude by expressing his acquiescence in the original motion.

Sir John Sebright declared that he must vote against the amendment; not because he was averse to investigation, but because he thought it could be most effectually carried on in the courts of judicature, and because no assembly in the world appeared to him less fitted for conducting such an inquiry than the House of Commons, inasmuch as the examination was generally carried on in a desultory manner, and the evidence was not upon oath. He would refrain from giving any opinion on the legality of the conduct of the magistrates; but he would say that he conceived they behaved rashly in arresting Hunt at the time that they did, when they might have apprehended him either before or after the meeting, without creating any disturbance. He would go as far as any man in allowing the full right of the subject to meet and petition; but he thought that there could be no security for life or property, if such large masses of people were permitted to assemble from distant parts as on that occasion. To the radicals who composed such assemblies he would do justice—full and ample justice, but he would make no concessions. To satisfy, not them, but the rational and respectable part of the community, he thought the question of parliamentary reform should be entertained; as he was sure, from his own experience in life, that 19 out of 20 of those who reflected on the subject were convinced of the necessity of some reform. He had never been in any society, even of those who generally supported his majesty's ministers, without finding that a great majority was in favour of some change. He did not allude at all to the radicals; they ought to be treated justly, but resisted firmly. The reform that he proposed would not satisfy them, but would satisfy the country, and would draw a line of distinction between their mad adherents and the respectable body of the people. He had mixed with people of all ranks and classes, except radicals, and he found this to be the general conviction.

The Hon. Mr. Lyttelton said, that he could not give a silent vote on the occasion, and he owed an explanation the more, as, however habituated he was to respect his right hon. friend, he could not support his amendment. He objected to the amendment, not because he was averse to inquiry, but because an opportunity would afterwards occur for discussing it. He was of opinion, that nothing short of a parliamentary investigation would satisfy the country; but he thought with his hon. friend who had just spoken that the revolutionary faction of the radicals ought to be opposed; and that, therefore, any qualification of the address might tend to weaken that opposition to their designs which was therein pledged. He entirely concurred in the language of the address, although he thought that ministers had exceedingly misconducted themselves, and in nothing more glaringly than in the dismissal of that virtuous and patriotic nobleman, lord Fitzwilliam.

Mr. Canning* began by saying, that, unusual as was the course which had been pursued the preceding night, in consenting to the adjournment of a debate on the Address, he could not help congratulating the House on that deviation from the ordinary rules of its proceeding; for, the technical parliamentary difficulty being once gotten over, he felt it to be of the utmost importance that the vote to which they were to come on this occasion, should not have been adopted without the fullest and most patient discussion. They had now before them all the different classes of opinion which prevailed in the House, with respect to the Address and the Amendment; and with respect to the general state of the country,—a state which, to most persons appeared alarming, and to all perplexing and difficult. Those gentlemen who held cheap the perils described in the Address, would act manfully if they either voted against it, or proposed an amendment expressive of their opinion; but he could not comprehend the reasoning or the policy of those who were prepared to vote for the Address, and yet to tack to it such an amendment as that now proposed.

He would ask of those who were for mixing together sentiments so incongruous,—whether the first necessity of the time were not to put down the revolutionary spirit which had spread throughout the country? If that were admitted, he would ask next, whether the decision of the House upon this night would not go forth with tenfold authority, if unaccompanied by the mitigating appendage proposed by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Tierney)? Would not the original Address, if voted unanimously, without qualification or addition, carry to the minds of those whose designs it pledged the House to crush, more complete conviction of the serious determination of the House to effect that purpose, than if reinforced by all the denunciations conveyed in the first part of the amendment, to be afterwards weakened by the vague and unsatisfactory expressions with which the amendment concluded? It was true, that in the first part of the amendment, the turbulent and disaffected were rebuked in phrases of even more asperity perhaps than any contained in the original Address; but, in the concluding part, a certain sympathy was expressed, if not with the projects which the disaffected had in view, at least with the principles on which those projects were professed to be framed. Now, refinements were not readily understood by the multitude. Many of the disaffected or of the misled might conceive, however erroneously, that persons who could in any degree approve or countenance their principles, would be ready, if not to lend their assistance towards the accomplishment of their objects, at least to see the accomplishment of them without regret. They might construe any expression, however guarded, of a common feeling, into encouragement if not into co-operation;—especially when they compared what was passing in that House with what had recently taken place elsewhere. For was it not a fact that the Radicals (as he was obliged to call them, though he hoped by some laborious periphrasis to avoid the term in future), could boast of having been associated in a public meeting with the first names in the land? that the possessors of those names, blessed with wealth, distinguished by title, elevated by honours, the boast of the country, the ornament of mankind,—had stood side by side with them on the same stage, trembling for a hearing, and only obtaining that grace by their intercession? Did not the Radical Reformers recollect all this? and did they not recollect further, that these mighty Aristocrats, in entering upon a discussion in which two distinct topics were involved, on one of which they agreed with the Radical Reformers, while they widely differed from them on the other, had consented (oh! shame to rank, property, and aristocracy!) for the sake of a little paltry triumph over their political adversaries, to keep out of sight the topic on which they differed from their new allies, and to put forward exclusively that on which they agreed? They agreed that there ought to be an inquiry into the proceedings at Manchester;—a subject unquestionably of great importance (and regarding which it would be seen in what he should say presently, that he (Mr. C.) felt as deeply and acutely as any man,—but still a question of insulated importance, of comparatively narrow range and limited consequences:—they disagreed upon the wide subject of parliamentary reform. As to the importance of this last subject of difference, what was the sense of those who had moved the proposed Amendment? What were the words of the Amendment, regarding the schemes of the Radical Reformers?—“That the House express their reprobation of the attempts which have been made to persuade the suffering classes of the people to seek relief from their dis-

treachery in schemes injurious to themselves, dangerous to the public quiet, and inconsistent with the security of the constitution." Thus, then, it appeared that those exalted individuals shared the honours of the hustings with men, whom they considered as entertaining projects "dangerous to the public quiet, and inconsistent with the security of the constitution;" and that with such men they combined their votes on another question, throwing entirely out of their view that by which the public quiet and the constitution were, in their opinion, endangered. This conduct was the more extraordinary if compared with the doctrines which had been preached in this debate, regarding the duties of the great towards the lower orders of the people. "Deal kindly and openly with them" (it had been said); "endeavour to convince them of their mistakes; argue with them calmly and temperately; and they will, no doubt, listen with patience, and acknowledge and retract their errors." How had these doctrines been reduced to practice? When was there a more golden, a more glorious, opportunity for acting upon them than that afforded by the Yorkshire meeting? and how had it been employed? Had any attempt been made at that meeting to argue with the Radical Reformers, and to convert them from their heretical tenets? If due advantage had been taken of that happy moment, what a signal service would the aristocracy of the York meeting have rendered to their contemporaries and to posterity! If they had sacrificed much in feeling, much in dignity, by the mortifying condition in which they had placed themselves; all these sacrifices, and more, if more could be, would have been wisely made and well recompensed, had they seized the opportunity of rendering new laws unnecessary, by the all-powerful effect of reason and eloquence, in converting or putting down the misleaders of the people. But they did no such thing. They rebuke, indeed, and lecture the Radical Reformers! No, no, they knew better than to risk such a liberty. They met under a contract (whether written or tacit he would not affirm), that the great question on which they fundamentally differed from the Radical Reformers should not be brought into discussion; and there being but two questions for deliberation,—the one parliamentary reform, and the other the calling of parliament together for the purpose of inquiring into the proceedings at Manchester,—the first they consented entirely to slur over; and, with a most whimsical waste of time, proceeded to debate the second, although the newspapers of the day must have apprized them that parliament was already called. Surely many of those who supported the resolutions at York, must now in their consciences believe that the effect of that meeting had been to give encouragement to those very schemes which the Amendment under consideration now rebuked with so wholesome a severity.

Mr. Lyttelton rose to order, and said, that the imputation of a motive, such as that stated by the right hon. gentleman, was disorderly.

The Speaker observed, that to impute a motive was certainly disorderly; but, in his apprehension, the right hon. gentleman did not put his argument with that intention.

Mr. Canning resumed.—Most certainly, Sir, you have taken the just view of the purport of my observation. I said distinctly, the effect of the York meeting, not the intention. I say further, or rather I repeat, that I equally believe, that the effect, not the intention, of qualifying the Address to the Throne with the proposed Amendment, would be to encourage the hopes of the Radical Reformers, not to damp them; notwithstanding the wholesome rebuke which I have admitted one passage of the Amendment to convey.

The great point of difference, between the Address and the Amendment, was, the notice bestowed by the Amendment upon the late transactions at Manchester. Mr. C. entreated the House, before they suffered themselves to be led away by all the declamation upon this question, to review the course which it had taken before it was brought under the consideration of parliament. Let every hon. member reflect on his own previous feelings on that question, even up to yesterday; and ask himself whether the legality of the meeting of the 16th of August were not the point on which he expected the discussion to turn; and by the decision of which was to be determined—whether or no there were any grounds, either for a parliamentary inquiry, or for any, and what further proceedings on the subject?

And what was now the state of that question of legality? Was it not settled in the mind of every impartial man, in the way directly contrary to that which, before the meeting of parliament, had been so confidently presumed? As his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Scarlett) had this night qualified the opinion which he, in common with, he believed, a great majority of the House, understood him to declare in the preceding night's debate, he would not be so discourteous as to dwell on the impression which the first statement of that opinion had produced upon his mind. Undoubtedly, he had understood his hon. and learned friend to subscribe to the opinion that the meeting of the 16th of August was illegal; and he had congratulated himself on the accession of an authority which, if second, was only second, to that of the right hon. and learned gentleman over the way (Mr. Plunkett), who had with such clearness and force argued and established that opinion. But if his hon. and learned friend had not thought fit to give a positive opinion that the meeting was illegal, at least, he had not ventured to state an opinion to the contrary. His hon. and learned friend desired to withhold the expression of any opinion at all; and he (Mr. C.) had no right to disturb the tranquil state of neutrality in which his hon. and learned friend had placed himself. But what was to be thought of that neutrality,—what inference but one could be drawn from it,—when, after such an argument as that of the right hon. and learned gentleman, corroborated by the opinions of his (Mr. C.'s) hon. and learned friends who sat near him (the attorney and solicitor general), and not yet denied by any lawyer who had spoken, his hon. and learned friend was satisfied to be silent, and to leave the question without the benefit of his authority either way? The right hon. and learned gentleman, himself a host, had pledged his authority and his reputation as a lawyer (pledges of which the House and the United Kingdom know, and posterity will acknowledge, the value), that the meeting of the 16th of August was an illegal meeting. The hon. and learned gentlemen who sat near him (of whose talents he would not speak in the language which they deserved, only because sitting where they did, it might be considered as the language of partiality), they too had pledged their reputation as lawyers to the same opinion. On the opposite side, not one learned gentleman had staked his reputation on the opinion that the meeting was legal; not one learned gentleman had hinted that he held such an opinion; no not one. If then there were value in authorities, that value, whether taken by weight or by tale, was on the side of the illegality of the meeting; while in the opposite scale would be found only a negative quantity, the unexplained hesitation of his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Scarlett). If there were any lawyer in the House who yet lingered, and would not, with the frankness of his learned friends, stake his reputation on his opinion, Mr. C. could only say that such learned gentlemen (whoever he might be) took as little advantage of the opportunity afforded by the meeting of parliament, for correcting erroneous doctrines, as the Whigs had taken of the meeting at York.

Such then was the state of the Manchester question, as it stood now, after two evenings' discussion, compared with that in which it stood ten, nay two, days ago.—But the necessity of a parliamentary inquiry into that matter had been rested on two grounds: first, on the violation of the constitution, by an illegal dispersion of a legal meeting; and secondly, on the demands of the country. The first ground the House would, perhaps, think pretty well disposed of; at least until some sage of the law should gather courage to dispute the doctrine, yet unquestioned in this debate, that the meeting was not a legal but an illegal meeting. And what if it should turn out upon examination, that the second ground was in fact identical with the first? Let the House take a view of the resolutions of some of the principal meetings which had been holden in different parts of the country; and let it be seen on what grounds they had rested this call for parliamentary inquiry. He would, with permission, mention a few of them briefly to the House.

First came the Westminster meeting, resolving, that "the late meeting at Manchester was a legal meeting," that "the people were lawfully assembled;" next, the common council of London—"a meeting legally assembled;" Halifax, "illegal dispersion of a meeting convened according to law;" Lewes, "the meeting at Manchester, on the 16th of August, was strictly legal and constitutional;" Southwark, St. John's parish, "perfectly legal and constitutional;" Richmond, "legal;" Carlisle, "our countrymen legally assembled at Manchester;" Cumberland, the right of assembling "in a legal manner" appears to have been violated; York, county, "a meeting legally assembled;" Reading, "a perfectly legal and constitutional meeting;" London, St. Leonard's parish "legally assembled;" London, St. Clement's parish, "peaceably assembled for a legal and constitutional purpose;" Durham, county, "legally assembled;" Durham, city (more cautiously), "a meeting legally, as it seems, assembled;" Devon county club (more cautiously still) "we have not yet learnt by what act the people assembled at Manchester had placed themselves out of the pale of the law;" Sheffield (in the like strain) "as far as appears to us, conducted legally;" Norfolk (with similar reserve) "a meeting not proved to be illegal." There were abundance of other resolutions affirming the same opinion with more or less of confidence; but he had troubled the House with instances enough, to show the general prevalence of the notion, that the meeting at Manchester was a legal meeting.

Now, allowing all due weight to the authority of those resolutions, yet, as they turned out to have been founded in mistake, was it not to be fairly presumed that the meetings which passed them had been taken by surprise; and had, under an entire misconception, come to decisions which they themselves would now admit to be no longer maintainable?

But it was not in matters of law only, that the meetings in the country appeared to have been misled. It was impossible to overlook those flagrant misrepresentations of fact, by which the public mind had been worked up to a fearful state of irritation. It had happened to him (Mr. C.) to take the reports of a part of the daily press on these transactions in the gross; a course of reading which brought exaggerations and contradictions into view, much more clearly than a perusal from day to day. The first thing that had convinced him of the extreme caution with which the testimony of these records was to be received, was an allegation, that the magistrates of Manchester were necessarily actuated by hostile feelings towards the people, from the circumstance of their being generally "master-manufacturers." His connexion with Liverpool had given him acquaintance enough with the general state of things in Lancashire, to make him quite sure that, however true such a circumstance might have been in any other county, it could not be so in the county of Lancaster; it being (as he had often heard, and had had some opportunities of knowing) an invariable rule in that county, not to put into the commission of the peace persons connected with the manufacturing establishments. No person, who had ever conversed with a Lancashire man, but might have informed himself of this rule; and surely no honest man would have hazarded such an allegation without inquiry. That care, at least every man was bound to take, before he asserted a fact to the injury of his neighbour; especially when the prejudice excited by the statement was to extend to the remotest verge of the kingdom, and to hold up those who were the objects of it to abhorrence and detestation. The allegation, however, passed current for some days; then, indeed, came an acknowledgment that it was incorrect; accompanied, however, with the observation, that though the master-manufacturers were not in the commission of the peace, the argument built on that assumption was not the less true. How many persons must have read the assertion, who, perhaps to that hour, were not aware of its untruth! How many persons in the country, remained even up to the meeting of parliament under the influence of that alarming but delusive impression! Was it not obvious that such an impression must materially have influenced the resolutions of any meeting where it was received as true? In that proportion, therefore, was a deduction to be made from the authority of all such resolutions.

But was this the only misrepresentation? By no means. At the meeting of the city of York came forward an hon. gentleman (the member for that city), for whose general character and conduct he (Mr. C.) entertained the highest respect, and stated, that the sabres of the cavalry were sharpened, with a view to the conflict of the 16th of August. It was unnecessary to say that this information from such a man came with a weight absolutely overwhelming. Afterwards, the hon. gentleman was convinced that he had been led to assert what was not founded on fact; and, like an honourable and upright man as he was, he publicly retracted it. He could do no more. But, in the mean time, the resolutions at York had passed; and who could estimate the share which such an assertion, made when it was made, must have had in producing that temper in the meeting which sanctioned those resolutions? Persons who had only read the statement might be subsequently disabused by the correction; and, so far as they were concerned, the mischief might therefore be cured: but could any man calculate the extent, to which such a statement, while it remained uncontradicted, must have acted on the public feeling at many other meetings than that at which it was first promulgated? Another hon. gentleman, the member for Norfolk, had been led into a like error, purely unintentional, no doubt, but calculated like the former to do extensive mischief, respecting a woman said to have been saved by an officer of dragoons from the barbarous rage of the yeomanry cavalry. The hon. gentleman had taken an opportunity, in this debate, to disavow the authority on which he told this story. He had done rightly. But what might not have been the effect and operation of the story in the mean time?

Deduct, therefore, the amount of the impression made by these, and abundance of other similar fables; deduct the effect of the persuasion (the assumed, uncontroverted, and unquestioned persuasion), that the Manchester meeting was a legal meeting; and then judge, whether public meetings, proceeding to discussion under such influences, could have decided with equity and temper; whether we should not do those meetings the greatest possible injustice if we were to imagine that they would, under better information, persevere in decisions so unfairly and surreptitiously obtained? "No, Sir, it is not till all the meetings which assembled during the prevalence of these mistakes and delusions, shall have re-resolved all their resolutions, with the full knowledge that the Manchester meeting was illegal,—that the magistrates were not "master manufacturers,"—that the swords of the yeomanry were not sharpened with a view to the 16th of August,—and that the horrible stories, of which that related by the member for Norfolk is a specimen, were not true,—that we can have a pretence for granting a parliamentary inquiry, on the ground that the country demands it.

"Undoubtedly, Sir, the meeting at Manchester, was attended with great and grievous calamities. Much suffering was occasioned by it to all classes of the inhabitants of that place; and the loss of lives which occurred in the dispersion of the assembly must be deplored by every mind that has the smallest tincture of humanity.

In deploring those occurrences, I yield to no man living. But I know how cautiously I must deal with matters of this kind. I know well the nature of the artifices too successfully practised by those who endeavour to pervert the public judgment by the slander of individual character. Experto credite. The process is of this kind.—An incendiary narrator of what passed at Manchester affirms, perhaps, that "one hundred persons were slain." Suppose, indignant at this extravagant falsehood, I answer, "No, no, not a hundred, the number of sufferers was six only." "Six only!" is then the exclamation, "O barbarian! it is thus that you trifle with the sacrifice of human life!" This, Sir, is the common trick. It consists in first putting forth a monstrous exaggeration of calamity for the express purpose of inviting contradiction; and then holding up to public indignation the man who reduces the exaggeration to the reality, as if he were the unfeeling defender and approver of whatever part of the calamity he does not deny. The trick is at last found out; but it has unhappily too often done its work for the day, before detection. The agents who employ it know their lesson well. The school in which they learned it is that of the French Revolution. It is the old trick of 1794 and 1795; the too successful expedient of Marat and Robespierre. But, deplorable and extensive as the calamities of the 16th of August were, to whom are they to be attributed? Is it not to those, who actuated by selfish motives of ambition—(no, I will not say ambition; I will not squander a word often applied to nobler aspirations on such base designs)—is it not to those who seek mischief for mischief's sake;—who would let loose the whirlwind, though with the conscious incapacity to direct it;—who would lay the fabric of social order in ruin, not so much in the hope of rising upon that ruin, as for the satisfaction of contemplating the havoc and desolation which they had made;—who, outcasts of society, would revenge themselves upon society by scattering and dissolving the very elements of which it is composed;—Is it not to such persons,—to the assemblers of those alarming multitudes, under the preposterous pretence of petition or deliberation, but in fact for the purposes of intimidation and disorder,—that are to be justly attributed all the consequences which follow upon assemblages so wantonly congregated, and upon passions so wickedly inflamed? To them the widowed mother and orphan child must trace their miseries. On their heads be for ever fixed the responsibility of all the blood that has been shed!"

He came now to the speech of his hon. and learned friend (sir J. Mackintosh). His hon. and learned friend was far too wise and too wary to pledge himself to an opinion in favour of the legality of the meeting of the 16th of August; he knew well moreover that if any excesses had been committed in the dispersion of even an illegal meeting, the tribunals of the law were open for redress; but being desirous at the same time of making out a case to show that the proceedings at Manchester ought to be made the subject of parliamentary inquiry, he had been driven to the most whimsical refinements in support of this proposition. Others had stated the magnitude of the question, as a cogent reason for the intervention of parliament; but his learned friend contended on the contrary, that the subject was of so subtle a nature, that the searching minuteness of parliamentary investigation could alone bear upon it with effect. The powers of the House, like the proboscis of an elephant, were now to be expanded to embrace the largest objects; and again to be contracted, that they might lay hold of the smallest. They were to tear up an oak or to pick up a pin. Others had charged upon the magistrates the most atrocious wickednesses,—falsehood, treachery, wilful breach of law, and deliberate murder;—and had contended, that the bar of the House of Commons was the only tribunal whose jurisdiction was sufficiently grand and awful to comprehend the enormity of such crimes. His hon. and learned friend, on the contrary, suggested that the guilt of the magistrates might possibly be no more than a small error in discretion; and it was therefore that he thought the bar of the House of Commons the fit tribunal, as being the only one whose touch was fine enough to handle an offence so delicate and evanescent.

Others had contended that the courts of law were incompetent to try the magistrates; because,—he knew not exactly why—the reason had never been very distinctly explained; but whatever it might be, the force of it had been within these few days considerably abated by some blundering fellow, who, not being let into the secret—not being apprized how great an object it was to keep such matters exclusively for the cognizance of the House of Commons,—had actually moved for an information against the Coventry magistrates, for the dispersion of the meeting at Coventry; which motion the court of King's-bench had entertained. Now, it was quite obvious that what could be done in the case of Coventry, might be equally done in the case of Manchester; so of that argument—the incompetency of the courts of justice—there was happily an end. His hon. and learned friend, however, did not deny the competency of the court of King's-bench; but he doubted whether that court would condemn for any thing but misconduct; and he wanted a trial, where error in discretion (if it could be substantiated) might assume the colour, and be visited with the penalties, of guilt; and therefore was he for a trial in the House of Commons. Nay, his hon. and learned friend, and others who had followed him, went further. They thought that even if there were no guilt at all, real or imaginary, substantial or constructive, still a trial in the House of Commons could do the magistrates no harm. Why should an innocent man fear a trial? What more delightful, what more enviable, than the sensations of virtue under unmerited persecution? His hon. and learned friend had singular notions of happiness. A wise antient had said—

————— "Dici beatus,
"Ante obitum, nemo supremaque funera
debet."

But his hon. and learned friend had found out, that even in this life a man may be blessed beyond the ordinary lot of humanity. This excess of sublunary enjoyment was to be found, it seems, in a public trial, with a consciousness of innocence. Happy, happy Mr. Hastings! who, for seven long years, continued in uninterrupted fruition of that which is now discovered to be the consummation of human felicity! "These, Sir, are refinements which I confess I do not comprehend. If the magistrates have sinned against the law, the courts of law are open to try them. If they are innocent, I, for my part, will never consent that an innocent man shall be dragged daily before our bar, amidst the taunts of enemies, and under the misconstruction of the public, with the consciousness of his innocence alone to support him."

It appeared to him (Mr. C.) that even justice ought to be dealt between man and man. In former times and in other countries (certainly never in this happy land), favour and affection had been shown to the higher, in preference to the lower, classes of society. At present, in consequence perhaps of one of those oscillations in the human mind which succeed each other with reference to every subject of human interest, there appeared to be a prevalent disposition to presume in favour of the lower, against the higher, classes. He by no means blamed this disposition. If any inequality were allowed to exist, the preponderance ought certainly to be on the side of the weak and unprotected. But equal justice was after all the wisest and honestest course. Now, what kind of equality would be administered between those who assembled the illegal meeting of the 16th of August, and those who dispersed it, if the amendment proposed by the right hon. gentleman were acceded to by the House? Those who had endeavoured to set the country in a flame, would be allowed to traverse their indictments, and to go to their trial at the period which might best please them;—the magistrates who had exerted themselves to defeat these machinations, would be allowed no choice, no challenge, but would be put on their trial without delay. The former, besides being permitted to go to trial when they liked, would have the further advantage that the witnesses against them would be examined upon oath; while the latter when brought at a moment's warning to the bar of the House of Commons, would be arraigned on evidence not given under that solemn sanction. And this was what his hon. and learned friend opposite, with the bandage over his eyes, and the balance in his hand, was prepared to mete out as the award of impartial justice!

That the House were fully aware of the difference between evidence on oath, and that taken without such sanction, was manifest from the fact, that in all cases in which the immediate right of their own members to their seats in that House was involved, the matter was referred to the consideration of a committee, before whom evidence was given on oath, under all the penalties for false-swearing.

But to put the injustice of the proceeding recommended to them in a still stronger point of view, let the House contemplate the result of a trial of the magistrates in the House of Commons, under the alternative either of condemnation or acquittal. Suppose the House by a vote of the majority to find that no blame was imputable to the magistrates of Manchester; would that vote save them from a prosecution in a court of justice? No. The inquiry would merely furnish evidence against them, disclose their case, and send them prejudged to the legal tribunal. If, on the contrary, a majority of the House should find the magistrates guilty of the offence with which they were charged, and address the throne to remove them from the commission; would that save them from a prosecution in a court of justice? No. The decision of the House upon unsworn testimony, having inflicted a disgrace worse than the severest legal punishment, they would then be called to trial again in another court, where the previous decision could not but operate to their prejudice, and where even acquittal could not restore their station or their fame. And this was equal justice! Surely, it was impossible for any man, who duly considered the subject, and who wished to follow the great rule of dealing by others as he would wish others to deal by him, to agree to such an amendment.

There was still another view, however, of the proposed investigation,—its effect on the character of the House of Commons. He did not attribute to the right hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, the design of bringing the House into disgrace: but he must say that, if the amendment had been proposed by any of the—he was at a loss how to denominate them—the white-hatted gentry, he should suspect that they had a double game in view. For, if by such evidence as has been described, the House should be surprised into a decision against the magistrates, then the vengeance of the radical reformers would be fully gratified. If, on the contrary, the magistrates should be discharged of all blame by a vote of the House, there would then be afforded a new ground of clamour against the House of Commons. Either result would be delicious to those gentlemen. In the one event, they would crush the men whose firmness had defeated their machinations, in the other, they would gain a new power for undermining the constitution. But, as the House itself could not possibly have either of those objects in view, he trusted, that they would not hesitate to put an end to the alternative by rejecting the amendment.

So great was the inconvenience of involving that House unnecessarily in judicial investigation, that he confessed he could conceive few cases, except those which required the exercise of the power of impeachment, in which the interposition of the House of Commons was not attended with a risk of interrupting the course of justice, and of throwing discredit on the ordinary administration of the laws. What could be a stronger proof of this tendency than the sort of use which an hon. gentleman had thought himself warranted to make, in the debate of that day, of the short-hand report of an unfinished law proceeding,—the coroner's inquest at Oldham? What business had the House of Commons with that proceeding,—which was now under revision by the proper authority, the court of King's-bench?—or what advantage could be derived to the cause of law or liberty by the attempt to cast odium on judicial proceedings? The ill example that was sometimes set in that House, was followed but too closely elsewhere. The coroner's inquest was, to be sure, a tribunal, of secondary dignity; but when before was any magistrate, however inferior in dignity, braved and brow-beaten, day after day, upon the bench? When before was the majesty of justice insulted in her own temple, as had been lately practised in courts of still higher—of the highest—authority?—He trusted that there was not in that House, or in the country, a warmer friend of rational liberty than himself; but amongst the first elements of liberty he had always understood to be the separation of administrative and judicial functions; and every attempt to unite them in the same hands must, in his opinion, be attended with danger to the constitution.

But it is not only the courts of law, (which may perhaps, heretofore have been reviled by those on whom it was their duty to inflict the penalties of justice,—though never before so openly and grossly insulted)—it is not the courts of law only that in these days are held up to suspicion and hatred:—but other, the most favourite institutions of British judicial administration; institutions which are peculiar to England, and which excite, beyond all others, the admiration and envy of foreign nations. Even the sacred name of juries has been tainted with insinuation; and the unpaid magistracy of the country are attempted to be degraded in the public esteem. As if renouncing the high station which we maintain in Europe, as if anxious to deter those nations which have followed our steps in victory from imitating (as they are eagerly bent on doing) our example in civil life, we have persons among us who are busily employed in defaming those invaluable institutions which are at once the pride and the safeguard of our civil polity. Depend upon it, Sir, if these attempts should be successful, the evil which they entail will be altogether irreparable. One of the most beautiful of our moral poets has said, of the lower classes of the agricultural part of the community—that,

“Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
A breath can make them as a breath has made:
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroy'd, can never be supplied.”

So say I of the higher ranks of that same portion of the community—the unpaid magistracy of the country.—I do not dread the inroads attempted to be made on the constitution of parliament, with half the horror that I do the efforts to disparage the character of that magistracy. a new House of Commons might be elected. The monarch might create new peers. New statesmen would be found to conduct the affairs of government, if the present race of public men were swept from the earth. But once “destroy” that which “can never be supplied,” the voluntary and gratuitous dispensation of justice: once sour the public mind against that, perhaps the sole remnant of natural authority; once thoroughly disgust and dishearten that thankless self-devotion, that unbought sacrifice of time and trouble, that benevolent homage of power and wealth to the interests of the humble and the poor, which characterize the country magistracy;—let that connecting link between the higher and lower orders of society be once broken,—and by that single blow more will be done to disjoint the state, than could be accomplished by the radical reformers, with all their outrageous declarations, and with all their pikes—when they shall use them.”

He would now, with the permission of the House, turn to the main subject, of which the House appeared to have almost lost sight,—the speech from the throne. In that speech, the state of the country was painted in colours such as those who advised the Crown had seldom before been under the sad necessity of employing.

That the picture was not overcharged, however, he had a right to presume, as no imputation of that nature had been uttered from any quarter. With the exception of the hon. baronet opposite (sir Francis Burdett), no one who had touched on the meeting at Manchester, had spoken of the designs of the movers of that meeting, manifested not only by their own declarations, but by all their preparations, their emblems and their array, as other than most wicked and indefensible. The hon. baronet, indeed, had talked of the flags unfurled on that occasion, as mere matters of parade. But who did not know, that banners, ribbons and other such devices, might be as clear indications of purpose as words? When some years ago, an orange cockade was worn, on particular days, in Ireland (much more generally than he believed and hoped it was at present), would it have been an answer to the complaints against such a practice to say, "What signifies a yellow ribbon?"—Such things had great signification. Who but the hon. baronet could doubt, that the flags of the meeting at Manchester meant defiance? What could the inscription "Equal Representation or Death" intend, but that those displaying it were solicitous for that which was incompatible with the constitution, and that they were ready to purchase it with their blood? Could such a meeting be legal? Was it possible that any one of the contrivers or abettors of it could seriously imagine it to be so? Could it be deemed so in common sense? The common law, as had been truly said by the right hon. and learned gentleman, (Mr. Plunket), was the perfection of common sense; but what law or what sense could consider as peaceable and legal meetings of forty or fifty thousand persons, convened by no known authority, and marching together in military array, at which doctrines subversive of the constitution were promulgated without disguise, and the determination to carry those doctrines into effect by physical force was audaciously avowed?

He would borrow, on this point, an illustration with which the speech of his hon. and learned friend (sir J. Mackintosh), had furnished him. His hon. and learned friend had told them, that Lancashire had, at different periods, been the seat of different kinds of disaffection; of Jacobitism in the last century, as of Jacobinism at present. Now, he would ask his hon. and learned friend; nay, he would appeal to any one of the hon. gentlemen opposite,—to any whig amongst them,—for an answer to this question,—if in the year 1715, or in the year 1745, or in any year between those two periods, fifty or twenty or ten thousand Lancashire Jacobites had assembled by beat of drum, on the 10th of June, with white roses in their hats, and with the motto "Legitimate Monarchy" embroidered on their standards, would that have been a legal assembly? If any unfortunate Tory had, after such an occurrence, stood up in parliament, and protested that those symbols were perfectly innocent of any improper meaning;—that white was no colour—and that the words "Legitimate Monarchy" referred, beyond all question, to the royal family just established by law;—would he have been listened to with credulity and complacency by the Whig powers of that day? Would he not rather have been reviled as a driveller or traitor; and a new Whig law have been passed for the suppression of such innocent assemblages, at least as strong as the Riot act itself? And pray, what was the difference between the two proceedings, that of Manchester in August 1819, and that which he had imagined as taking place in the same county in 1715 or 1745? Why, that the one would have indicated a design of changing the reigning dynasty; while the other was manifestly directed against the whole frame of the constitution. Any attempt to bring the multitude, and the menaces, and the symbols, and the array of the Manchester meeting within the pale of law, was as fond and as futile as would have been the attempt of a Tory opposition to assign to the Jacobite mob the character of loyalty to the Hanover succession.

The hon. baronet has adjured the House to consider the necessity of conciliation. If by conciliation be meant the expression of sympathy in the distresses of the people, I do most sincerely declare that that sympathy cannot be more deeply felt by any man or set of men in the House or in the country, than by my colleagues and myself. Indeed, can such a declaration be necessary? Even if we had not, like other men, the feelings of human kindness, is it possible that we should be so blind to our own interests, as well as insensible to our duties, as not to feel that the credit as well as the permanency of our administration depends upon the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom, and therewith on the prosperity and comforts of the labouring classes of the community? But I apprehend, that what the hon. baronet means by conciliation is concession; and concession in the shape of a parliamentary reform. And this, Sir, brings me to the topic which was introduced into this debate by the right hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, and to which he did me the honour to challenge my particular attention. That challenge has been repeated by the hon. baronet. The House will, therefore, see that it is not in my option to decline adverting to this topic; although I could have been well contented to defer it to a more suitable opportunity.

The hon. baronet warns me to reconsider my opinions on the subject of parliamentary reform. The right hon. gentleman has been pleased to compliment me as the most strenuous opposer of a reform in parliament, and as one main obstacle to the success of that project. He tells me that I am as radical at one end of the question, as those who are termed "radicals," are at the other. The right hon. gentleman will pardon me for observing, as I pass, that his metaphor is none of the correctest. I never heard of any plant with a root at both its ends. The root usually tends downwards—radice in Tartara;—and I will not dispute that tendency with those who have pre-occupied the title.

But I have no reserve on the subject of parliamentary reform; and, called upon as I have been, I will without the smallest hesitation state my opinions now; declining however to argue them till the period of more particular discussion shall arrive. I am no bigoted supporter of the present order of things as faultless and perfect, or even as necessarily the best that it may be possible for human wisdom to devise; but what I have always maintained is, that the House of Commons, with all its imperfections on its head, discharges well the functions assigned to it by the constitution, and is to all practical purposes identified, with the people whom it represents. I have always contended, therefore, that any sweeping change—any change not very limited and very well considered,—must be attended with great hazard. To say that some heaven-born radical reformer might not by possibility imagine a scheme of a House of Commons, infinitely more beautiful in theory, is a presumption of which I am not guilty. But until I see such a scheme before me in all its scope and in all its detail, I shall feel it my duty to resist any unexplained approaches to reform; because such approaches tend to weaken what exists, without substituting any thing better, or affording any pledge that a preferable substitute can be found.

The course of reasoning, which I think myself entitled—which I think it must be allowed to be most expedient—to pursue on this subject, is as follows:

I claim no other privilege for the existing state of parliament, than that which is allowed to all existing institutions,—that the burthen of proof that a change in them is necessary shall rest with those who propose the change.

Reformation (I speak not here of partial remedies applied—as this House is in the habit of applying them from time to time—to particular instances of detected corruption, but of a general systematic reformation) must be of one of two sorts. It may be a restoration, upon the original principles of the institution to be reformed, to the state in which it stood at some former time, and from which it is alleged to have degenerated; or, it may be a reconstruction of the institution on principles altogether new.

My first question to the proposer of such general reformation, therefore is, "Which of these two modes have you in view?" If the answer be, "restoration to what the House of Commons was in former times;" I then request that the period may be specified at which the House of Commons was, according to the reformer, in the perfection to which he wishes to restore it. If, on the other hand, the answer be, that it is intended to re-construct the House on new principles; then, I think, it is not too much to ask that those principles shall be clearly defined, before we are required to take a single practical step towards the abolition of the existing frame of the House of Commons.

Even after all these explanations had been given, I should think myself at liberty to compare the dangers of a change with the advantages of the change specifically proposed. But, without these preliminary explanations, without knowing exactly what is the nature and extent of the change intended, I should think that to countenance any abstract declaration of the expediency of a change, would be madness.

I differ from some gentlemen who have spoken in this debate, in my behalf as to the degree in which the desire for parliamentary reform prevails throughout the nation. I very much doubt whether that desire prevails much beyond the class of determined reformers,—except, perhaps, among timid and indolent persons, who, untaught by experience, or fearful of exertion, imagine that concession to an invader is the way to peace. With the turbulent description of reformers, it is agreed on all hands, there can be no dallying or compromise. To attempt to conciliate them would be utterly hopeless. And I repeat, I do not believe the sound part of the community to be at all widely infected by the love of change. To use a figure of Mr. Burke's, I will not mistake the importunate chink of a few grasshoppers chirping under a fern-bush, for the voice of the lordly oxen that stray in sober tranquillity over the surface of the field.

I must fairly say, however, that if I could once bring myself to admit the premises which the hon. baronet lays down, I should acknowledge his conclusion from them to be more logical than that of those who call themselves moderate reformers. The latter affirm the existence of a wide-spreading corruption as broadly as the hon. baronet. But the hon. baronet advises a new construction of the House; while the moderate reformers profess to be satisfied with some very trifling alteration. Now, if the disease be as great and as malignant as it is described, I could not be satisfied with so partial a remedy. But I do not admit such to be the extent and malignity of the disease. I do not admit, for instance, that the close boroughs, against which so much has been said, and which are the most obvious and striking anomalies in a plan of representation theoretically considered, are by any means a rotten and gangrened part of the constitution, to be cut off without mercy or remorse. I think them not only defensible, but serviceable. This opinion, Sir, I hold at least disinterestedly. I can have no fear that Liverpool should be involved in any plan of disfranchisement. And I protest, I believe, that the administration of which I am a member, would not lose, but would benefit, by the abolition of the close-borough representation. No small proportion of these boroughs is in the hands of our opponents. If the boroughs of Knaresborough, of Tavistock, of Horsham, of Winchelsea, of Peterborough, were disfranchised, and the right of election were transferred to more populous places—to Birmingham, to Manchester, to Sheffield, to Leeds—I really do not believe that his majesty's ministers would lose numbers in this House; on the contrary, I believe that they would receive more support than at present. But I should regret very much if, by such a measure, the House should be deprived of so many of the great lights* which I see in the opposite quarter of the horizon.

The House, and the right hon. gentleman, will do me the justice to acknowledge, that I have stated my opinions on this question without prejudice, without passion, without any personal or party bias. I think now, as I always have thought, that the constitution of the House of Commons is practically beneficial, though I do not pretend that it is conformable to any uniform theory. If I am asked for instance, why 658 is a more proper number of members than 657 or 659?—I confess myself at a loss to answer the question. It is the collective character of the House which I regard; and I maintain that in its aggregate capacity, and in its general operation, it faithfully represents not only the general interests of the kingdom, but the particular interests of every assignable portion of it: and that it follows, not precipitately, but deliberately and considerately, the real wishes, opinions, and feelings, of the people.

The gentlemen who oppose the government, contend indeed on all occasions, that they are right, and that ministers are wrong; and that the House of Commons, agreeing with the ministers, are therefore wrong with them, and ought, like them, to be sent about their business. But this is mere assertion; and is, in truth, a very short way of disposing of a very complicated question. Do those gentlemen who are in a minority in this House, find themselves in a majority in the country? They will not say so; they cannot think so. Take, for example, the question of the late war. Have they any doubt that, through the whole course of that war (to which they now, by the way, attribute all our distresses,) a majority—an immense majority—of the nation were of the same way of thinking with the majorities of the two Houses of Parliament? Do they doubt that, in that glorious war, in which England saved Europe, and with Europe saved herself, her government was enabled to effect these mighty purposes, not only by a confiding parliament, but by a concurring people? To say that such a war was, or could be, carried on in contradiction to the wishes of the country—that it was a war against the people,—is absurd. A war of twenty years! accompanied with privations and sacrifices never before heard of! and all cheerfully borne by a people, reluctant and unconsenting, insensible to the demands of their own security, and deaf to the shouts of triumphant valour!—borne, too, without murmur or remonstrance!—the statement refutes itself. Gentlemen know that it does so. They know that the war was undertaken for the destruction of tyranny, and for the vindication of the liberties of mankind. They know that the glory acquired to England, and the interest felt in that glory by the people of England, were as great as the majorities in parliament were overwhelming; and they know that those parliamentary majorities were but the express image of the sentiments of the nation.

* Mr. Tierney, sir James Mackintosh, Mr. J. P. Grant, Mr. Brougham, Mr. Scarlett, &c., are among the representatives for the boroughs enumerated by Mr. Canning.

There is another consideration which induces me to distrust the hon. baronet's assumption of a general popularity for the doctrines of which he is the champion. It is, that this question of parliamentary reform is never eagerly agitated, unless when some poignant, though passing difficulties assail the country. This was notoriously the case at the first promulgation of the doctrines of reform, towards the end of the American war. It was the case in 1793, when the desolating principles of the French revolution and its tremendous military successes disquieted sober minds with an apprehension of ruin to the kingdom. It was the case in 1797, at the period of the mutiny at the Nore; and again in 1798, during the height of the disturbances in Ireland. In 1810 and 1812, the question of reform was indeed brought forward, but without exciting much interest or receiving any material support either within doors or without; and from the latter period it slept until the year before last, when the hon. baronet burst upon us with the elaborate plan of major Cartwright. To that admirable system, and to the peculiar doctrines of that patriarch of reform, I consider the hon. baronet as inviolably pledged. He is the undoubted and sole heir of the venerable major. I hope, that when that system and those doctrines shall descend to him by right of inheritance, he will enjoy them to as full a maturity of age and intellect as his predecessor; and that he will finally hand them down unimpaired to some successor equally gifted with himself, but doomed to be, equally with himself, unsupported and hopeless in the prosecution of them.

Beside this plan of the hon. baronet, I am not aware of any specific proposition for reform now before the public—except the threatened one, from the other side of the House, for shortening the duration of parliaments. It is now, Sir, about one hundred years since the Whigs made parliaments septennial from triennial. During the first half century after that change they monopolized the administration of the government. So far, all went well. But for nearly the whole of the last fifty years, the Whigs have been out of office. Are they anxious to try whether they may better their chance by undoing the work of their own hands, and returning to triennial parliaments?

Now, Sir, as to triennial parliaments, I confess I object to them—anti-reformer as I am:—but if I were a radical reformer, I should object to them infinitely more. On my own part I object to them for all the reasons so often urged in debate against the repeal of the Septennial act, in the course of the twenty years that followed its enactment; reasons, I admit, of expediency rather than of principle. But as a reformer, I should reject with indignation an attempt to delude me with a specious appearance of regeneration; calculated to aggravate in effect that very inequality of representation of which the reformers particularly complain. The objects of their strongest antipathy we know are the close boroughs, in defence of which I have ventured to say a few unpopular words: they hold it an abomination, that Tavistock should return by nomination as many members as York or Bristol or Liverpool by free election. But what could so much enhance the advantage of Tavistock over York, or Bristol, or Liverpool, as increasing the frequency of elections? The trouble, the anxiety, the expense—the lawful expense, I mean—of a contested election for a populous place, are no light matter: while the quiet sinner for a close borough may be returned by the dash of a pen, without moving out of his easy chair. This takes place now, once in seven, or, as is the practice, once in about six years; make it to happen once in three years;—you double the disadvantage against the popular representative;—and then have the assurance to call this a reform!

But let not gentlemen deceive themselves with a fond expectation, that dexterous contrivances such as these, or that any palliatives, however specious, can amuse the real reformers. It is not with such sacrifices that you can gorge and satisfy the all-devouring monster of radical reform. No, no, no. The reformers mean, and they demand, a strict personal representation; they mean and they demand a direct expression of the people's will.

I can only say, that if government be a matter of will (I thought it had been matter of reason and convention), and if the will of the whole nation be once fully represented—these two premises being assumed—the conclusion that follows from them is to my mind inevitable: it is shortly and plainly this, that the assembly so fully representing the national will, must be, and in sound logic ought to be, the whole government. There is no room, no pretence for any other power in the state. Kings and Lords are useless incumbrances; and such a House of Commons all in all.

Such, I say, is the logical, the necessary, the unavoidable inference from the premises, once admitted, of the hon. baronet and the radical reformers. I content myself for the present with merely stating them, not presuming to find fault with them, nor proceeding to argue them on this occasion. Opportunities will probably occur for that purpose. I should not even have touched upon the subject of parliamentary reform to-night, had it not been for the taunting invitation of the right hon. gentleman, and the solemn admonition of the hon. baronet. But, so called upon, I could not decline stating my opinions, without appearing to shrink from them. I do not shrink from them. I have stated them, I hope, intelligibly; I am sure without any reserve.

Other warnings are addressed, not to me only, but to the House, as to the lessons to be learned from the French revolution. Undoubtedly these two lessons are to be learned from the French revolution: first, that proper changes ought not be delayed too long; secondly, that precipitate changes are subversive of the peace and order and happiness of nations. But can any man look to the history of the ill-fated Louis 16th, and say, that it was his obstinate adherence to the rights of the throne which he inherited, that embittered the last years of his reign, and finally led him to the scaffold? Can any man seriously contemplate the course of events which brought that monarchy to ruin, without trembling at the consequences of a too obsequious subservience to temporary popularity?—without perceiving how easy and how dangerous is the mistake of sacrificing the interests of a whole community to the clamours of a discontented few? Let not then the lessons of the French revolution be lost upon us! When our ears are assailed by clamour for change, let us not be unmindful of the silent apprehensions, the confiding patience of that large portion of the community whom these clamours distract and appal! Let us not mistake their silence for acquiescence; nor their confidence for carelessness! The feeling of alarm is deep, and general, and just. The persons, whose machinations are the subject of this debate, and the cause of our being called together at this season, are valueless as motes in the sun-beam, compared with the loyal, quiet, unmurmuring millions, who look up to Parliament for protection. Let them not look up to you in vain! Let not the claims, and the welfare of those millions,—of the loyal and the good, of the peaceful and the pious,—be disregarded by the House, in deliberating upon the measures which are necessary for the safety of the country.—

Mr. Brougham said, he was sure the House would, on this occasion, exercise towards him that candour and liberality which he had so often experienced, but of which he then stood so particularly in need. At that late hour of the evening, after the able and entertaining speech which they had just heard—considering the length, he would not say the excessive length of that speech—he felt that he could not trespass upon the House for any considerable time; but he could not, consistently with his duty to the country, to his constituents, or to his own feelings, refrain from declaring his opinions on this question. He was fully aware of the truth of the right hon. gentleman's prediction, that the advocates of inquiry would be found in a minority: he was aware that he was, on that occasion, addressing an assembly, the majority of which entertained strong impressions against that side of the question which he conscientiously advocated. He trusted, however, that he would be allowed to follow the arguments used by the right hon. gentleman, and the other gentlemen who opposed the amendment. He fully concurred in the eloquent eulogium pronounced by the right hon. gentleman upon the incalculable, the hardly to be expressed, value of our magistracy, who not only acted gratuitously, with a few exceptions, in Manchester, but were frequently exposed to the discharge of disagreeable functions, and, in some instances, even to the risk of their lives in the public service. For this reason it was that the law had fenced them round with a threefold fence in the discharge of those duties. He therefore lamented, as sincerely as any man could do, that any transaction should take place which could throw a stigma on so respectable a body. He lamented it the more, as it was to the constitutional discharge of the duties of that magistracy that the people were to look up for the preservation of tranquillity. It was their only source of assistance, save the introduction of the military. He should lament deeply the result of the transactions under discussion, if the magistrates implicated were not in this instance separated from the general body. If the proposed inquiry were granted, it would have the effect of separating the wrong-doers, if so they should be proved to be, from that honourable body. If the inquiry were granted, the guilt, the indiscretion, the too great vigour, or the errors of the accused, would be made to appear: if it was refused, the House might rely upon it, it would fall on the whole body. If the impression remained, if it should be believed, that the course of justice was impeded, that undue powers were apt to be exercised, that undue stretches of official power were practised, that military force was applied at the pleasure of men in office, then the catastrophe was consummated, and he must join in deploring, that the confidence of the country in the magistracy must be shaken.

He would now advert to the observations on the Yorkshire meeting. The right hon. gentleman and the noble lord had said that there had been a compromise between the Whigs, with earl Fitzwilliam at their head, and on the other, those whom the right hon. gentleman, (forgetting his promised and original abstinence), called White Hats. This agreement was said to be novel, unconstitutional, curious and inconsistent with the character of earl Fitzwilliam and with the amendment now proposed. They, indeed, were all anxious that a supposed encroachment on the constitution should be specially investigated, and that redress should be given, if that were required. At the meeting there was an agreement in referring the subject to parliament for inquiry and redress. Parliamentary reform, which had no more to do with the object of the meeting than tithes or the poor-rates, and on which they did not agree, was by consent excluded from consideration. The right hon. gentleman was naturally much offended that they had acted so wisely, and followed his own example, who, however, generally sailed much nearer the wind [a laugh.] Hence, all his jokes and gibes; because the points on which they differed had nothing to do with the purpose of the meeting, and those on which they agreed were its sole object, and contained in the requisition. This was the head and front of lord Fitzwilliam's offending. This was the conspiracy of which his lordship and his friends were accused—a conspiracy, he knew not for what—to resist government. The evidence of this charge was the inferences drawn in a newspaper from their speeches. Because Mr. Wooler inferred from lord Milton's speech that he was for reform, and from Mr. Dundas's that he recommended resistance, they all acted unconstitutionally in attending the meeting! He and the right hon. gentleman had been fellow candidates at an election, where the right hon. gentleman had conspired most unconstitutionally with great numbers, according to these principles. He entered into a compromise with notorious traffickers in slaves; with these men he stood, "from early dawn to dewy eve," as near as he (Mr. Brougham) was to his hon. friend. With these respectable persons, the right hon. gentleman had stood speaking with them, speaking for them, and acting with them, because they agreed as to his election [loud cheers]; but they were as different in their sentiments, at least on the abolition of the slave trade, as it was possible. If he were, therefore, to charge the right hon. gentleman with a conspiracy to revive the slave trade, he would be guilty of as great misrepresentation as Mr. Wooller. The right hon. gentleman, who had not been in the country at the time, and had received his information, perhaps, through several gradations, supplied, as was usual, by ingenuity and fancy, his want of information. This accounted for his gross misrepresentation of what passed at the meeting. He alluded particularly to his statement, that the noble member for Yorkshire stood in trembling suspense; he hoped his noble friend was in the House to hear his faithful report of the expression used—"That lord Milton and earl Fitzwilliam stood in trembling suspense for a hearing, to be procured by the rabble radicals brought from Leeds." Persons of as acute observation as were in the country, and unconnected with the class alluded to, had described to him the veneration, the quiet and respectful attention, with which the noble lord and his venerable father were listened to, even by the humblest persons present.

Having disposed of this part, he had exhausted a considerable portion of the right hon. gentleman's speech. As to the legality or illegality of the meeting, no opinion was given upon his side of the House, because it depended upon facts to be established in evidence. The right hon. gentleman and the noble lord had brought forward no documents which supported their statements. He lamented that the hon. and learned member for Dublin had forgotten what he had so wisely and eloquently urged respecting Ireland—that coercion, if used at all, should be the last means used, and conciliation should be the first; and that he had made use of his convenient ifs, excited his regret, and would be heard with astonishment and grief in his own country, as well as in this. The right hon. gentleman had forgotten a "fundamental feature," according to the noble lord, namely, that there had been no stones on the field in the morning, and that two cart loads were, after the meeting, carried off the ground. Let this be inquired into, and, if proved, it would go far to decide the character of the meeting. The right hon. gentleman had been absent, and had learnt the nature of the transactions from a file of newspapers put at once into his hands. This was unfortunate, for the right hon. member had made his extracts very incorrectly. For instance, the extract from the speech at York was incorrect. It omitted, not from design but very conveniently, the words respecting the legality of the Manchester meeting—"As far as hitherto appeared." The legality was spoken of with similar caution at Cumberland and Westmoreland. All that was said was, that it was prima facie legal, and that inquiry should be made whether it was legal or not. The right hon. gentleman had replied to the hon. baronet (sir F. Burdett) only by old worn-out and stale remarks on parliamentary reform, and had left untouched a speech which must live in their recollection as the most consoling, able, wise, and, for practical effect in preserving the peace and inducing the deluded portion of the people to return to the exercise of good sense, the most useful speech ever heard within those walls. It was more convenient to quit that speech than to answer it, and to bring forward statements which had not been found in any arguments in that House, and which might have perished with the columns in which they appeared, as far as he knew. But he would show the substantial correctness of the facts which had been triumphantly urged as misrepresentations. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Coke) had said, that major Cochrane had interfered to prevent a woman and child from being sabred. Major Cochrane had pointed out some inaccuracy in this. Upon which much sarcasm was thrown out against the statement. But major Cochrane did not deny that a woman and a child had been sabred. This had never been denied, and he pledged himself to prove it true if the House would give him leave. It was also true, that major Cochrane had interfered in another part of the field, to prevent the yeomen from attacking the mob who were attempting to escape. Next came the statement of the hon. member for York (Mr. Dundas), who had said, that the sabres had been sharpened with a view to the meeting; and had afterwards with excessive candour, on the safest side to err on, contradicted that observation. The inference drawn from this circumstance was, that newspapers were not to be believed, and that public meetings were instruments of deception. But the sabres were, in fact, sharpened.

Mr. Dundas here begged to state, in order to prevent further misrepresentation from going forth to the public, that the swords had not been sharpened for the purpose of the meeting: the swords had been sent to the cutler, but it was in the usual course.

Mr. Brougham.—If his hon. friend had allowed him to proceed, he would have saved him the trouble of making the observations he had made. He meant to say, that the statement in evidence before the coroner's inquest was, that the swords had been sharpened with a view to that particular day [a laugh from the ministerial side]. He hoped the House knew knew him too well to suppose that he would shelter himself under a quibble which was evidently imputed to him. The swords had been sent to be sharpened before the meeting, as appeared in evidence. They had been so sent some few days before the meeting was called, and after the intention of calling it was formed. The magistrates and yeomen were aware of this intention, and in consequence sent the swords to be sharpened. The conclusion was drawn from the knowledge of the intention with which the magistrates were fixed. Another ground of that inference was, that no such usage did in fact prevail; and that with respect to a corps which had existed so short a time, to talk of usage was an abuse of terms. He did not shrink, therefore, from the conclusion, that the swords were sharpened for the purpose. If he was in error, he desired to have his error corrected; but let that correction be the result of inquiry. But if errors ten thousand times more numerous could be detected, it was nothing to the purpose. Some errors and some falsehoods must always appear on questions always discussed, thank God, with so much interest by the people of this country. Granting, for a moment, that the Manchester meeting was illegal, there still remained that important question—were no illegal means used in its dispersion? We knew it was held by an hon. gentleman opposite, that an illegal meeting might be dispersed by means equally illegal. For this, no doubt, he would plead authorities; but was it meant to be contended, that the functions of that House, admitted, as it was, to be the grand inquest of the country, were so widely different, so essentially distinct from its other privileges, that they would exist at all times without the one interfering with the other?

In regard to the important interests concerned in the decision of that question, he would ask, supposing it was represented that from many motives and feelings, there was a slowness in bringing these men to account; that one party had not pecuniary means, or having, misapplied them (and indeed the noble lord had in his speech almost supposed the second of these positions, and the fact of that position led him (Mr. Brougham) to assume the first);—the noble lord considering these as the two parties interested in this great and serious question, he would ask, whether there was not a third party who had received and sustained damage by the conduct of these magistrates—the public of this country [Hear, hear!]? As to the clamour which had been raised against extra-judicial proceedings, when that House directed any man to be prosecuted by the attorney-general, was it ever seriously debated whether his crime was one cognizable by law or not? Did they stop to ask such a question in the cases of Mr. Swan, of sir M. Lopez, of Mr. Reeves, or Mr. Stockdale, or of lord Melville? He could not but express his disappointment at the opinions expressed on this subject by several of his hon. friends, for whom he entertained the highest respect, and particularly at the opinion expressed by his hon. and learned friend the member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Wynn,) a man learned beyond all others in the history of that assembly, whose privileges he (Mr. B.) was endeavouring to support—skilled beyond all men—deeper than all the children of men—in the knowledge of the voluminous records of parliamentary precedents—a man who was even supposed by most people to know the whole of the journals of the House by heart; who devoted to their study the light of day and the midnight oil; whose accuracy in every thing connected with parliament was so rigid, that many persons imagined he really came down to the House every morning at ten o'clock, the hour at which the House ought to assemble, according to the strict letter of the adjournment [a laugh]—in short, a man whose devotion in this respect could only be equalled by that of a learned ancestor of his, who having fainted from excessive toil and fatigue, a smelling bottle was called for, but one who knew much better the remedy adapted to the case of that gentleman, exclaimed, "For God's sake bring him an act of parliament, and let him smell at that" [a laugh]. He could not help thinking in like manner, that in case his hon. and learned friend should ever be attacked in a similar way, the mere smelling of a volume of the journals could not fail instantly to revive him. He was astonished that his hon. and learned friend should contend that the inquiry now called for could not with propriety be entered on by parliament, and was unwarranted by the practice of parliament, when there were so many precedents on the journals proving directly the contrary of this. Here the hon. and learned gentleman alluded to several cases, and dwelt particularly on that of the duke of Buckingham, in which, after most elaborate arguments by the great lawyer of that day, the predecessor of his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Wynn), in antiquarian and constitutional knowledge, it was decided that even common fame might be a ground for a parliamentary impeachment.

Great stress had been laid on the injustice and cruelty of sending any one to trial, with the weight of the opinion of that House operating against him. But if he knew any thing of the people of this country, the opinion of that House would, so far from operating unfavourably against any individual on his trial, be productive of an effect directly the reverse, and would excite in his favour sentiments of pity and commiseration. And, what was the fact? It had happened, fortunately for his argument, that in almost every instance the individuals ordered for prosecution by that House had been acquitted; and in the very last case of the kind, that of Mr. Swan, he was acquitted on all the points on which he was ordered to be prosecuted by the House, though he was convicted on another point. But the inquiry became necessary for another important reason. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the meeting was illegal—though he begged to be understood as having yet neither heard nor seen any thing to satisfy him that it was illegal—and supposing that the conduct of the magistrates was strictly warranted by law, still the manner in which they exercised the discretionary powers with which they were vested by law, might be a fair subject for a parliamentary inquiry. We know that a serious and alarming affray took place, in which several of his majesty's subjects lost their lives, and great numbers were maimed and mutilated. An hon. magistrate (Mr. Wilbraham) had said, that the whole number of persons taken to the infirmary at Manchester, in consequence of injuries received by them on the 16th, amounted only to twenty-six. But with all deference to the hon. gentleman, he had received information from a magistrate who was possessed of a correct knowledge on this subject, and who could not possibly be mistaken, that the number of wounded persons taken to the infirmary amounted to fifty-six. But this formed a very small proportion of the persons injured on that day. It was well known that a great prejudice existed in the north against hospitals (a ridiculous prejudice, no doubt), and that people chose rather to resort to bone-setters and persons of a similar description, when in want of medical assistance. Comparatively few of the persons who suffered on the 16th, were taken to the infirmary. John Lees, for instance, on whom the inquest was held at Oldham, was not taken to the infirmary. He knew, from persons who from motives of charity, and totally uninfluenced by party motives had made it their business to visit the persons who suffered on the 16th, that the number of wounded persons amounted at least to 400. Some of these persons made the number amount to 500 and upwards, and the lowest amount was 400. Now it so happened, that at all the other meetings where a different course had been pursued, no accident whatever had taken place. The meeting at Birmingham, when a Legislative Attorney to that House was elected, had an illegal object in view, and was certainly much more calculated to excite alarm than the meeting at Manchester, but even there the people had been allowed to disperse peaceably. At Manchester only, where a different course had been pursued, the most disastrous and deplorable consequences had ensued.

The remedies now proposed to meet the disaffection which existed in the country would, he was convinced, be found altogether inadequate. The most extravagant notions, no doubt prevailed with respect to parliamentary reform; but if they wished to put a stop to the spread of these doctrines, instead of enacting laws of severity, and imposing restrictions on the liberty of the subject, they would proceed to remedy those grievances of which the country had to complain, and particularly reform those glaring abuses in the representation of the House, which were so generally lamented. He had always advocated parliamentary reform, and it was only by a wise and temperate reform that they could allay the discontent of the country. He lamented as much as any man the circulation of blasphemous and seditious publications, and he therefore rejoiced at the result of some recent trials, by which it was proved that the laws of the country, when enforced, were sufficient for the repression of blasphemy and sedition. The manner in which the law had been administered on those occasions, reflected eternal honour on the learned judge who presided, and would, in his opinion, be sufficient to bring out the character of the country more pure than before. The law there had been found sufficient to assert its own force; and he considered that if sedition or treason existed, it would be also found strong enough to put them down. If it should not be so, he could only attribute it to the circumstance of its not having been hitherto administered with a steady hand. It was now too late to complain of the licentiousness of the press—too late to complain of the gross and disgusting passages which were sent before the public, and which he lamented as much as any man. He, too, had to complain of the existence of such abuses, but from a different cause; for it seemed as if the abuse and licentiousness of the press had been fostered, in order to give some colourable ground for an attack upon its liberty. What he had to complain of, and did complain of, was, that in the last three years, without an attempt at prosecution, a mass of the grossest and most criminal matter had been launched forth to the public with which ever society had been visited. In some of those writings assassination had been inculcated, forgery defended, and almost every act which could violate allegiance, encouraged. He had within the last two hours read some parts of a newspaper, published in 1817, in which it was said, that the House of Commons was an imposture, the House of Lords an imposture, and the king equally an imposture, and that they were only supported in the oppression of the people by the influence of 300,000 bayonets. It was added, that the office of the king was a sinecure, and ought like others to be abolished. The sovereign was then addressed in a coarse and familiar way, and asked, what it was he did for the money which he received from the public. The speech which Oliver Cromwell had addressed to the parliament, when he ordered what he termed "that bauble" (the Speaker's mace) to be removed, was then repeated to him, and he was advised to imitate it. This he had seen in a newspaper published two years and a half ago, and he had not learned that it had been attempted to prosecute it. There was besides this a sort of catechism in which murder and high-treason were treated as innocent and justifiable acts. It was asked "Was high treason a crime?" To which the answer was, "Not always." Another question was, "When is high treason a crime?" and the answer was, "When a subject ascends the throne by the choice of the people, then to put that man to death would be a crime, because there would be a loss of a good man to the people." But (continued Mr. Brougham) the writer of the catechism went on, and said, that when a man receives the throne as an hereditary right, then it would not be a crime even if the man were a good and efficient sovereign. Who then were to blame, if the press was licentious, but they who had not taken any steps to correct it by the proper application of those remedies which the laws prescribed? He thanked the House for their indulgence. His remarks were sincere; and he hoped they would be received as coming from one who would rather be the victim of anarchy than survive the constitution of his country.

The question being put, That the words proposed by Mr. Tierney be added to the said Address, the House divided:

Ayes..... 150
Noes..... 381

Majority ..... 231

The main question was then put, and agreed to; and at five o'clock in the morning the House adjourned.

PAPERS RELATIVE TO THE INTERNAL STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] The following Papers were presented to both Houses of Parliament, by command of the Prince Regent :

PAPERS RELATIVE TO THE INTERNAL STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

No. 1.—EXTRACT of a Letter from five Magistrates of Lancashire to Lord Sidmouth ; dated, New Bailey Court House, Salford, 1st July 1819.

My Lord ;—As magistrates of this district we feel ourselves called upon to communicate to your lordship, our impressions upon the present state of affairs within the reach of our observation. We are far from wishing to yield to unnecessary alarm ; but when we entertain serious apprehensions, we cannot refrain from making them known to your lordship.—We feel a difficulty in stating to your lordship, any specific facts upon which legal responsibility will attach to any particular individuals at present ; but upon the general view of the subject, we cannot have a doubt that some alarming insurrection is in contemplation.—Of the deep distresses of the manufacturing classes of this extensive population your lordship is fully apprised, and the disaffected and ill-disposed lose no opportunity of instilling the worst principles into the unhappy sufferers in these times, attributing their calamities not to any event which cannot be controlled, but to the general measures of government and parliament ; and when the people are oppressed with hunger, we do not wonder at their giving ear to any doctrines which they are told will redress their grievances.—Although we cannot but applaud the hitherto peaceable demeanour of many of the labouring classes, yet we do not calculate upon their remaining unmoved. Urged on by the harangues of a few desperate demagogues, we anticipate at no distant period, a general rising ; and possessing no power to prevent the meetings which are weekly held, we, as magistrates, are at a loss how to stem the influence of the dangerous and seditious doctrines which are continually disseminated. To these meetings and the unbounded liberty of the press, we refer the principal weight of the evil which we apprehend.—We believe, on Monday next, a meeting will be held at Blackburn, and on the following Monday at Manchester, at both of which sir Charles Wolseley is to preside. As the law now stands we cannot interfere with these meetings, notwithstanding our decided conviction of their mischief and danger. We are most anxious to do every thing in our power to preserve the peace of the country, but upon this most important point we are unarmed. We have the honour to be, &c. J. Silvester, R. Wright, W. Marriott, C. W. Ethelston, J. Norris.

No. 2.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Mr. Spooner, a Magistrate of Manchester, to Lord Sidmouth; dated, Birmingham, July 5th, 1819.

My Lord ;—I have the honour to enclose, for your lordship's information, the copy of an advertisement circulated throughout the town of Birmingham, calling for a public meeting on Monday next. Your lordship will not fail to observe the day and the hour fixed for this meeting, both of which are well calculated for the collection of a crowd of persons, many of whom will be fast approaching to a state of intoxication, and therefore more easily inflamed to acts of violence, by the speeches which will no doubt be addressed to them. I am informed that applications have been made to sir Charles Wolseley to preside, and to Wooler, Johnson, and others to attend. I have &c. ISAAC SPOONER.

No. 3.—TOWN'S MEETING.

On Monday, July 12th, a meeting of the inhabitants of Birmingham will take place at three o'clock in the afternoon, at the New Hall Hill, for the purpose of considering of the best means of obtaining the representation of the people of Birmingham in parliament, and also the representation of all the unrepresented inhabitants of the empire. Signed on behalf of the Requisitionists, July 3rd, 1819. GEORGE EDMONDS.

No. 4.—RESOLUTIONS at the Quarter Sessions for the County of Chester.

At the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace of our Lord the King, held at Nether Knutsford, in and for the County of Chester, on Tuesday the 13th of July, 1819.—Present, The Earl of Stamford and Warrington, his Majesty's Lieutenant. Sir John Thomas Stanley, Bart.; Sir Henry Mainwaring Mainwaring, Bart.; Trafford Trafford, Edwin Corbett, Thomas William Talton, John Ford, John Glegg, Wilbraham Egerton, Thomas Bayley Hall, Egerton Leigh, Edward Venables Townsend, Peter Marsland, Nathaniel Makey Pattison, Ralph Wright, Edward Tomkinson, John Hoskin Harper, Esquires; the Rev. Charles Prescott, John Browne, John H. Mallory, and James Thomas Law, Clerks.—A letter from Lord Sidmouth, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, to the Lord Lieutenant of this county, as to the preservation of the public tranquillity, having been laid before this Court. It is Resolved;

That we, the acting magistrates for the county of Chester, will, both in our public and private capacities, do our utmost to further the views of his Majesty's government, in preserving the peace and good order of the country.—That it appears that various public meetings have lately been held in this and the neighbouring counties, at which evil-disposed and designing persons, taking advantage of the depression of trade and the consequent distress, have wickedly disseminated inflammatory doctrines; and, under the false pretext of Parliamentary Reform, have vilified the constituted authorities, inciting thereby the ignorant and unwary to insurrection and the commission of crimes, which may endanger their personal liberty and lives.—That we therefore conceive it to be our duty, as it is also our determination, to counteract, to the utmost of our power, all such designs; and we do most earnestly recommend to all the friends of our King and Constitution, as by law established, to rally round the standard of legal authority, and, by the manifestation of their principles, destroy the baneful effects of blasphemous and seditious doctrines, reclaim the deluded, give confidence to the loyal, and maintain inviolate our rights, our liberty and our laws.—And we further recommend, that all well-disposed individuals be invited to declare their willingness to come forward in support of the civil power; and if necessary, to form voluntary associations for the preservation of the public tranquillity.—And we further recommend the magistrates at their several Petty Sessions, in cases of emergency, to appoint such number of the well-disposed inhabitants in their districts to be special constables, as to them shall seem necessary for the preservation of the peace.

Resolved;—That the magistrates acting for the hundred of Macclesfield, be requested to obtain all the information in their power, as to the proceedings of the disaffected in that district; and that this Court do adjourn to an early day for the purpose of receiving their reports, and adopting such further measures as circumstances may require: That it be recommended to the magistrates in the hundreds of Bucklow and Macclesfield, to act on the present occasion as far as possible in concert with the magistrates of the county of Lancaster: That these Resolutions be inserted in all the public papers published within this county: That these Resolutions be signed by the lord lieutenant, on behalf of the meeting.

Lieutenant.

No. 5.—LETTER from Mr. Spooner to Lord Sidmouth; dated Birmingham, July 13, 1819.

My Lord; I have great satisfaction in making known to you, that the meeting held in this place yesterday evening, was not attended with any breach of the peace, and that the whole assemblage had quietly dispersed before seven o'clock. It may not, however, be unacceptable to your lordship to be acquainted with some small detail of the proceedings, as reported to me by various persons employed for that purpose. An attempt was first made to collect a crowd, by a miserable procession (as it was called) of major Cartwright, Wooler, and Edmonds, in a street chariot, carrying two flags; they were also accompanied by one Maddocks, whose father was executed at Warwick some years since upon a Bank prosecution, and whose brother is now transported under a similar conviction. Sir Charles Wolseley was not present, having excused himself on account of the death of a near relation. The chair was taken by Edmonds; and the only speakers were Edmonds, Maddocks, Wooler, major Cartwright, and one Lewis, who had attended sir C. Wolseley at Stockport. The proceedings were confined to certain resolutions expressive of the want of reform in the representation of the people; a remonstrance founded on those resolutions, and addressed (I believe, to the Speaker of the House of Commons; an election of sir Charles Wolseley to be Legislatorial Attorney of the people of Birmingham in parliament, for one year, if so long he executed his trust faithfully; an exhortation to this gentleman to be at his post on the opening of the next session of parliament and instructions to him how to proceed. All these, I presume, will be printed, when your lordship shall be furnished with a copy. The language held out in the speeches was of a very different kind from that which we understood to have been used at the meetings to the northward, which appears sufficiently to prove the knowledge of the speakers, that their audience, on this occasion were not prepared to bear that language, or to support those who might make use of it. The most violent speaker was Lewis; the tenor of all the speeches was, abuse of the body calling itself the House of Commons, and abuse of some individuals amongst his majesty's ministers.—The crowd assembled has been variously estimated, from 10,000 to 25,000 persons; of these, however, a great proportion were women and children. The nature of the ground is such, being two sides of an amphitheatre, rising to a considerable height, that it is almost impossible for a person in the crowd to form any estimate of numbers. Lord Aylesford and myself, who could survey the whole assemblage from the roof of an adjoining house, had formed our own opinion, that the number could not exceed 10,000. This meeting seems to afford good ground of conclusion, that the first open acts of violence to which the populace are to be instigated, will not take place in this immediate neighbourhood.—It is, however (to use the language of this Lewis), "one blow to the existing system;" and I presume the next meeting called here will be to receive the report of what occurs upon sir Charles Wolseley offering to take his seat, if he is wild enough so far to fall into their plans.—After the meeting a small party of the principal performers and their adherents adjourned to a low public-house to pass the evening, but I have not heard what occurred there.—I had the greatest satisfaction in lord Aylesford's attendance here, both in his assistance as a magistrate, and from his being on the spot to issue the necessary orders for the assembling of the yeomanry, had any disturbance occurred. His lordship, as well as myself, thought it prudent to remain in the town during the whole night. I have, &c.

No. 6.—LETTER from the Earl of Derby, Lord Lieutenant of Lancashire, to Lord Sidmouth; dated Knowsley, Friday night, July 16, 1819.

My Lord; I have the honour to inform your lordship, that I have this evening had an interview with Mr. Norris, the residing magistrate, and Mr. Moor, the first constable of Manchester, who has communicated to me the enclosed resolutions of a meeting held in that town, with a view to strengthen the civil power; and these gentlemen have at the same time showed me a letter from your lordship's office, giving them reason to believe that the offer of an armed association, if sanctioned by my recommendation, would meet with the approbation of his majesty's government; I therefore lose no time in laying their proposal before your lordship, and adding my strongest conviction that its immediate adoption will be highly conducive to the preservation of the public peace in the district of Manchester and its neighbourhood, and therefore I request your lordship to lay it before the Prince Regent with my recommendation; and that if his royal highness is pleased to approve thereof, you will give immediate directions to the proper officers that the arms and accoutrements necessary to give effect to this plan, may be furnished to the association, with as little delay as possible. On the strength of your lordship's letter, I have ventured to desire I may be furnished with a list of the persons whom it is wished to recommend as officers, and I shall do myself the honour of forwarding it to your lordship as soon as I receive the same, that in case the plan is approved, the same may be put into execution with that promptitude recommended by your lordship, and which I am persuaded the exigency of the case requires.—I have, &c.

DERBY.

No. 7.—RESOLUTIONS inclosed therein.

Manchester Police Office, July 16, 1819.—At a Meeting of the Committee "to Strengthen the Civil Power," John Bradshaw, esq. in the Chair, the following Resolutions were passed unanimously:

That government having signified their approbation of an armed association, an offer be immediately made by this committee, through the medium of the lord lieutenant of this county of an armed association in aid of the civil power, and for the protection of the towns of Manchester and Salford, and their immediate neighbourhood; and that government be requested for the present to furnish arms and accoutrements for one thousand men.—That this committee do not conceive that any uniform will be necessary for such armed association.—That it is on every account desirable that the least possible sacrifice of time should be required in drilling, as it is considered only necessary that the most simple parts of military discipline should be acquired by such association.—That a deputation, consisting of Mr. Norris, the resident magistrate, and Mr. Moor, the first constable of Manchester, do immediately wait upon the lord lieutenant of the county, to communicate the foregoing resolutions, and to take his opinion thereupon.

(Signed) JOHN BRADSHAW, Chairman.

No. 8.—RESOLUTIONS passed at the Meeting held on Hunslet Moor, near Leeds, 19th July, 1819.

Resolved, 1st. That there is no such thing as servitude in nature; and therefore all statutes and enactments that have tendency to injure one part of society for the benefit of the other, is a gross violation of the immutable law of God.—2nd. That as our legislators have, in innumerable instances, manifested a cruel and criminal indifference to our truly distressed situation, and treated our petitions with contempt, we therefore make this solemn appeal to our oppressed fellow-countrymen, praying them to join us in forming a national union, the object of which is to obtain an overwhelming majority of the male population, to present such a petition as can scarcely fail to have the desired effect, and to adopt such other constitutional measures as may be deemed most expedient to procure for us the redress of our manifold grievances.—3rd. That we are perfectly satisfied that our excellent constitution, in its original purity, as it was bequeathed to us by our brave ancestors, is fully adequate to all the purposes of good government; we are therefore determined not to rest satisfied with any thing short of the constitution—the whole constitution—and nothing but the constitution.—4th. That as we are perfectly satisfied that annual parliaments and universal suffrage constitute an essential part of our constitution, and are our rightful inheritance—we shall consider our grievances unredressed, and our indisputable rights withheld from us, until we are possessed of such annual parliament and universal suffrage.—5th. That this meeting cannot but view with regret the apathy of our should-be leaders, that is our men of property, in not supporting our mutual rights, convinced that alienation of the rich from the poor, must, in the end, be the ruin of both; that whenever oppression or despotism militates, or is the ruin of one, it must, in the end, be the destruction of the other; we therefore intreat them, ere it be too late to stand forward and espouse the constitutional rights of the people, by endeavouring to obtain a radical reform in the system of representation, which can alone save the trading and labouring classes from ruin.—6th. That we believe the distresses we now suffer have originated in boroughmongering system, aided by a depreciated paper currency, which has involved the nation in one hundred thousand millions of debt, and which has increased taxation to such an extent as has nearly destroyed our manufactures and commerce; and we are perfectly satisfied that nothing but a currency convertible into specie, a rigid economy, and an equal representation, can either put an end to our sufferings, or save our country from ruin.—7th. That the saving bank scheme, which was instituted under a pretence of benefiting the working classes, when nearly three-fourths of them were out of employ, is an insult to common sense and real understanding, and ought to be considered as what it really is,—an engine to work the last shilling out of the pockets of a few old servants and retired tradesmen, to enable the bank and boroughmongers to pay the fractional parts of the dividends, and to create a sort of lesser fund holders of those who know no better than to make a deposit of their hard earnings to fill the pockets of those who are draining them of their last shilling.—8th. That, as distress has become so general and extensive, we deem it highly necessary, that deputy meetings should be appointed, and out of these deputy meetings, district meetings, to meet at any place that may be thought proper; that these meetings shall extend throughout the three united kingdoms, and that they do consist of men discreet and wise, and out of these shall be appointed men to form a national meeting, that the whole may be brought to one focus, in order that they may devise the best plan of obtaining a radical reform, upon the principle of annual parliaments, universal suffrage, and election by ballot.—9th. That no redress can be obtained but from ourselves; that we amply possess the means; and if we fail to adopt them with vigour, and resolutely persevere therein, we shall merit every privation we may have to endure, and deserve the detestation of posterity, to whom we shall leave a greater legacy of tyranny and oppression than ever was bequeathed from one generation to another.—10th. That should the usurpers of our rights, in order to retain their power, proceed to acts of violence against the people, and even succeed in incarcerating individuals, we earnestly intreat our fellow-countrymen not to suffer their exertions to relax, but, on the contrary, persevere in the steady path of duty, looking to the end, even the salvation of our country; and our fellow countrymen will endeavour to lighten the fetters, and enliven the dungeons of those men who are now suffering, or may hereafter suffer in the sacred cause of liberty.--11th. That we consider it to be the duty of every well-meaning subject, to stand with all his might against oppression and partial law; in doing which an individual exposes himself to destruction, but if the whole community act as one man, success must be the result.--12th. That every well-wisher to mankind cannot but consider it to be his duty to endeavour, by every means in his power, to work a thorough reformation in the political and moral state of the country; and the surest mean is to lay aside every sordid maxim of avarice, and abandon the restraints of luxury and false ambition, which are at present so fatal to the nation.--13th. That a very small number of men who have guided the councils, and have plundered the people in order to complete their fraud, have hired the offscouring of society to print and publish newspapers, who have nearly succeeded in making thousands who might have been the leaders and friends of the people, believe the present system was for our good, when they were fattening on our property, and reducing all classes of society, till they have at last brought us to a strait from whence there are no issues but through a radical reform.--14th. That the passing of corn laws in opposition to the express will of the people--the Combination act, in order to prevent work people from unitedly attempting to raise their wages in proportion to the advancement of provisions--and the imposing a duty on foreign wool, at a time when the woollen manufacture, and those employed therein, are in the most deplorable condition--appear to this meeting, proof positive, that until the members of the Commons House are really appointed by the people at large, little improvement is to be expected in the circumstances of the people, or diminution of their distress.--15th. That as soon as an eligible person, who will accept the appointment, can be found to represent the unrepresented part of the inhabitants of Leeds, in the House of Commons, another meeting shall be called for the purpose of electing him to that situation.

No. 9.—ADDRESS from the Grand Jury of Lancashire, at the Quarter Sessions at Salford, to the Magistrates; dated New Bailey Court House, Manchester, 20th July, 1819.

To the Worshipful the Chairman and Magistrates assembled at the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the Hundred of Salford.

The solemn and important duty which we have been called upon to discharge, could not fail to impress most forcibly upon our minds

a grateful sense of the blessings which every individual of this nation enjoys under the administration of just and equal laws, and under the protection of a constitution so wisely and so excellently framed; and we feel it incumbent upon us thus openly to express our united concern and abhorrence, when we observe that foul and restless spirit of sedition which has so long been maturing its desperate designs, and has so frequently disturbed the public peace, assuming at the present moment a tone of defiance, and pursuing a system of organization which unquestionably indicate an approaching effort to involve this country in all the horrors of a revolution.—We are fully aware of the alarming crisis at which we are arrived, and anxious that the public should be awakened to a sense of the danger to which they are exposed; we nevertheless feel a strong and well-grounded confidence in the zeal and loyalty of the great body of the people, and in the unanimity with which all good and honest men of every party and persuasion will stand forward in repelling every outrage and violence which may be attempted; and that they will co-operate with the civil authorities, in support of our laws and constitution, in the maintenance of public peace, and for the security of their properties and their lives.—We are well assured that the magistrates and the local authorities of this district will adopt every measure of precaution which their wisdom and experience may judge necessary for the public safety; at the same time we cannot refrain from stating it as our decided opinion, that it is expedient to recommend the immediate establishment of armed associations in these towns, and in the surrounding districts, for the purpose of strengthening and supporting the civil power; and we are persuaded that any recommendation from the magistrates on this subject, will be promptly and most eagerly obeyed.—But whilst we thus feel the urgent necessity of providing for the public security against every lawless and treasonable attempt of the abettors of revolution, we are not insensible to the distress which prevails among the labouring classes of society, in consequence of the present serious depression of our commerce. We know that the wants and privations which the families of the industrious labourer now endure, owing to the low rate of wages, are extremely severe; and we feel it our duty to recommend the adoption of every possible means for their relief and support: but we know at the same time that their distresses have no relation at all to the government or constitution of this country: they arise from the state of our trade with foreign countries, and are purely of a commercial nature; and we know that similar distress, in a far greater degree, is experienced both in America and throughout the whole continent of Europe.—It is evident therefore to the plain reason and understanding of every honest man, that any attempts to disturb the public tranquillity and to seize this occasion of carrying into effect revolutionary designs against the state, can only serve to increase and embitter our present misfortunes; to interrupt the regular course of trade; and to retard the return of better and more prosperous times; and we fervently hope that such of our misguided countrymen as may have been seduced from their allegiance will yet seriously pause; and consider, that if they persevere in the wicked course which they are now pursuing, they will inevitably bring upon themselves the just and severe punishment of the offended laws of their country.

No. 10.—LETTER from Earl Fitzwilliam, Lord Lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire, to Lord Sidmouth; dated Wentworth, 21st July, 1819.

My lord;—A general meeting of the people on Hunslet Moor, near Leeds, having been fixed for Monday the 19th instant, I have deferred writing to your lordship since my arrival in the West Riding, till that event had taken place.—From the reports I have received of what passed on that occasion, I find that nearly the same orators who took a leading part at the preceding meeting at the same place, and also at other meetings in the West Riding, again took the lead at this; their professed object and means the same—parliamentary reform through universal suffrage, election by ballot, and annual parliaments, but not to be sought for by violence,—to these was added on this occasion, the election of a representative to parliament, whenever a proper one could be met with. The resolutions passed were numerous and long, but I have not their particulars as yet, the managers not having yet dressed them up to their own liking for print, which I suppose they will do in the usual way on such occasions, without any very scrupulous attention to what was proposed and passed by the meeting: however, when printed, the sentiments and views of these leaders will be ascertained—for the present I have to report to your lordship (according to the reports made to me) that the tone of these gentlemen was manifestly humble and much lowered, compared to that they assumed at the preceding meeting at the same place; so much so, that even an inclination to petition parliament was expressed—at the close the meeting was dissolved.—I am given to understand, that scarcely more than half the number of the preceding meeting had assembled at this, and that the proportion of women was much larger at this than at the former: it passed off without the least disturbance or tumult; and they dispersed in the most peaceable and orderly manner, without insult or affront to any one. I have reason to think that such a termination of this meeting was foreseen by the mayor, founded upon an opinion, that the mass of the population within his jurisdiction is by no means disaffected nor seditiously disposed; that they are suffering most cruel privations through want of employment, the consequence of stagnation of trade; but I am told, that aware of the cause, they bear their hard lot with wonderful patience and resignation: but the very circumstance of want of occupation leads many to make part of the throng on occasion of such meetings, without being parties in the views of the leaders, or participating in their sentiments.—It will be a happy thing if the seditious and dangerous language that undoubtedly has been most directly held by these itinerant orators, can be brought home to them; the conviction of any will be a public good; but bad as the men may be, and indefatigable in propagating their doctrines, their mischievous spirit does not pervade the mass of the population of the West Riding; on the contrary, from all I can collect, I report with confidence to your lordship, that the peace, tranquillity, and good order of the realm will not be disturbed by these people.—I have the honour to be, &c.

WENTWORTH FITZWILLIAM.

No. 11.—LETTER from the same to the same; dated Wentworth, 31st July, 1819.

My lord;—Considering the assizes at York as the best possible opportunity for collecting the general opinion respecting the temper and disposition of the people of the Riding, I went thither; and it is with great satisfaction I report to your lordship, that it appeared the universal sentiment, that however much the population of the manufacturing district might suffer under the present stagnation of trade, there was no disposition to unite imaginary grievances with real distress. They had attended meetings which had been called, not in the view of taking part in the political disquisitions and claims of the itinerant orators, but in the hope and expectation that they would be directed to the bettering their own condition; and indeed it is thought, that as far as the assemblage extended on those occasions, it was in great degree owing to their real grievance, want of employment; they went, having nothing else to do. I am confident I speak the general sentiment of those present at York, in saying, that there is no cause for suspecting any disposition of the people of this Riding, to turbulence or commotion: if there be any discontent in their minds, it has nothing to do with constitutional considerations, but arises out of the improvements in the art of manufacture, which diminishes the calls for their exertions and industry, and has become to them a real afflicting grievance.---I add likewise, as the prevalent and I believe universal opinion of the gentlemen I met at York, that no step that could in any way convey a suspicion or jealousy of the people's views and wishes, should be adopted; but that on the contrary we should prove to them by our own demeanor, our opinion of their good disposition, and our confidence of their good conduct.---I have the honour to be, &c.

Sir;---Birch brought in Harrison at eight o'clock, and was followed to his own house (where he lodged him) by a mob. I took the justice there to have him committed, and we were insulted.---The bail were directed to wait upon me. Whilst I was examining them, as to their sufficiency, three men came up to Birch and questioned him as to Harrison, and that instant one of the three fired a pistol at Birch, who was not two yards from the person who fired. The bullet lodged in his breast, and cannot be found.---I have, &c.

No. 13.---EXTRACT of a Letter from Mr. Norris, a Magistrate of Lancashire, to Lord Sidmouth, dated Manchester, August 5, 1819.

My lord;---Herewith I transmit your lordship two hand-bills published here, by which you will find that the meeting for Monday is put off. This I believe will be a great disappointment to the neighbouring towns, which have provided numbers of flags and caps of liberty for the ensuing occasion. The drilling parties increase very extensively, and unless some mode be devised of putting this system down, it promises to become a most formidable engine of rebellion. I expect the operation of the Watch and Ward act will have great effect in this instance.---I have, &c.

PUBLIC MEETING.---We, the undersigned inhabitant householders of Manchester, having given notice of a public meeting, intended to have been held here "on Monday the 9th of August, 1819, on the area near St. Peter's church," which notice was published in the Manchester Observer of Saturday last, 31st July, do hereby respectfully inform the public, that after a mature consideration of all circumstances, we deem it prudent to acquaint the public, that such Meeting will NOT at that time take place, and respectfully recommend to our fellow townsmen and neighbours to relinquish their intentions of attending that meeting, for the specific purpose expressed in the advertisement.---Our guardians of the public peace having, in massy placards and large letters declared the said meeting to be illegal, and commanded the people to "ABSTAIN FROM ATTENDING THE SAID MEETING AT THEIR PERIL," although these guardian angels did not deign to inform the public wherein such illegality consisted: yet in compliance with their mandate, and to give them no just ground of opposition or offence, it has been deemed advisable not to hold such meeting; but to request the boroughreeve and constables to convene another; which requisition now lies, but will only lie this day, for signatures at the Observer office, and at No. 49, Great Ancot's-street.

Massey, 2, School-street.

No. 15.---Another Hand Bill inclosed therein.

The following is a Copy of the Requisition now remaining for Signatures at the Observer Office, and 49, Great Ancot's-street.

To the Boroughreeve and Constables of Manchester.---We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, request that you will convene a meeting at as early a day as possible, to consider the propriety of adopting the most legal and effectual means of obtaining a reform in the Commons House of Parliament. Wednesday, August 4, 1819.

To the Requisitionists, who signed the notice for the public meeting on Monday next.

Fellow Citizens;---On my return from Liverpool, with the result of the important mission which you did me the honour to confide into my hands, and in the faithful discharge of my duty towards you, and the rest of my fellow citizens, I deem it necessary thus publicly to inform you, that after taking counsel's opinion upon the legality of your public notice, I am instructed by Mr. Ranecock, to say, "that the intention of choosing representatives, contrary to the existing law, tends greatly to render the proposed meeting seditious: under those circumstances, it would be deemed justifiable in the magistrates to prevent such meeting."---In recommending you to withdraw your notice, and relinquish your intention of meeting your neighbours, on the important subjects intended to have been discussed on Monday next, I deem it necessary to state to you and to the public, that in the opinion of the most enlightened friends to liberty, resident in Liverpool, your requisition is perfectly legal and constitutional; they are, nevertheless, induced to recommend this pause in your proceedings, merely in consideration of the cruel threats of violence

issued in a paper* from the bench of magistrates, since the publication of your notice, and of the evident preparations now making to carry those threats into execution. I am acquainted with your necessities—I know the honesty of your intentions,—and the lawful means you are desirous of pursuing; but in a question of absolute right, you are not prepared to defend yourselves; I therefore do not deem it adviseable, under the present circumstances, to subject the persons of yourselves or your friends, to the illegal and unconstitutional violence which your oppressors and their contemptible tools have prepared for the occasion.—The formidable preparations which your tyrants have made to meet you, their unarmed and suffering victims, is the highest compliment in their power to bestow upon you; it is more even than you could hope to gain by the meeting, you therefore may relinquish the objectionable parts of your requisition without regret, or even the shadow of a defeat.—Col. Williams, a county magistrate, had the honest boldness, on Monday last, at the Liverpool quarter sessions, to advocate your cause, and the cause of the Lancashire reformers, before his brother magistrates; he confounded the whole bench; not one man being disposed to reply to the constitutional arguments of this faithful and sincere friend of his country.—I beg leave to conclude, with reminding you, and all the friends of liberty and justice, that our cause grows and gathers strength with the plunderings of our enemies; whilst their rapacity must not only destroy the means of their own existence, but must, ere long, turn them to the destruction of each other. I am, &c.

Hargreaves was one who gave the word of command. They were in open column when informant first saw them, and then wheeled into line. Hargreaves was in front, and appeared to give the word of command to one division: that about midnight, or a little afterwards, informant and several others apprehended Hargreaves. Informant challenged him with having been drilling persons on Cockey Moor: Hargreaves at first denied it, but on informant telling him that he (Hargreaves) had wheeled them into line, Hargreaves acknowledged that he had done so; and he then said, if they would but be merciful to him he would do so no more.

Who saith, that he went by direction of the magistrates, to Cockey Moor on Saturday evening, to observe the persons that were suspected to be drilling or training and exercising there: that it was about a quarter past eight in the evening, when informant got to the Moor; there were about one hundred persons drilling. The prisoner George Greenhalgh was giving the word of command to about thirty-six men; they were in open column, told off in three or four divisions when informant got to them. They had been marching in files when informant first saw them. George Greenhalgh ordered them to form the line; they then advanced in line, and they did many other manœuvres, George Greenhalgh giving the word of command. Informant was close to them. There were two other divisions on the moor, exercising under the command of other persons: these two other divisions had each about the same number of men as that under George Greenhalgh: that informant, with several others, apprehended George Greenhalgh that night: that informant, on Greenhalgh being apprehended, asked him if he had been in the army, he said, "Yes, a little, he had been in the Bury volunteers." Informant asked him, what they were drilling for, and he replied, only to go to the meeting at Manchester on Monday, so that they might march to the band.

The information of Samuel Fletcher, of Little Lever, collier, taken the same day:

Who saith, that on Saturday last informant was on Cockey Moor, about seven o'clock in the evening, and informant observed many persons on the moor; there might be about two hundred; they were drilling in a military way, in different squads, and obeying the words of command given by different drill-masters; that informant saw them drilling for about two hours; that, about one or two o'clock in the morning, George Greenhalgh, one of the persons now in custody, was in the room at Starling, with several other persons also taken into custody; there were many persons in the room, and in the course of conversation, George Greenhalgh said, that the meaning of their drilling was, that they might come to that perfection, so that they might join their friends and neighbours in Bury and the neighbourhood, and form themselves into a body at Bury, and march in order with music to the Manchester meeting; he also said, that the meeting would have been on Monday next (this day), but it was considered to be illegal, and of course it was postponed until the Monday following, and now a requisition to the Boroughreeve and constables of Manchester was signed by more than two thousand inhabitants. Informant asked him, "what the meaning of such a meeting could be?" George Greenhalgh said, the meaning of such a meeting was, that the country should be properly represented. Informant said, he thought the country was represented; and George Greenhalgh replied, "No, there was Manchester, Bolton, Bury, and many other towns, that were not represented at all, and it was meant that they should be."

No. 18.—Four Examinations, also included therein.

The Examination of George Greenhalgh of Walslow-lane, in Tottington, Weaver, taken the same day;

Saith, I was drilling men on Cockey Moor on Saturday evening last; there was nobody that I know of, besides myself drilling them; there were two squads in the lane. I did not see Edward Rothwell drilling in particular, but I believe he was there, and might be drilling; there were about twenty-five in the squad I was drilling; I have heard they have drilled at Woolford. Charles Hill, I believe, was not on the Moor on Saturday, but he was with me there on Monday evening last. It was wished that all the parish of Bury, who had imbibed the spirit of reform, should muster, to go altogether to Manchester meeting. The reason that set me upon drilling, was the rumours of the country, and from reading the Observer, paper. I exhorted my neighbours on Cockey Moor to a peaceable conduct, and hoped none of them were for revolution and plunder; if they were, I hoped they would be mistaken. The first night we met was on Monday last: there were upwards of one hundred; it was accidental how many men there were in a section. On Monday night Charles Hill and John Holt were drill-masters; I was in the ranks. We have met three times, on Monday Thursday and Saturday last.

The Examination of John Hargreaves, of Tottington, Weaver, taken the same day;

Saith, That I was on Cockey Moor on Saturday evening last, nor was ever at any meeting but one, and that was on Monday last, and then I gave the word of command to a small party. I was in the military service thirty-six years ago; I was at the siege of Gibraltar. On Monday last when I took the command of a small party, there were other parties on the Moor, but I do not know any one that commanded besides me; they were in divisions, and the divisions were at some distance from each other. I have heard that the parties that were drilling were to meet at Bury this day, to go to the meeting at Manchester.

The Examination of Charles Hill, of Woolfold, in Tottington, Weaver, taken the same day;

Saith, I was on Cockey Moor on Monday night last, with other persons; they wanted me to drill them. I had been in the second regiment of Lancashire militia, and was discharged at the first peace with Buonaparté. I did drill the persons on the Moor for a short time on Monday night last; I was coaxed to do it. I cannot tell how many persons there were on the Moor that night; there might be a hundred; they were in different squads: the squads I drilled might consist of twenty or thirty. George Greenhalgh, John Hargreaves, and John Holt, were drilling other squads that evening. I was not there on Thursday nor Saturday. Adam Ridings, a neighbour of mine who has been a soldier, went with me to the Moor. I do not know who it was that coaxed me to drill them; there were several who desired me to step out: it was near dark, and I do not know their names. I did hear that we were to go to Bury this morning, and join others, and proceed to Manchester to the meeting for parliamentary reform. I heard there was a requisition for choosing a representative, or something in that manner. We were all to have gone this morning to Manchester: we were ordered to go, and many would have gone; but on Friday I heard that the meeting was done away with. I did not go to any drilling after I saw the paper from the magistrates, forbidding the meeting at Manchester.

I have been in the militia. I cannot tell who I saw there; I did not see Edward Rothwell, there might be about three hundred in the whole; from two to three hundred; lads and all, about three hundred. I gave no word of command, the fogleman gives no word; I only gave the step. There were more than twenty or thirty, there might be forty in the squad to which I gave the step. I did not give the word, but I gave them the time. I was not there on Thursday, nor on Saturday. I think I saw George Greenhalgh on the Monday evening on the Moor drilling; Charles Hill was there. The man that drilled them I know by sight, but do not recollect his name; he lives in Tottington, or Woolfold, on that side of the country.

Who says, That about one o'clock in the morning of Sunday last, a large assembly of persons, to the number of two hundred or upwards, met at the Guide Post, which is near the parish church of Rochdale; that they had a fife with them who played upon that instrument; that the persons so assembled remained about an hour, and then marched away towards Milkstone, which is in the direction of Tandle Hill in Thornham; there was a person who commanded and ordered the persons to fall in four deep, and so to march, that none of the parties were known to the examinant.

Who says, That yesterday morning I left my residence at High Crompton, between the hours of four and five, and proceeded to a place in Thornham, called Tandle Hill; that, on my arrival at this place, a large concourse of persons had assembled, to the number of two or three thousand; that of this number there were upwards of seven hundred who were drilling in companies, by marching both in slow, quick, and double quick time, and in every other respect went through the usual evolutions of a regiment; that each company might contain from fifty to sixty men, and were commanded by a person in the character of a captain; that when they were ordered to fire, it was immediately followed by a clap of hands throughout the line; that, out of the number who were met, I knew a few persons who reside in Crompton, and its neighbourhood; but, of the men who were acting as drill-serjeants, or officers of companies, I know nothing; yet, from my knowledge of military discipline, I am satisfied they were persons capable of organizing a regiment: that, whilst I was on the ground, I heard persons say, that they (meaning the parties in drill) were fit to contend with any regular troops, only that they wanted arms; and, in the evening of yesterday, a man told me who had been at Tandle Hill, and who said he had been drilled that day, that a similar meeting would take place next Sunday, but that would be the last; that the persons remained on the ground until about seven o'clock, having been there upwards of three hours, and the whole of this time was devoted to drilling.

No. 21.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Mr. Fletcher, a Magistrate of Lancashire, to Lord Sidmouth; dated Bolton-le-Moors, 10th August, 1819.

My Lord;—The increasing spirit of disaffection had, about ten days ago, extended itself, in military training, to a place between Bury and Bolton, about two miles from the former, and four miles from the latter town.—The number of persons in training at said place was reported to have been about three hundred, on Monday the 2nd instant, and likely to be further increased, unless some check could be interposed. Four principal inhabitants of Bury waited on the magistrates, to state their utter inability to resist the torrent of disaffection without military aid; and that persons proper to serve as special constables were so intimidated, that without the presence of some military, they doubted their ability to induce them to come forward to be sworn on the day appointed for that purpose; viz. Friday next.—Under such circumstances, it appeared to a brother magistrate and myself, expedient to apprehend any persons that might meet again at the said place for training purposes; and having taken an information, on oath, from the before-mentioned gentlemen of Bury, and made arrangements with some officers of our Bolton local militia (who were to go previously on a reconnoitring party) we with a troop of the sixth carbineers, commanded by captain Ferguson, went to the spot on Saturday about ten P. M. but found the training just broken up, having, as it is supposed, heard of our intentions.—

Our reconnoitring party having, however, observed the training for the space of an hour, and learnt the names of some of the drill instructors, we caused four persons to be apprehended and conveyed to Bolton, who were yesterday examined, and all confessed their having attended at some of the training meetings, and expressed great contrition for having so done. They were all four admitted to bail, to answer, in fifty pounds each prisoner, and two sureties each in twenty-five pounds, any indictment that may be preferred against them at the next Salford sessions; and in the mean time, not to attend any such training assemblies, but to keep the peace, &c. Copies of the informations, examinations, &c. will be forwarded by Mr. Ravald to Mr. Hobhouse. [See p. 243.]—It appears from what one of the prisoners confessed, that he had imbibed his reforming notions from the Manchester Observer; which, it seems, he was in the habit of reading for the information of his neighbours. From this corrupt source has flowed into this county a considerable portion of that disaffection that prevails. By the apprehension of these men, I trust, will be stopped any further spread of the training system to the westward, within our magisterial division.—From Bury to the south-eastward, the military preparations continue without any diminution. The detail of their proceedings proves the alarming progress in the daring boldness of such multitudes of men arrogating to themselves what belongs to royalty alone, the power of training men in military tactics, for no other purpose that can be reasonably imagined, than hostility to the state. At Leigh (about eight miles south-westward of this town) the advertised meeting will be held to-morrow. The magistrates of Bolton and Warrington divisions are to meet at Hulton Park this day, to consult on the proper measures. The female reformers are to act a conspicuous part, by addressing the assemblage from the hustings, and furnishing a cap of liberty. Hunt and his party are said to be invited. The effect of such meetings so demoralizing and so terrifying to his majesty's loyal subjects (who, if they step forward, as in duty bound, in the defence of the peace and order of society, are immediately put under a sort of interdict, by these reformers, and deprived of their usual share of business, and even exposed to personal dangers) that I am inclined to think, under whatever pretext they may be called, they ought to be suppressed.

RA. FLETCHER.

No. 22.—EXTRACT of a Letter from a person present at the Leigh Meeting; dated Manchester, August 11th, 1819.

Sir;—The requisition for the Leigh meeting was signed by twenty-five persons, specifically for the object of discussing and adopting some constitutional and practical remedy in reforming parliament, and averting the present distress. The meeting was fixed for one o'clock in the afternoon. During the morning a great concourse of the lower order of people were waiting for the arrival of Mr. Hunt, whose presence was anxiously expected, in consequence of which, the meeting was delayed until past two o'clock. Mr. Hunt, and none of his partizans forthcoming, it was deemed necessary to commence the proceedings of the day. Two carts were lashed together in the market-place (a fine open space of ground) when Mr. Battersby (an itinerant preacher), Mr. Thomas Cleworth, and a Mr. Bamber (one of the society of friends) with several others, ascended the platform. As soon as Mr. Bamber was chosen for their chairman, a parade of the female reformers took place, headed by a committee of twelve young women. The members of the female committee were honoured with places in the carts. They were dressed in white, with black sashes, and what was more novel, these women planted a standard with an inscription, "No Corn Laws, Annual Parliaments, and Universal Suffrage;" as well as another standard, surmounted with the cap of liberty on the platform. Both the flag and the cap were presents from the Ladies' Union!! After the business was opened by Mr. Battersby, and seven resolutions, as well as the ladies' address, had been read, Mr. Turner, at the head of the police, made their appearance, and took Mr. Thomas Cleworth into custody upon a warrant of the magistrates. About 300 people were now concentrated; the officers took their man without opposition, and this vigilant step threw dismay in the ranks of the reformers, many of whom I saw dispersing in all directions.

No. 23.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Mr. Norris, to Lord Sidmouth; dated Manchester, August 12th, 1819.

My Lord ;—Herewith I have the honour to transmit your lordship certain depositions, as well respecting the situation in which certain parts of this town have been during the last week, as, respecting the practice of drilling, which has so extensively taken place in this and the surrounding neighbourhood. Many more are in existence and may be added to the number, but I apprehend those which I now send will be sufficient to assure your lordship of this alarming practice. They affect to say, that it is for the purpose of appearing at Manchester in better order, &c. on Monday next; but military discipline was not requisite for this purpose, and a more alarming object is so palpable, that it is impossible not to feel a moral conviction that insurrection and rebellion is their ulterior object.

leave to drill in it three weeks, he should have the honour of their marching out of it; that the persons assembled did not offer to molest deponent, but damned him for being backward in falling in.

My Lord;—The magistrates, the military, and civil authorities of Manchester, have been occupied nearly the whole of this day in concerting the necessary arrangements for the preservation of the peace to-morrow, and for the safety of the town in case riot should ensue. We have been much occupied in taking depositions from various parts of the country; and although the magistrates, as at present advised, do not think of preventing the meeting, yet all the accounts tend to show that the worst possible spirit pervades the country; and that considerable numbers have been drilling to-day at distances of four, six, and ten miles from Manchester; and that considerable numbers are expected to attend the meeting. I hope the peace may be preserved, but under all circumstances it is scarcely possible to expect it; and in short, in this respect we are in a state of painful uncertainty. I have, &c.

No. 34.—LETTER from Mr. Hay, a Magistrate of Lancashire, to lord Sidmouth; dated Manchester, 16th August, 1819; quarter past nine.

My Lord;—Mr. Norris being very much fatigued by the harassing duty of this day, it becomes mine now to inform your lordship of the proceedings which have been had in consequence of the proposal put forward for a meeting. The special committee have been in constant attendance for the last three days, and contented themselves till they saw what the complexion of the meeting might be, or what circumstances might arise, with coming to this determination only, which they adopted in concurrence with some of the most intelligent gentlemen of the town, not to stop the numerous columns which were from various roads expected to pour in, but to allow them to reach the place of their destination.—The assistance of the military was of course required, and arrangements in consequence made with them, of such description as might be applicable to various circumstances.—About eleven o'clock the magistrates, who were very numerous, repaired to a house, whence they might see the whole of the proceedings of the meeting. A body of special constables took their ground, about two hundred in number, close to the hustings; from them there was a line of communication to the house where we were. Mr. Trafford Trafford was so good as to take the situation of attending colonel L'Estrange, the commanding officer.—From eleven till one o'clock, the various columns arrived, attended by flags, each by two or three flags; and there were four, if not more, caps of liberty. The ensigns were of the same description as those displayed on similar occasions, with this addition, that one had a bloody pike represented on it; another, "Equal Representation or Death." There was no appearance of arms or pikes, but great plenty of sticks and staves; and every column marched in regular files of three or four deep, attended with conductors, music, &c. The most powerful accession was in the last instance, when Hunt and his party came in. But, long before this, the magistrates had felt a decided conviction that the whole bore the appearance of insurrection; that the array was such as to terrify all the king's subjects, and was such as no legitimate purpose could justify. In addition to their own sense of the meeting, they had very numerous depositions from the inhabitants, as to their fears for the public safety; and at length a man deposed as to the parties who were approaching, attended by the heaviest column. On a barouche-box was a woman in white, who, I believe was a Mrs. Gant, from Stockport, and who it is believed, had a cap of liberty. In the barouche were Hunt, Johnson, Knight, and Moorhouse, of Stockport: as soon as these four parties were ascertained, a warrant issued to apprehend them. The troops were mustered, and Nadin, preceding the Manchester Yeomanry Cavalry, executed it. While the cavalry was forming, a most marked defiance of them was acted by the reforming part of the mob; however, they so far executed their purpose, as to apprehend Hunt and Johnson on the hustings: Knight and Moorhouse in the moment escaped. They also took on the hustings, Saxton, and Sykes, and who stated to this deponent that it was very probable they had been so employed; that very shortly this deponent heard the word march, and immediately afterwards several companies of unarmed men, and amounting, in the whole, from two to four hundred, marched along the turnpike road, on which the coach then was, towards Middleton, and this deponent's impression then was, and now is, that the men so marching had come some way on the said turnpike road, and had been drilling; and that the men standing on the bank were collected from curiosity, and an expectation, or knowledge, that the said men would march that way; that this deponent thinks the said men who so marched were divided into six companies or divisions; that each company or division marched four a-breast, except at the heads of companies, where there was a fifth person with a small stick or cane in his hand, who appeared to be the leader or captain, and gave orders; that the men marched with great exactness and precision, and appeared to this deponent, who was some years a member of a volunteer corps, to have been regularly drilled, and acquired a good state of discipline; that the men in one company having got out of step in a trifling degree, one of the leaders of it fell out of the rank, and cried out left, right, and restored the company immediately into a good state of marching; that whilst the men were so marching past the coach, one of the leaders looking into the coach, from which they were not distant more than two yards, and apparently addressing the passengers in the coach, used this expression, "We will damn'd soon make these borough-mongering vagrants tremble;" that this expression was used when about half the men had marched past the coach, and when this deponent had recovered from the surprise into which the march of the men past the coach had thrown this deponent, and which surprise at the outset had prevented this deponent from counting the numbers of the men who so marched; that the last company came past the coach in double quick time, and were ordered by their leader to mark time, in consequence of the quickness of their march getting them too near the company before them; that shortly before the said last company so came past the coach in double quick time, this deponent heard a bugle not far off, and which he has no doubt belonged to the party, though this deponent did not see it; that in the course of the same forenoon this deponent returned from Rochdale by the mail, which stopped at the said place called the Slattocks, and this deponent inquired from the persons about, who the people were he had seen in the morning; that the said people from whom he inquired were unwilling to say any thing; but at length reluctantly said they supposed they were a part of the men who had been drilling near the Tandle hills, and that they were the Oldham division.

Jonathan Andrew, of Manchester, maketh oath, and saith, That on Thursday evening the 12th instant, betwixt the hours of eight and nine o'clock, he saw exercising on the new road to Rochdale, from 20 to 25 men armed with staves, from 4 to 5 feet long, and apparently about 3 to 3½ inches round, similar to a brush stail, but chiefly of green wood. He heard the words of command given (by a person separated from the rest) march, halt, &c.

No. 30.—LETTER from the Earl of Derby to Lord Sidmouth; dated Knowsley, August 15, 1819.

My Lord;—I conceive it to be my duty to inform your lordship, that in consequence of a representation made to me by the select committee of magistrates assembled at Manchester (and perfectly agreeing with them in the expediency of the measure), I issued a precept for a special meeting of magistrates, to consider of the propriety of a general or partial execution of the Watch and Ward act, and I have now the honour to inclose to your lordship a letter from the clerk of the peace, by which you will perceive how far the same has been carried into execution. I trust this, and the other measures adopted by the magistracy, will put a stop to the danger to be apprehended from the evil designs of such as wish to disturb the peace of the country; but I am sorry to add, there is still too much cause to believe, that in some parts of this county, there are assemblies of men, who meet in considerable numbers, with the object of training and exercising themselves for illegal and seditious purposes. Of all this, however, your lordship is I am sure already informed with more accuracy, and in greater detail, than I am able to give you. It is with great regret that I am obliged to add, that the raising the armed association (notwithstanding the zealous endeavours of the boroughreeve and committee at Manchester, who made the offer to government) proceeds so slow, that I have not yet been able to obtain a list of gentlemen to be submitted to the prince regent as officers for the same. I am, however, informed by the boroughreeve, that the list of field officers and captains for one battalion has been completed, but they consider it premature to send it to me, as the number of men already enrolled is far below the number which should constitute one battalion. I think it right to apprise your lordship of this circumstance, but without the most distant idea of imputing blame, or want of zeal, to any person concerned in the transaction. The arms, &c. for nearly the whole corps have been forwarded to my order from Chester Castle some time since, and, with the concurrence of major general Byng, I have directed them to be lodged at the cavalry

No. 32.—LETTER from Mr. Norris to Lord Sidmouth; dated Manchester, August 15th, 1819. 11 o'clock, P. M.

My Lord;—The magistrates, the military, and civil authorities of Manchester, have been occupied nearly the whole of this day in concerting the necessary arrangements for the preservation of the peace to-morrow, and for the safety of the town in case riot should ensue. We have been much occupied in taking depositions from various parts of the country; and although the magistrates, as at present advised, do not think of preventing the meeting, yet all the accounts tend to show that the worst possible spirit pervades the country; and that considerable numbers have been drilling to-day at distances of four, six, and ten miles from Manchester; and that considerable numbers are expected to attend the meeting. I hope the peace may be preserved, but under all circumstances it is scarcely possible to expect it; and in short, in this respect we are in a state of painful uncertainty. I have, &c.

J. NORRIS.

No. 33.—PRINTED Hand-bill issued by the Boroughreeves and Constables of Manchester.

The boroughreeves and constables of Manchester and Salford most earnestly recommend the peaceable and well-disposed inhabitants of those towns, as much as possible, to remain in their own houses during the whole of this day. Monday, August 16th instant; and to keep their children and servants within doors.—Edward Clayton, boroughreeve of Manchester; John Moore, jun.; Jonathan Andrew, constables; John Greenwood, boroughreeve of Salford; James Cooke, Josiah Collier, constables.

No. 34.—LETTER from Mr. Hay, a Magistrate of Lancashire, to lord Sidmouth; dated Manchester, 16th August, 1819; quarter past nine.

My Lord;—Mr. Norris being very much fatigued by the harassing duty of this day, it becomes mine now to inform your lordship of the proceedings which have been had in consequence of the proposal put forward for a meeting. The special committee have been in constant attendance for the last three days, and contented themselves till they saw what the complexion of the meeting might be, or what circumstances might arise, with coming to this determination only, which they adopted in concurrence with some of the most intelligent gentlemen of the town, not to stop the numerous columns which were from various roads expected to pour in, but to allow them to reach the place of their destination.—The assistance of the military was of course required, and arrangements in consequence made with them, of such description as might be applicable to various circumstances.—About eleven o'clock the magistrates, who were very numerous, repaired to a house, whence they might see the whole of the proceedings of the meeting. A body of special constables took their ground, about two hundred in number, close to the hustings; from them there was a line of communication to the house where we were. Mr. Trafford Trafford was so good as to take the situation of attending colonel L'Estrange, the commanding officer.—From eleven till one o'clock, the various columns arrived, attended by flags, each by two or three flags; and there were four, if not more, caps of liberty. The ensigns were of the same description as those displayed on similar occasions, with this addition, that one had a bloody pike represented on it; another, "Equal Representation or Death." There was no appearance of arms or pikes, but great plenty of sticks and staves; and every column marched in regular files of three or four deep, attended with conductors, music, &c. The most powerful accession was in the last instance, when Hunt and his party came in. But, long before this, the magistrates had felt a decided conviction that the whole bore the appearance of insurrection; that the array was such as to terrify all the king's subjects, and was such as no legitimate purpose could justify. In addition to their own sense of the meeting, they had very numerous depositions from the inhabitants, as to their fears for the public safety; and at length a man deposed as to the parties who were approaching, attended by the heaviest column. On a barouche-box was a woman in white, who, I believe was a Mrs. Gant, from Stockport, and who it is believed, had a cap of liberty. In the barouche were Hunt, Johnson, Knight, and Moorhouse, of Stockport: as soon as these four parties were ascertained, a warrant issued to apprehend them. The troops were mustered, and Nadin, preceding the Manchester Yeomanry Cavalry, executed it. While the cavalry was forming, a most marked defiance of them was acted by the reforming part of the mob; however, they so far executed their purpose, as to apprehend Hunt and Johnson on the hustings: Knight and Moorhouse in the moment escaped. They also took on the hustings, Saxton, and Sykes, who is the writer to the Manchester Observer, and which Saxton had before been addressing the mob. The parties thus apprehended, were brought to the house where the magistrates were. In the mean time the Riot act was read, and the mob was completely dispersed, but not without very serious and lamentable effects. Hunt, &c. were brought down to the New Bailey; two magistrates and myself, having promised them protection, preceded them; we were attended by special constables and some cavalry. The parties were lodged in the New Bailey; and since that have been added to them Knight and Moorhouse. On inquiry, it appeared that many had suffered from various instances; one of the Manchester yeomanry, Mr. Holme, was, after the parties were taken, struck by a brick-bat; he lost his power over his horse, and is supposed to have fractured his skull by a fall from his horse. I am afraid that he is since dead; if not, there are no hopes of his recovery. A special constable of the name of Ashworth has been killed—cause unknown; and four women appear to have lost their lives by being pressed by the crowd; these, I believe, are the fatal effects of the meeting. A variety of instances of sabre wounds occurred, but I hope none mortal; several pistols were fired by the mob, but as to their effect, save in one instance deposed to before colonel Fletcher, we have no account. We cannot but deeply regret all this serious attendant on this transaction; but we have the satisfaction of witnessing the very grateful and cheering countenances of the whole town; in fact, they consider themselves as saved by our exertions. All the shops were shut, and, for the most part, continued so all the evening. The capture of Hunt took place before two o'clock, and I forgot to mention, that all their colours, drums, &c. were taken or destroyed: since that I have been to the Infirmary, and found myself justified in making the report I have; but Mr. Norris now tells me, that one or two more than I have mentioned, may have lost their lives. The parties apprehended, will have their cases proceeded on to-morrow; but it appears that there may arise difficulties as to the nature of some of their crimes, on which it may be necessary to consult government. The whole committee of magistrates will assemble to-morrow as usual. During the afternoon, and part of the evening, parts of the town have been in a very disturbed state, and numerous applications made for military. These have been supplied, but in some cases have, in the Irish part of the town, been obliged to fire, I trust without any bad effect as to life, in any instance. At present everything seems quiet; the reports agree with that, and I hope that we shall have a quiet night. I have omitted to mention, that the active part of the meeting may be said to have come in wholly from the country; and that it did not consist of less than 20,000 men, &c. The flag on which was "Equal Representation or Death," was a black one; and in addition, on the same side, had "No boroughmongering—Unite, and be Free;" at the bottom, "Saddleworth, Lees, and Morley Union;" on the reverse, "No Corn Laws;—Taxation, without Representation, is unjust and tyrannical." On the Middleton flag was, "Let us die like men, and not be sold like slaves;" reverse, "Liberty is the birthright of man."—I close my letter at a quarter before eleven; every thing remains quiet—many of the troops have returned to the barracks, with the consent of the magistrates. I have to apologize to your lordship for the haste in which this is written, but I trust that the haste will naturally be accounted for. I have the honour to be, &c.

No. 35.—LETTER from Major-General Sir John Byng to Lord Sidmouth, dated, Head Quarters, Pontefract, August 17th, 1819, nine, A. M.

My Lord; I have the honour to forward the accompanying copy of an official report which I have just received from lieutenant colonel L'Estrange, in command of the troops in Manchester and its immediate neighbourhood, which I consider of sufficient consequence to send by express, as it will be one day sooner before your lordship.—I most sincerely regret that the employment of military in aid of the civil power should have been necessary; but I trust it will appear to your lordship, that the utmost forbearance, consistent with their duty, has been evinced by lieutenant colonel L'Estrange, with the troops under his command: and I hope it will meet your approval, his having employed the corps of Cheshire and Manchester yeomanry cavalry, who, at the request of the magistrates had assembled with the greatest alacrity in full numbers, and had placed themselves at the lieutenant colonel's disposal.—By the latest account, I understand the town of Manchester has become more quiet. I shall await here a further report, and shall hold in readiness to move, at the shortest notice, all the disposable force under my orders. I have, &c.

JOHN BYNG, Major General.

No. 36.—REPORT from Lieutenant Colonel L'Estrange, inclosed in the foregoing. Dated Manchester, August 16, 1819, eight o'clock, P. M.

Sir,—The magistrates assembled here in consequence of the disturbed state of the district, directed me to have the troops in readiness to assist the civil power in case of necessity, at the time of the meeting proposed for this day. In concurrence with their wishes, and after consultation with them, the military were prepared and arrangements made, such as then seemed calculated to meet any occasion, in which the aid of the troops might be required to assist the civil power. The magistrates were in attendance near St. Peter's Church; and Mr. Trafford, a justice of the peace for the counties of Chester and Lancaster, was appointed to remain with the cavalry. Early in the afternoon, the civil power finding it necessary that the troops should act in aid of them, it was deemed expedient that the cavalry should advance; and a warrant was executed, preceded by the civil authority, under which two persons Hunt and Johnson, named therein, were arrested; as were also two other persons named Saxton and Sykes, who were active, as I am told, on the hustings. This service was performed with the assistance of the cavalry. The infantry was in readiness, but I determined not to bring them in contact with the people, unless compelled to do so by urgent necessity; not a shot therefore has been fired by any of the military, though several have been fired by the populace against the troops. I have, however, great regret in stating, that some of the unfortunate people who attended this meeting have suffered from sabre wounds, and many from the pressure of the crowd. One of the Manchester yeomanry, if not dead, lies without hope of recovery; it is understood he was struck with a stone. One of the special constables has been killed. The Manchester yeomanry under major Trafford, and the Cheshire yeomanry under lieutenant colonel Townsend, who had come on a very short notice from the county magistrates (many of them from a great distance), were most active and efficient in discharge of their duty.—The committee, now sitting, consider it necessary to keep all the troops ready, though every means will be adopted to prevent the necessity of their acting. I have, &c.

No. 37.—EXTRACT of a letter from Mr. Norris to Lord Sidmouth; dated Manchester, August 17, 1819.

My Lord;—Mr. Hay and Mr. Hardman having left town this evening, on a mission to your lordship and to government, it is unnecessary for me to give you any information up to the period when they left, as they are fully informed. Since their departure the town has continued to assume a gloomy aspect as the night has approached, and at this hour (a quarter from ten), all the civil and military authorities are in action throughout the town. Great numbers assembled this evening, from 8 to 9, about the New Cross, but did not do any act of violence though evidently of the description disposed to do so. Soldiers are placed there, and bodies of special constables, with orders in the first instance for the constables to act, and afterwards, in case of need, the military to disperse the mob. The Riot act was not read this evening when I first went up (about six o'clock) though some stones had before been thrown at one or two houses, and a few at the military; yet I found matters peaceable and quiet, and the offending parties straggling about, and at considerable distances, and I hoped they would disperse. They did not, however, disperse; but the numbers considerably increased at the distances, and I found it necessary to communicate instantly with colonel l'Estrange, &c. The military have in consequence been strengthened in that quarter, and at present every thing, I believe, remains quiet, although it can alone be attributed to the full exertion or appearance of the military strength. I am, &c.

No. 38.—EXAMINATION of James Murrey of No. 2, Withy Grove Manchester, confectioner, who, on his oath, saith,

That on Sunday last, the 15th instant, he was at White Moss, near Middleton, about five miles from Manchester, between three and four o'clock in the morning and saw there assembled between 14 and 1500 men, the greatest number of whom were formed in two bodies, in the form of solid squares; the remainder were in small parties of between twenty and thirty each; there were about thirty such parties, each under the direction of a person acting as a drill serjeant, and and were going through military movements; that examinant went amongst them and immediately one of the drill serjeants asked him to fall in. He said, he thought he should soon, or gave some such answer; he then began to move away; upon which, some persons who were drilling, cried out "spies." This examinant, and William Shawcross, and Thomas Rymer and his son (all of whom had accompanied this examinant from Manchester) continued to retire; the body of men then cried out, "mill them," "murder them" Near one hundred men then pursued this examinant and his companions; they overtook them near a lane end, at the edge of the Moss, and began to pelt them with clods of earth—they at last came up to the examinant and his companions, and beat them very severely—Examinant begged they would not murder him; but the general cry was, "damn him kill him---murder him."—Examinant said, "you treat me very differently to what nations treat each other's prisoners when they are at war. Suppose that I am an enemy, you ought to treat me as a prisoner:" they said, "How will you treat us if you take us prisoners when we come to Manchester?"—Examinant knew at the time that a meeting was appointed for the next day (Monday) at Manchester.—The men kept beating examinant all the time; at last, they debated among themselves whether they would kill examinant or forgive him, and they determined to forgive him, provided he would go down upon his knees and beg pardon to them, and swear never to be a king's man again, or to mention the name of a king. Examinant complied to save his life, they standing over him with sticks, as he apprehended to murder him, provided he had objected. They afterwards went away. Examinant was not previously acquainted with any of the persons assembled that he saw, but is certain that he should know again two of those who beat him. The greatest part of the number assembled had stout sticks, from three to four feet long. In consequence of the ill treatment received by examinant, as above, he was confined to his bed for three days. JAMES MURREY.

No. 39.—LETTER from Sir J. T. Stanley to Lord Sidmouth; dated Grand Jury Room, Chester Castle, Sept. 3, 1819.

My Lord,—I have been directed by the grand jury of the county of Chester, as their foreman, to forward the inclosed to your lordship as a private communication; and I have taken the liberty of inclosing, at the same time a copy of resolutions entered into by the grand jury, expressive of their determination to support the government, and enforce the laws, for the preservation of the peace of the county. I have &c.

JOHN THOMAS STANLEY.

No. 40.—COMMUNICATION of the Grand Jury of Cheshire, inclosed therein.

(Private.) Chester, September 3, 1819.

We, the grand jury of the county palatine of Chester, assembled at the assizes holden for the said county, on the first day of September 1819, feel it our bounden duty to represent to your lordship, that from the information we have just received, we have strong reason to consider, that in the Stockport division of the hundred of Macclesfield in this county, and in certain parts of the Prestbury division of the said hundred, the lives and property of his majesty's loyal subjects are in great peril; and that in an adjoining county, by the active measures of terror and intimidation employed, the danger has, within the last fourteen days, assumed a more formidable character; and we beg leave to add, that we understand his majesty's justices of the peace labour under great difficulty from want of power to disperse meetings for drilling, and for acquiring military discipline.

JOHN THOMAS STANLEY, Foreman.

No. 41.—RESOLUTIONS also inclosed.

We, the grand jury of the county palatine of Chester, at the assizes holden at Chester on the first day of September 1819, feel it incumbent at this time to declare our indignation at the machinations of artful and itinerant demagogues, who disseminate papers of the most dangerous and seditious tendency; and at public meetings, with freedom in their mouths and fraud and plunder in their hearts, employ the most inflammatory language; insidiously inculcate, under the specious veil of reform, hatred and contempt of our constitution, and instigate the ignorant and unwary even to exert physical force (that is, violence and open arms) for the enforcement of their visionary claims; at once useless to themselves, destructive of the rights and property of their fellow subjects, and involving the country in one general ruin. Nor can we refrain from declaring our disgust and horror at the odious and blasphemous publications poured forth throughout the country, in which the Holy Scriptures are held up to derision, reviled and scoffed at, and audaciously denounced to the people as false, with the malignant intention of eradicating from their minds all moral checks, and all the hopes and comforts to be derived from religion. But with the most serious and peculiar anxiety and detestation, we contemplate the unremitting exertions to poison the minds of the rising generation with the same horrid and detestable doctrines.—We, therefore, strongly impressed with the excellence of our constitution, protecting all ranks and degrees of society, are firmly resolved, by every means in our power, to enforce the due execution of the laws against the seditious and disaffected; and against all, who either by acts or otherwise, endanger the public peace and safety of the realm.

No. 42.—LETTER from Lord Stanley to Lord Sidmouth; dated Knowsley, September 7th, 1819.

My Lord; I have been directed by the grand jury assembled at the present assizes for this county, to sign, as their foreman, their statement of the unhappily disturbed situation in which (upon examination, which they have thought it their duty to make) they have found the county, or rather a large district of it, to be placed. In compliance therefore with their directions, I have now the honour to lay before your lordship the accompanying statement, a copy of which I have also been directed to lay before the lord-lieutenant of the county, and I remain, &c.

STANLEY.

No. 43.—STATEMENT inclosed therein.

The grand jury of the county of Lancaster have thought it their duty to inquire into the present state of the disturbed districts of that county, and they have examined persons who appeared to them the most competent to give accurate information on the subject.—From the result of that inquiry it appears, that the most inflammatory publications have for some time been industriously circulated at a price which puts them very generally into the hands of the poorest classes of society. The training and military drilling of large bodies of men, under regular leaders, have for some time been carried on to a great extent, and the times chosen for the purpose are principally during the night, or at such hours as seem best calculated to elude public observation. Marching, and other military movements, are practised with great precision, and the words of command are promptly and implicitly obeyed. It has not come to the knowledge of the grand jury, that arms have been used on these occasions, and, though there is no doubt that weapons of offence have been manufactured, yet to what amount does not appear.—One of the most powerful engines to which the disaffected have resorted, is a system of intimidation, which prevails to a most serious and alarming degree. Not only have threats to persons and property been made use of, and put into execution, but even combinations have been formed to discountenance and to ruin those publicans and shopkeepers who have come forward in support of the civil power. To such an extent does this prevail, that individuals who are well-disposed, are deterred from declaring the sentiments which they really entertain, or from giving information which may lead to the detection of offenders.—Whatever may be the real object of those who have obtained an influence over the minds of the misguided, there is reason to believe, from the declarations which have been openly and avowedly made, that the object of the lower classes of these people in general, is no other than to reverse the orders of society which have so long been established, and to wrest by force from the present possessors, and to divide among themselves, the landed property of the country.—The magistrates who act in the disturbed districts, and who are few in number, and harassed by continued and unremitting attention to their duties, state themselves to be unable to preserve the public peace, under any circumstances of peculiar agitation.—Resort has recently been had to the Watch and Ward act, but in many parts of the above-mentioned districts the measure is, for obvious reasons, incapable of being carried into effect, and in others has proved wholly inefficacious. Indeed, in one populous district, no warrant for ordinary offences, or other legal process, can be executed: the payment of taxes has ceased; and the landlords are threatened with the discontinuance of their rents.—The grand jury think it their duty to submit these facts and observations to the lord-lieutenant of the county, and to his majesty's principal secretary of state for the home department, and at the same time to express their firm determination to support the government of the country, and to maintain unimpaired the constitution as at present established in church and state.—Signed by direction of the grand jury, STANLEY, Foreman.

Grand Jury Room, Lancaster, Sept. 6, 1819.

No. 44.—LETTER from the Constables of Manchester to Lord Sidmouth; dated Manchester Police-office, September 16, 1819.

My Lord;—We have avoided troubling your lordship with frequent communications, knowing that our highly esteemed friend Mr. Norris was in constant correspondence with the home department. We deem it however a duty to state some of the difficulties with which we have to contend, and which, as they are rapidly increasing, will press heavily on the gentlemen who are shortly to succeed us in office. Before Mr. Hunt made his appearance here, his followers had given us much trouble; they have now acquired so powerful an ascendancy in the neighbourhood, that he is able at any time to agitate this town most seriously; and by a very short notice to move an overwhelming population in any direction, and for almost any purpose. Your lordship has, we believe, already been made acquainted with the decease of Campbell, one of our supernumeraries, who was literally stoned to death, publicly, in the forenoon of the 17th ult. merely because he was connected with this office. Another special constable now lies in the infirmary dangerously wounded under similar circumstances. More than a week before the meeting of the 16th ult. two of our beables, who were protecting a man whilst posting the Prince Regent's Proclamation, were shamefully abused, as well as the man, and held prisoners, at the New Cross, by a mob of more than 500 persons. The boroughreeve and ourselves, with our deputy and four assistants, having proceeded to the spot, were also violently attacked and beaten away with stones, previously taken up from the pavement for the purpose. For some time previously to the 16th ult. well dressed persons were sure to be insulted if they showed themselves in the neighbourhood of New Cross, Newton-lane, Ancoats, &c. &c.; and were it not for the certainty that the military could soon be at hand, no decent person would now venture near those places.—Since Mr. Hunt's arrival here, the respectable householders have been kept in almost constant alarm, and the noise and uproar which uniformly attends his movements have produced the most dangerous consequences to many families. Amongst persons unconnected with business, a general disposition prevails to leave the neighbourhood; and of those who are able to retire from trade, a considerable proportion seems determined to do so. The difficulty in collecting rents from those of the lower orders who are able to pay, increases daily, and serious depression in the value of property is consequently taking place. We have also much reason to fear, that numbers, whom we had looked upon as neutral with respect to Mr. Hunt, are becoming partizans; and we ought not to disguise the fact, that a degree of intimidation very generally prevails, which deprives us of the usually efficient support and cordial assistance of some of our principal inhabitants. The special constables, as a body, were all that we could wish, and have given us abundant proof of their loyalty and spirit; but of those who are shopkeepers or publicans, many have so much lost their custom, that they must either cease acting, or be ruined. The sacrifice of wealth and comforts which the magistrates have willingly made, can only be duly appreciated by ourselves; and we are bound to declare our belief, that nothing but the purest patriotism could have influenced or supported them.—An anxious desire to serve the public faithfully, has completely exhausted our worthy colleague, the boroughreeve, and his life is still in danger; and, indeed, we are ourselves so much worn out, that we should shortly become unequal to our duty, were it not for the prospect of our year being soon ended. If we are asked, what has occasioned this state of society here? we must reply, the licentiousness of the press chiefly, aided by the inflammatory speeches of itinerant demagogues, and the establishment of schools for instructing adults, as well as children, to revile and despise the civil and religious institutions of the country. Whatever constitutional health or strength our successors in office may fortunately possess, or however zealous they may be in the discharge of their duty, we are firmly persuaded, my lord, things cannot long go on in this way, and we hope this conviction will be our apology for writing so much at length on this occasion. We have the honour to be, &c.

No. 45.—LETTER from Mr. Jones, Postmaster of Macclesfield to Lord Sidmouth; dated Macclesfield, Cheshire, August 18, 1819.

My Lord;—I beg leave to acquaint your lordship, that a mob of the reformers assembled last night about half past eight o'clock P. M. in the market-place in this town: the mayor read the Riot act about half past eight P. M.; about nine the mob proceeded to a very outrageous attack on the shop and printing-shop of Mr. Jonathan Wilson, printer of the Macclesfield Courier, and demolished the door and windows; they also attacked the house of Mr. Thomas Grimsditch, solicitor, an officer in the Cheshire yeomanry cavalry in the Macclesfield troop; they broke all his front windows; they attacked my house and demolished my front windows, &c. They took advantage of the absence of our cavalry on duty at Manchester, and part of the 31st regiment of foot, which were here till last night. Twelve at night an express came from Manchester ordering them to Stockport, so that we were left quite defenceless, we turned out and restored peace at last; and this morning, at five A. M. the party of the 31st regiment arrived here from Stockport, and at ten A. M. our troops of cavalry arrived from Manchester. The mayor, accompanied by the rest of the magistrates of this borough read the Riot act, and declared the town in a state of rebellion, and delivered it up to the charge of the military, from the circumstance of their having last night attacked the Post-office: and I humbly submit, that for the better and future security of the town, and persons and property, a troop of horse stationed here for a while would remove and disperse all danger. The whole most humbly submitted by your lordship's, &c.

No. 46.—LETTER from the Lord Provost of Glasgow to Lord Sidmouth; dated Glasgow, 22nd August, 1819.

My Lord;—It affords me great satisfaction and pleasure that I have it in my power to inform your lordship, that the meeting of yesterday ended without any breach of the peace, or even disturbance. We had every preparation made by having the special constabulary, to the number of about four hundred, assembled, as well as all the police and other civil officers, and also the military drawn up in the barrack-yard to act in case the civil power should prove inefficient. Although all this was done without publicity or bustle, still it was not unknown to the crowd; indeed in the speeches I understood that peace and good order were strongly inculcated by the argument of the preparations made to oppose contrary conduct. To the presence of the military do we therefore owe our present state. The object of the meeting on Thursday being of a nature more likely to draw an assemblage of the poorer classes than the common one of parliamentary reform, and greater pains having been taken to bring them from every quarter, we contemplate that it will be much more numerously attended. God grant that it may end as peaceably! My lord, I have &c.

No. 47.—LETTER from Earl Fitzwilliam to Lord Sidmouth, dated Leamington, 26th August, 1819.

My Lord;—I have this morning received a letter dated 20th inst from Mr. Haigh, Mr. Haigh Allen, and Mr. Horsfall, three magistrates acting at Huddersfield and in its neighbourhood a copy of which I send for your lordship's information. No doubt it would have been more satisfactory had no meeting whatever taken place; but it is a subject of satisfaction that, taking place, it passed off peaceably, and that the assembled dispersed quietly, without the interference of any constituted authority, and no less so, that though a second meeting was announced, for the following evening, it did not take place. I trust however, that your lordship will approve the active vigilance of these magistrates and the precautionary measures which they have adopted, by swearing in a number of special constables, and by calling out the Huddersfield troop of yeomanry on permanent duty, and I am confident your lordship may rely on their discretion, that the constituted authorities will not be unnecessarily committed in doubtful cases, but their powers used only when manifest necessity shall justify their exercise. I have the honour to be, &c.

No. 48.—LETTER from Three Magistrates inclosed therein, dated Huddersfield, August 20th, 1819.

My Lord;—We think it our duty to inform your lordship, that last evening, about seven o'clock, a large multitude of people were suddenly assembled within half a mile of the town, to the number (as near as we can ascertain) of three thousand. A person from Manchester related to them what had taken place there, and concluded by telling them, that now was the time to be revenged. Another person then said, that all who were willing to support the cause of radical reform by force, by physical force, should signify the same in the usual way; which was answered by a tremendous shout from the multitude; he then informed them that a meeting would be held the following night at seven o'clock at Fixby Park (about a mile and a half from Huddersfield). With arms?—was asked by the multitude. He said, we will not say with arms; but all persons are requested to provide themselves with such things as may in any way whatever be useful to them. We find that there have been several evening meetings suddenly called in different parts of the neighbourhood, since Tuesday, and we have every reason to believe that the meeting to-night is to be a concentrated meeting, as we are informed that a meeting in the neighbourhood of Halifax has been adjourned to meet at Fixby to-night. In consequence of these appearances we have thought it our duty to order our troop of yeomanry cavalry to assemble this evening, upon permanent duty for three days; we have also sworn in a number of special constables, which we trust will meet with your lordship's approbation. We have the honour to be, &c.

No. 49.—LETTER from Earl Fitzwilliam to Lord Sidmouth; dated Leamington, 28th August, 1819.

My Lord;—I have the honour to transmit to your lordship a copy of a letter, dated the 25th instant, which I received this morning from the mayor of Leeds; likewise a copy of a requisition for convening a public meeting on the 30th inst. signed by certain householders of Wakefield, and left at the office of the clerk of the peace; which also I received this morning.—I shall return immediately to Wentworth. No. 50.—LETTER from the Mayor of Leeds inclosed; therein dated Leeds, August 25th, 1819.

My Lord;—I duly received your lordship's letter of the 19th, announcing your intention, if no unpleasant accounts were received from Manchester to set out the following day for Leamington. I deem it necessary to acquaint your lordship, that I think I perceive a considerable change working among our reformers. On Thursday last, in the evening, a body of people to the amount of several thousands, met upon Hunslet Moor, to discuss the events at Manchester, simply upon a notice given by posting up a few written papers in two or three conspicuous situations in the town. Last evening another meeting took place by the appointment of the former; when, notwithstanding a heavy fall of rain, it is calculated full 3,000 persons were present; with the additional excitements of drums and bands of music, to which they marched from the adjoining townships. They dispersed quietly. I fear these circumstances, added to the frequent meeting, announce a growing confidence in themselves, and a determination on the part of their leaders to push matters to an extremity. They hold more violent language in their speeches, and dwell in exaggerated terms on the proceedings at Manchester; and Sherwin's Register of the 20th inst, of which I have found it difficult to obtain a copy, the whole being sold off, is a most diabolical production: he throws off all restraint, calls on the people to arm, states the impossibility of avoiding a revolution, or of subduing the people; and treats the idea of accommodation as ridiculous; surely it is time to attack the authors of such dangerous productions. I write this evening, desiring sir John Byng to order another troop of dragoons to Leeds. We have only one of thirty-two horses, which I think is too small a force to meet present appearances with. I have the honour to be, &c.

No. 51.—REQUISITION also inclosed.

We, the undersigned inhabitant householders of the town of Wakefield, do convene a public meeting to be held on Monday, 30th August, 1819, to take into consideration our unparalleled distress (which we consider to have arisen from enormous taxation without representation) and the most effectual and constitutional methods for the removal and prevention of the same occurring in future;

Richard Brown, plumber and glazier, Westgate; Joseph Lowe, cloth worker, Westgate; Samuel Moore, cloth worker, Westgate; John Robinson, cordwainer, Kirkgate; Joseph Lockwood, cordwainer, Nelson-street; George Musgrave, waterman, Kirkgate. Joseph Inson waterman Kirkgate; Benjamin Howell, jun. waterman, Kirkgate. The Chair to be taken precisely at four o'clock in the afternoon. Wakefield, August 23rd, 1819.

No. 52.—LETTER from Earl Fitzwilliam to Lord Sidmouth; Wentworth, August, 21st, 1819.

My Lord;—I have the honour of transmitting, for your lordship's consideration, copies of three letters, all of which I have received this morning; 1st from Colonel Horton, a magistrate of the West Riding, resident near Halifax, dated the 27th instant; 2nd, from the mayor of Leeds, dated the 27th instant; 3rd, from Mr. Poljamba, deputy clerk of the peace, dated Monday evening 9 o'clock. I have, &c. WENTWORTH FITZWILLIAM.

No. 53.—LETTER from Colonel Horton inclosed therein; Halifax, August 27th, 1819.

My Lord; Attending a general meeting of magistrates yesterday, at Wakefield, to consider the additions to the House of Correction, I thought it necessary to give my opinion of the state of this part of the Riding; and I beg to communicate the same to your lordship. I have great reason to believe, that the lower orders in this part of the country are very much irritated by the laudable conduct of the civil and military authorities at Manchester, and warmly espouse the cause of the Revolutionists; for such they are. Speaking entirely of the actual labouring class, I have not a doubt that a very great majority have the above feeling, and would act upon it if they dared, at this moment. Various assemblages have been held in this parish and Huddersfield, since the occurrences at Manchester. The object being (as there is great reason to believe) to determine as to the propriety of marching to Manchester to avenge themselves which has not been thought prudent at present. These assemblies were called privately, and it is very difficult to obtain correct information: but though I do not apprehend any immediate danger, I am well convinced there is reason to fear that some violent attempt will be made by the disaffected, if very great precautionary measures are not adopted. It is quite certain the object is absolute revolution; the attempt at which will cause much mischief. This parish has always been much quieter than Huddersfield; but the disposition lately evinced, has induced Colonel Deardon and myself to swear in about three hundred special constables, and to call a meeting of the principal inhabitants. I intend to attempt to raise a troop of yeomanry cavalry here, and I have hopes of offering one to your lordship. In the mean time I have stated to Lord Sidmouth, that it is necessary to society that one troop of regulars should be placed here. I wish to add, that it was the opinion of all the magistrates at Wakefield, amongst whom were Sir Francis Wood, Mr. Wortley, and Mr. Lowe (with whom I coincide), that it is not by any means necessary your lordship should hasten your return from Leamington at this moment. I have, &c.

No. 54.—LETTER from the Mayor of Leeds, also inclosed; dated Leeds, 27th August, 1819.

My Lord;—I beg your lordship's reference to my letter of the 25th instant. The meeting of magistrates which I mentioned it was my intention to convene for this day, has taken place. I stated at this meeting, that in consequence of the new symptoms which are showing themselves in the proceedings of the reformers, I had been induced to request Sir John Byng would send us another troop of cavalry, which he has consented to do. I also read to them the copy of the letter I had sent to your lordship, and of one I had sent to Lord Sidmouth, in which I had given the same details as to your lordship, and inclosed to him the mischievous number of Sherwin's Register, alluded to in my last. That I deemed it my duty to make this communication to my Lord Sidmouth, I think I omitted to mention to your lordship, which you will have the goodness to attribute to the hurry under which I was obliged to write my letters on Wednesday evening. I am happy to say, the opinions I have formed, and the measures I have adopted met the full approbation of my brother magistrates, as I hope they will of your lordship. I feel perfectly confident, with the military force which I shall have to-morrow at my disposal; and I sincerely hope the strong attitude we have taken in this respect, without hitherto interfering with the proceedings of the reformers, will have due weight with them, and deter them from going to the dangerous lengths they have in Lancashire; and which, I am quite satisfied, is the object of their leaders. I am most anxious to avoid any contact with them, until they commit themselves by some breach of the peace, when I might be warranted in a decisive interference. —I have a strong objection, which I think it right to name to your lordship, to make use of the yeomanry, except as an auxiliary force, and in case only of emergency. I perceive a strong hatred exists against this force, which is carefully cherished by all the reformers, and if, unfortunately we should require their services

vices, the probability is, that in discharging their duty they would lay the foundation of perpetual heart-burnings and animosity.—I have not yet heard of any day being fixed for another meeting here; there will be one at Wakefield on Monday next. If any thing farther occurs worth communicating to your lordship, I shall take the liberty to write to you. I have, &c.

No. 55.—LETTER from the Clerk of the Peace of the West Riding of Yorkshire, also inclosed.

My Lord;—I am just returned from the meeting, with sir Francis Wood, Mr. Scott, and Mr. John Maude, amounting to about 2,000; a great part were spectators. Mr. Willan in the chair. The speakers were Messrs. Mitchell, Mason, Jackson and another; all of whom, sir Francis desires me to inform your lordship, talked a great deal of nonsense, but not treason; and the resolutions passed were similar to those at Manchester and other places. Supposing your lordship would be anxious to hear the result, I send this by a special messenger. All went off peaceably. Nothing was required by the act passed 31st of March 1817, as it expired on the 24th of July 1818; but I thought it proper to send to your lordship a copy of the notice left at this office by these deluded people, who, providentially, are not aware of that circumstance. I have, &c. JOHN FOLJAMBE.

No. 56.—EXTRACT of a Letter from the Lord Advocate of Scotland to Lord Sidmouth; dated Edinburgh, September 15, 1819.

My Lord;—The proceedings of the reformers at Manchester have been imitated at Paisley. Though allowed, without molestation, to meet and to talk sedition, they afterwards proceeded to violence, and continued their operations during the following day, although it was Sunday. Riots have also taken place in Glasgow. I have thought it right to communicate to your lordship the whole information on the subject, of which I am possessed, and this you will find inclosed. On the perusal of these documents, I think your lordship will agree with me in opinion, that the magistrates have acted with great prudence and moderation, and it now only remains for them to act with vigour, if these proceedings are continued.—In haste. I have, &c. W. RAE.

No. 57.—LETTER from the Sheriff Depute of Renfrewshire, inclosed therein; dated Paisley, Tuesday 14th, Sept. 11 o'clock.

My Lord;—On my return here yesterday, I found the town in great ferment. In the course of Sunday evening the windows of a number of houses in all quarters of the town had been broken, particularly those of the clergy. The same thing was renewed on Monday, but with more system and deliberation. The plan chiefly adopted was, to disperse on the appearance of constables, and to lurk in closes till an opportunity was found of sallying forth and throwing stones. As the cavalry could not pursue the rioters down the closes, we sent for infantry from Glasgow to guard the principal stations, and the cavalry dispersed any crowds which collected at the ends of streets; but with instructions only to strike with the flat of the sabre. Military posts were stationed during the night at the chief outlets of streets, and preserved tranquillity. The charges of the cavalry were executed with great moderation; and not till after printed notices that the Riot act had been read were fixed on poles, and carried through the crowd. It is satisfactory that no person has been killed; nor, as far as I have heard, any one severely hurt. But if the scenes of yesterday be renewed to-day, I fear the moderation which has hitherto been observed, cannot be continued.—Proposals were made to the magistrates, by the ringleaders of the mob offering to restore tranquillity, provided they gave up the flags, and liberated the prisoners, which I mention as indicative of the spirit by which the rioters are actuated.

Every thing is quiet up to this hour, at least apparently so; but the streets are still more crowded than usual. I have been engaged chiefly this forenoon in taking the declarations of those we have apprehended. Our prisoners are very numerous, and our gaol here was nearly full before the riots. The Greenock gaol has received five, but will not hold more: and I beg leave to request, that the proper authority be immediately obtained by your lordship authorising the transmission of prisoners to Glasgow gaol, under the present emergency, and requiring the magistrates of Glasgow to receive and detain them. I am my lord, &c. JOHN DUNLOP.

No. 58.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Mr. Reddie, also inclosed; dated Glasgow, 14th Sept. 1819.

My dear Lord; For a very brief account of the proceedings here last night, I refer your lordship to our proclamation of this day, of which I send a copy by this night's post. The assemblage took place rather unexpectedly. After lamps and windows had been broken, we read the Riot act; and then authorized the dragoons to clear the streets with their sabres, having previously been assailed with volleys of stones, from a house at present rebuilding in an adjoining street. The soldiers, as usual, behaved with great moderation. About a hundred prisoners were made; but we discharged upwards of fifty of them before two o'clock A. M.; and I fear we shall only be able to procure evidence against a few of those we have still in custody, amounting to about thirty. This check has not been sufficient. They are rather elated, it seems, than otherwise, by the success of their diversion in favour of Paisley; and, if we may rely upon the accounts we have received from different quarters, we shall have the same scene again to-night, for which we have made the necessary preparations. I am, &c. JAMES REDDIE.

The Lord Advocate of Scotland.

No. 59.—LETTER from Earl Fitzwilliam to Lord Sidmouth; dated Wentworth, 25th September, 1819.

My Lord;—I must apologise to your lordship for an apparent tardiness in forwarding the report made to me by the mayor of Leeds, respecting the occurrences of Monday last, within his jurisdiction; but when it reached this place I was absent. I have now the honour of transmitting a copy of his letter. I am confident your lordship will learn with the greatest satisfaction, that it passed off without the slightest interruption of the public peace: notwithstanding the occasion had drawn together, in Leeds, such an immense assemblage of people, as had never before been seen in Leeds, who marched in solemn procession to Hunslet Moor; the inflammatory speeches of the orators had not attraction to retain them together; they dropped off by degrees, and at the conclusion of the business, not more than had been usually seen at ordinary meetings continued to attend. I am no less confident that your lordship will applaud the judicious conduct pursued on the occasion by the mayor, and likewise the precautionary arrangements which he had made, in case of necessity. I have, &c. WENTWORTH FITZWILLIAM.

No. 60.—LETTER from the Mayor of Leeds, inclosed therein; dated Leeds, 20th Sept. 1819.

My Lord;—It may be satisfactory to your lordship, to receive from me some account, though short and imperfect, of this day's meeting on Hunslet Moor. About eleven o'clock there was an evident movement in the streets, and numerous arrivals, in small parties of people from the country: these continued increasing very much till about one o'clock, when the large detachments from the adjoining townships, and also a very numerous one from Dewsbury, headed by Willan, having arrived, the procession moved on to Hunslet Moor, where it arrived about three o'clock, accompanied by a band of music, and a great variety of flags with various mottos; the particulars of which I am not yet acquainted with. A man, of the name of Chapman, took the chair; some violent speeches were delivered: a number of resolutions past, such I understand as we have witnessed in Lancashire, and a collection made on the spot, under the pretence of applying the produce to enable Hunt to sustain the prosecutions in process against him. The crowd which first appeared on Hunslet Moor must have infinitely surpassed any thing of the kind which was ever before known in this place, but being composed of the vile and curious, as well as the mischievous, the former not finding attractions for them, they began, together with the women and children, early to retire; and before the business of the meeting was dispatched, the numbers were reduced as low as at the last meeting, not exceeding 4 or 5,000; although I cannot doubt there must have been at one period, perhaps about four o'clock, little short of 20,000 souls present—the whole affair has terminated peaceably.—The only measures of precaution I adopted, with the approbation of my brother magistrates, were these;—I ordered the regular constables of the town, under their chief, to assemble at the Court House; as also the watch and patrol, under their captain, at five o'clock, where I attended with the recorder and a few other magistrates, until a little after eight, by which time the whole affair was over, and all the parties appeared to have quietly dispersed.—With regard to the military, I desired the commandant of the squadron of dragoons to give strict orders to all his men to keep close in their quarters, holding themselves and their horses in perfect readiness in a moment's notice; and as my object was, to avoid display, I did not give out any orders till the assemblage had quitted the town.—After leaving the Court House, I had an engagement with the committee at the workhouse, which has detained me so late, that I fear my letter will scarcely be in time for the post. I have, &c. GEORGE BANKS.

To Earl Fitzwilliam, &c. &c. &c.

No. 61.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Colonel Horton to Mr. Hobhouse; dated Halifax, October 5, 1819.

Sir;—I am glad to say there was no farther disturbance here yesterday after the meeting had dispersed, except that three or four of the alehouses were full of persons drinking late in the evening: whereas they had been ordered to close them at eight o'clock; and the constables had great difficulty in clearing them, which could only be done by force; the people showing the worst possible spirit.—The heavy rain fell most fortunately, as it drove home those who came from the country; otherwise I have little doubt the constables would have been overpowered. Every report I receive justifies me in declaring, that more than fifty thousand persons were assembled; and that most of them had something on which they relied more than their sticks, some of which were actually shouldered, being rather clubs than sticks. There could not be more than a few thousands on the moor from the town itself; crowds came in every direction, and this place seems to have been well selected, being destitute of defence. I have, &c. THOMAS HORTON.

No. 62.—LETTER from six magistrates of the county of Durham to Lord Sidmouth; dated Gateshead, 13th of October, 1819.

My Lord;—We have the honour to acquaint your lordship, that we have addressed a letter this morning to the lord lieutenant of the county, respecting the present state of Chester Ward, in the county of Durham, of which we desire to forward a copy to you.—We have the honour to be, &c.

Adam Askew, chairman; H. G. Liddell, Robert Shaw, G. T. Leaton, Cha. Thorp, J. Collinson.

No. 63.—COPY of the Letter sent to the Lord Lieutenant.

My Lord;—We, the magistrates of Chester Ward, assembled at a general meeting, feel it to be our duty to represent to your lordship, that from the proceedings upon the river Tyne, and the general state of the ward, we are unable to answer for the preservation of the public peace, or the security of the inhabitants, without an increase of the military force. We should be glad to have the yeomanry force of the ward put into activity; and trust that your lordship will adopt such measures as you may think requisite upon the present emergency.

No. 64.—LETTER from the Earl of Darlington to Lord Sidmouth; dated Raby Castle, October 15, 1819.

My Lord;—I beg leave to inform your lordship, that in consequence of an urgent requisition from the magistrates in the North district of this county, and from the mayor of Newcastle, who has stated to me that he had been attacked in the execution of his duty, I have judged it expedient to order out the South Tyne yeomanry cavalry, and to place them under the authority of the magistrates, who must be responsible if they order the military to act, and I have urged them strongly not to do so unless the civil power is overcome or incompetent.—I cannot help observing, that the refractory keelmen and the radical reformers are, I trust, perfectly separate, although very inflammatory language and seditious writings are diffused amongst the former, who formed, I suppose, a part of that large assemblage of people who met on Newcastle Moor, on Monday, but who appear to have quietly dispersed.—I have, &c.

DARLINGTON, Lord-Lieutenant.

No. 65.—LETTER from Mr. Marsh, a Magistrate of Lancashire, to Lord Sidmouth; dated Westleigh, October 17, 1819.

My Lord;—Conceiving it my duty, I have the honour to inclose to your lordship several copies of informations on oath, accompanied by a petition, signed by most of the respectable inhabitants of the town of Leigh, in which I perfectly coincide; and have good reason to believe, that without the protection of the military, neither their persons nor their property will be safe much longer. The acerbation of temper amongst the weavers, or, as they style themselves, the reformers, produced by severe privations from the lowness of wages, and infuriated by seditious publications and cheap pamphlets, industriously circulated amongst them, has prepared them for the perpetration of the most atrocious crimes; and they openly declare their intention, by a simultaneous movement in the night, to seize property wherever they can find it, and destroy the possessors thereof; and it is added, that the period is not far distant. I beg leave to state, that a single troop of horse would, in my humble opinion, be adequate to the purpose, provided it was stationary for a few months: as it would enable us to put the Watch and Ward act in force, which, in the present state of things, I do not deem practicable.—I have, &c.

No. 67.—LETTER from the Mayor of Newcastle-upon-Tyne to Lord Sidmouth; dated Newcastle, October 17, 1819.

My Lord;—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your lordship's favour of the 15th; it is impossible to contemplate the meeting of the 11th without awe, more especially if my information is correct, that 700 of them were prepared with arms (concealed) to resist the civil power. These men came from a village about three miles from this town, and there is strong reason to suspect that arms are manufactured there: they are chiefly forgers. I have given all the information that I have received to the magistrates for the county of Durham, it being within their jurisdiction.—I have desired the town clerk to write the particulars of the riot at Shields, by last post, being so entirely engaged in the discharge of my official duties, that I had not a moment to do so myself—I am truly sorry to learn that he had not written.—The keelmen having on Tuesday morning last stopped the waggons and proceeded to other acts of insubordination, it was determined, that the magistrates for Northumberland and Durham, accompanied by dragoons, should go down on the north and south sides of the river, and that I should go on the river. Four boats from his majesty's ships met me about three miles from Shields. We effected all we wished; the ships loaded at the spouts, and I protected four keels to Shields: they moored to the ships; the owners said they only required some constables left to protect them, and dismissed his majesty's boats; and having discharged my duty, I went on shore, leaving the steam packet and constables to protect the crews of the keels. There did not appear the least reason to suspect riot, or an attack upon the packet. I had not been twenty minutes on shore, where I had ordered some refreshment for myself, when I received a message from the packet to send them immediate assistance, as their lives were in imminent danger. I sent to captain Montague requesting his boats, and made an immediate attempt to get to the packet; I found it absolutely impossible, without sacrificing my life to no purpose. Between three and four hundred of the mob were upon the quay, showering stones into the packet. In the course of a few minutes I was informed his majesty's boats were arrived; I made another attempt to get on board—it was impossible. At this time I marked one man, who appeared a leader; he threw stones, and as he retreated to seek more stones, and was stooping for that purpose, I seized him, and with the aid of another gentleman, took him prisoner; he is a shoemaker, has seven men employed under him, and was one of the radicals who marched from Shields on the 11th. Within a few minutes I heard the report of two muskets, and went out to know the cause, and was informed that they were fired from the shore; this was not the case, they were fired by marines, in the air; very soon two or three more were fired, and I heard a cry of murder; one man was killed. The mob immediately turned their fury to me, saying, I had ordered the firing. The room in which I was, was attacked with stones and brick bats; in a minute the glass sashes were demolished; the house, a very large one, belonging to the duke of Northumberland, was surrounded; the windows demolished. I had at the beginning sent for two magistrates at Shields; they could not come, and at this critical moment, when the mob broke open the door, and were rushing in to take me, the high constable, Mr. Joshua Donkin, arrived, and assuring them that it was impossible that I could give the order, they became more quiet. I had previously gone to the door to make the same assurance, but was assaulted with a volley of stones, two of which took effect. They then demanded the prisoner: as he was well known he was released, and hopes were entertained that they were satisfied. In three or four minutes the attack was renewed in front of the house; Mr. Donkin and myself went out at the back door, at the moment the mob rushed into the front; we were not recognized, and got off: they searched every room, even chests for me. The inquest is sitting: there is no doubt of a verdict of justifiable homicide. I am happy to say I have reason to believe the business between the keelmen and owners will be settled to-morrow; but, this will not render us secure, the reformers are now in a state of almost rebellion. I applied to lord Darlington,—the yeomanry are all under arms; four companies of the 40th marched here at four o'clock on Friday morning, and more come to-morrow. Post is going.—I am, my lord, &c.

No 68.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Mr. Norris to Lord Sidmouth; dated Manchester, October 21, 1819.

My lord; From every quarter the universal information and opinion is, that the people are in a great measure armed, and are continually, and as quickly as possible, and as extensively arming. It is strongly surmised that pikes have been, and are sent from Birmingham in boxes, and I have put this matter in a train of investigation. I fear, also, my lord, it is but too true that many hundreds of small priced pistols have been sold in this town, within a very short period, and that the lower classes are purchasing them in great numbers. I have &c.

No.69.—SEVEN Examinations transmitted by the rev. Dr. Whitaker, a magistrate of Lancashire.

Lancashire } The examination of T. U. taken to wit. } upon oath before me, the rev. Thomas Dunham Whitaker, clerk, doctor of laws, one of his majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, this eleventh of October, 1819:

This afternoon about four o'clock, I went into the smithy of Ralph Miller, in Mellor, in the said county, to inquire after my son-in-law, who has run away from his master, who is a blacksmith. I found Ralph Miller and a young man at work at the forge; there were in the smithy about five or six other men, who appeared to be weavers; they were sitting, and seemed to be watching the smith's work. I inquired from Ralph Miller, whether he had seen any person answering the description of my son-in-law, whom I described? he said, he had not; one of the weavers said to me, he (meaning my son-in-law) is making pikes like these; at the same time this person took up an unfinished pike from the ground under the bellows, and showed it to me (I had before stated that my son-in-law's master was a blacksmith). Ralph Miller turned his head towards the man who had taken up the pikes, and smiled. I then inquired of Ralph Miller, if he could make me heels to my shoes? he said he could not, he was too busy. One of the weavers said, he (Ralph Miller) was too busy making pikes; another of the weavers asked me, if there were any pikes in our neighbourhood? I said I had not seen any, but I had heard that there were a good many coming to the Bolton meeting next Wednesday from Haslingden; one of the weavers answered, we know that. One of the weavers then asked me, if they would come with their pikes? I said, I had heard so; another of the weavers said, "and we will too." One of the weavers then took up another pike, which was nearly finished; I inquired the price of it; one of the weavers said it was a shilling; a young man, dressed like a weaver, who was using the large hammer for the young smith, said it was fourteen pence. I asked the young man who was dressed like a weaver, to sell it to me; but he said, I could not have one then, as they had none finished. I was in the smithy about an hour and a half, during which I had a good deal of conversation with the weavers and the two smiths, in the course of which one of the weavers said, there was no way for them but rising altogether. One of the weavers asked me if I thought there would be any thing to do at Bolton at the reform meeting next Wednesday? I said I could not tell, but that people were afraid there would be. Another of the weavers said, there would be bloody work: another said, they would not be, as they were at Manchester, unarmed; that they had a right to go to the meeting armed. The old man, Ralph Miller, was present during the whole of this conversation; he appeared to be rather deaf, and was busy at work during the greater part of the time, but he must have heard the whole, or a part of the conversation.

T. U.

Examinations of witnesses taken upon oath before me, the rev. T. D. Whitaker, &c. this, 12th of October, 1819.

U. V. in the county of Lancaster, deposes as follows: this forenoon, about half-past ten o'clock, in consequence of a request from * * *, one of the constables of Blackburn, I went into Mellor, which is about four miles from Blackburn, in company with V. X. to purchase a pike from Ralph Miller of Mellor aforesaid, blacksmith. In passing Ralph Miller's smithy, we saw a number of persons standing there, and, not knowing how they were disposed, we went forward to a public-house in Mellor, known by the sign of the Millstone, and called for two glasses of ale. I then sent V. X. to the smithy, to request Ralph Miller to come down to me, and to tell him that a person wanted to speak with him. In about a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes, V. X. and Miller came into the public-house together, and sat down in the room in which I was; no other person was in the room. I told Miller that I did not like to call at the smithy, as we saw some men about; Miller said, you need not have minded that, for they are come about pikes. After Miller had been seated a few minutes, V. X. informed me, that he had mentioned the business to Miller. I then produced to Miller a small pistol, and asked him, if he could put me a screw in which was wanting? Miller took the pistol into his hand, and examined it, and asked me, what a pair of pistols such as that might cost? I told him, perhaps a guinea. I then asked him if he had any of the other articles? (by which I meant the pikes). He said he had some, but they were not ground up yet. I then asked him, how soon he could settle us up two? he said, he thought in about two hours; I then asked him the length of them? Miller then took up a tobacco-pipe, and showed me the length, which appeared to be about fourteen inches. I then asked him the form which they were in? he said, they were straight, and very sharp at the point, and well steeled at the small end, and made with a shank to fit into the staff, and that in that shank there was a hole to put a nail through to make it fast, I then asked him, if there were not pikes made with a hook? he said, he had made one, and the hook screwed in near the lower end, and the hook was flat and sharp, but they were not well liked, as the cavalry horses now had chains in the bridles, to prevent them from being cut, and the pike he had made in the form which he was describing, he had disposed of to a person in Blackburn, who put out pieces in Mellor for some manufacturer in Preston, and he believed that he had sent it to London, it was such a handsome one; that he had given him two shillings and ten-pence for it. I then asked Miller what purpose they were to be appropriated to; he said, they were to charge against the cavalry. He said, he had made some hundreds of pikes, and a great many had gone into Harwood, principally to Harwood and Rishton, and all that he had by him made at present were eight, and he thought he should make no more, as he was afraid of being apprehended by the justices orders, but he did not see where they could have any hold of him; I answered, I did not know whether they had or not, but I desired him to take another glass of ale, and get these ground up for us, as we would wish to be off. In consequence of that Miller went away; I waited near two hours at the public-house, during which I sent V. X. twice to get Miller to make haste with the pikes. At the end of the two hours I went up to the smithy: I saw two lads turning a grindstone at the back of the smithy, and two men holding on two pikes, to polish or sharpen them. V. X. brought one of the pikes into the smithy, and gave it to me into my hand. I asked him if it was finished; the old man said, no, not yet; I gave it to him into his hand; he just rubbed up the edges with a file, and said it wanted whetting upon a stone: I told him never to mind that, we could do that when we wanted to use it. V. X. then went out and fetched the other pike, which he delivered to Miller, who rubbed up the edge of the pike with a file, and then went out of the smithy for a sheet of paper which he wrapped round each pike separately, and delivered one to me and the other to V. X. I paid him fourteen pence a-piece for them, and two-pence for two hoops. I inquired of Ralph Miller, if it was likely that many persons would go out of that neighbourhood to the Bolton meeting? he said he thought a great many would go off that side. We then came away. The pikes now produced are those which I so purchased from Miller.

Taken before me, T. D. Whitaker.

V. X. being sworn at the same time, deposes as follows: I came from Burnley this morning, with T. U. and went with him into Mellor. We called at the Millstone. T. U. sent me up to Ralph Miller's to get him to come down to the public-house. I met Ralph Miller between the smithy and his own house; I asked him to come down; he said, what is your business? I told him that another gentleman at the public-house wanted to speak to him about some pikes; I told him there was a meeting at Bolton, and we meant to go. Ralph Miller then took me into his smithy, and showed me some pikes; I do not know how many there were; they were under the bellows in the smithy, covered with ashes. I told Miller that the gentleman at the public-house had a pistol which he wanted settling; Miller then went with me to the public-house. He sat about ten minutes in company with T. U. and myself. T. U. produced a pistol to Miller, and asked him if he could put him a screw in it? Miller looked at it a considerable bit, and asked T. U. what would be the value of a pair? to which T. U. said about a guinea. Then T. U. asked Miller if he had any pikes? Miller said, he had some by him, but they were not finished; T. U. asked him, how soon he could finish two? Miller answered, perhaps in two hours. Miller said, he had made a pike with a hook for a man who put out goods, and it had been sent to London, for any thing he knew, but that the other pikes were more liked, because the cavalry now had chains to their bridles. T. U. asked Miller what was meant to be done with these pikes? Miller answered, that they were to charge the cavalry with. There was other conversation between Miller and T. U. Miller went away to finish two pikes for us. When he had been gone away a few minutes, T. U. sent me up to the smithy to ask if the pikes were ready. As soon as I went into the smithy, the old man, Ralph Miller, ordered a young man, who appeared to be a smith, to take two pikes, and grind them directly; the young man took two pikes from under the bellows. I and another man went with the young smith to the grindstone behind the smithy; the young blacksmith and another man held each one pike upon the stone, and two men turned the stone; one of the bystanders asked me who my companion was? I said I did not know. They asked me, if he was a speaker? I told them, I did not know. They then asked me, where we were going to? I said, I did not know whether Bolton or not. They told me, that a person who had been speaking in Yorkshire was missing, and they wished to know if this was he. They then wished me to go to a white-house, where money was gathered for the support of speakers; they showed me the house, which was about three hundred yards off, and told me they paid one penny a week there; I told them I durst not take any money, without acquainting my master. I then went down to T. U. to ask him if I must take any money? he said I must not, and I went back and told them so. I then went into Miller's smithy, and remained there till T. U. came up. T. U. went into the smithy, and I followed him. I then fetched a pike from the young smith, and took it into the smithy, and gave it to T. U. who asked Ralph Miller if it was finished? Miller said it was not, and he took it and filed it, and said it wanted whetting. T. U. said it would do, he could whet it up when he wanted it. I then went and fetched the other; Ralph Miller filed it up. T. U. asked him the price, which Ralph Miller said was fourteen-pence a piece, and two-pence for the hoops; we paid him that price for them. The old man wrapped up the pikes in paper, and gave one to me, and another to T. U. and we then came away. The two pikes now produced are those which we so received from Ralph Miller.

to wit. } upon oath before me, the Rev.
T. D. Whitaker, this 13th of October,
Knowles.

X. Y. deposeth as follows: yesterday about eight o'clock in the morning, I went with Y. Z. to the house of the prisoner, James Morris, in Haslingden Grain. We got there about eleven o'clock in the forenoon; we found Morris at work in his smithy; he was mending some tools. I asked him if he had any winding machines by him? he said he had none finished off. I then asked him if he could have one ready by next Saturday week? he said yes. James Morris then asked the prisoner if he was for Bolton? he answered, yes, they could not do without him. Morris, the prisoner, then pulled out a pike head from under a quantity of turf in the smithy, and said, there is the winding-machine you want, I suppose? I said yes, that is the tool itself. He then pulled out two other pike-heads from the same place, and asked if those articles would do, and if we would grind them down ourselves? We then asked him the price of two of the pikes? he answered, three shillings, he could take no less. We purchased two pikes for three shillings. The prisoner Morris then looked at me, and said to Y. Z. that man has plenty of money; I answered, yes, I have a note. The prisoner then said, get shut of it as soon as you can, for it will be of no use to-morrow after Bolton meeting. He then asked me if I should be there? In the course of the conversation with the prisoner, he said, it is no use to go to Bolton meeting, without they took those tools with them to defend themselves; and referred to the Manchester meeting, which he called Peterloo. The pikes now produced are those which we purchased as is above stated.

Y. Z. and I then proceeded to John Knowles, of Rawtenstall. About three or four o'clock in the afternoon we called at the Wheatsheaf, which is a door or two from Knowles's smithy. In passing the smithy on the way to the Wheatsheaf, I saw Knowles at work upon the steady, hammering a pike. I sent the landlady for Knowles; he came in a few minutes. We gave him something to drink. Y. Z. asked him if he had any pikes? he said he had four, but they were not quite finished off. Knowles then went out of the house, and in about five minutes came back with a short man: the short man (whose name I do not know) brought with him several pikes, covered up in a wrapper. Knowles then sat down, and drank Hunt and Liberty, and Revenge to Peterloo Meeting. Another man came into the room, and produced a pike from under his coat, and said to me, this pike I have just got made for my son. Y. Z. took up the last-mentioned pike, and asked the price? Knowles said it was three shillings and six-pence. I asked Knowles if he had made it himself? he said he had, he had made many a score. He then asked me where I came from? I said, from Accrington. Knowles said there were many had gone into that quarter. We then bought two pikes, one of which cost two shillings and four pence, and the other two shillings. I then inquired of the landlord what the shot was? he said nine-pence. I said, I had but seven-pence halfpenny; Knowles said, I will give you three half-pence, reformers are not within three half-pence one to another. I then asked Knowles if we could go no way private; Knowles showed me the way to the back door; we came that way, and brought the pikes with us: they are the pikes now produced.

X. Y.

Y. Z. deposeth as follows: I have heard the preceding examination of X. Y. read, and the same is true in every particular. The pikes now produced are those which were purchased from the two prisoners as is above stated.

Y. Z.

U. V. deposes as follows: this morning at two o'clock I set out from Blackburn, in company with * * *, a detachment of cavalry and others, for the purpose of apprehending James Morris of Haslingden Grain, and John Knowles of Rawtenstall. We reached the prisoner Morris's house at a little past three o'clock in the morning; we got admittance into the house and apprehended the prisoner, and then proceeded to search the house. * * * and I and some of the soldiers went up stairs; I found in a room up stairs, a pike head concealed under a lathe among the turnings; * * * then took a candle, and found two pistol stocks concealed upon a shelf near the roof; one of the stocks had a barrel let into it; in another room * * * and I found a box which was locked; we called out for a key; one of Morris's sons, a lad about 15 or 16 years of age, said the key was lost; I then attempted to break open the box; the lad then said to us, will you break it open? I told him we would if he did not produce the key; the lad then produced a key from his breeches pocket and delivered it to * * *; * * * opened the box, and in it we found about four pounds weight of leaden balls in an unfinished state. I afterwards found two poles, each about five feet long, put up a chimney in the same room, which appeared to have been intended for pike shafts: we then reached the smithy and outbuildings, and found in the smithy, close to the anvil, a piece of iron, beaten, which appears to have been intended for a pike head. We then sent the prisoner off to Blackburn, under the care of * * *, and * * *, to whom we delivered the articles found as above stated. The articles now produced are those which were found.

* * * and I and a party of soldiers then proceeded to Rawtenstall, to the house of the prisoner John Knowles, it was about five o'clock when we reached his house; Knowles was in bed; * * * called to him to get up; Knowles inquired who wanted him? * * * answered it was an old friend; Knowles called out, what are you for Bolton? * * * said yes; Knowles then came down stairs, partly dressed, and opened the door and was immediately apprehended: * * * accompanied him up stairs whilst Knowles dressed himself. I proceeded to search Knowles's smithy, and in a cupboard in the wall I found the socket of a pike head and a small pistol; I found upon a bench near the cupboard, a small box, containing the papers now produced, and which I have marked. One of the papers contains the letters "Hunt and Liberty," written in roman letters with a pen; another, the pattern of a pike; another is entitled at the top, "Rawtenstall Section, No. 1," and it is ruled in square columns, and contains several numbers: and another purports to be an epitaph on the constitution. We brought Knowles off, and I kept the articles which were found, as above stated, and they are those which are now produced. In our journey back to Blackburn I rode with the prisoner in a chaise; I had some conversation with him: I asked him if he had sold any pikes within this week or fortnight; he said he had not; but he said he had made several, and would make for any body who came to order them; he was only working for wages, and work was scarce; I then showed him the pike which I had found upon his premises, and asked him if he had made any of that pattern; he put one finger up the socket and said he had made that pike, but on examining it a second time he said he had not made it; it was a very clumsy, rough thing, it had been sent to him as a pattern; it began to rain, and I observed that I thought it would prevent many people from going to the Bolton meeting; he said he thought not, for they did not much mind being wet.

U. V.

* * * deposes as follows; I have heard the preceding examinations of U. V. relative to the two prisoners, read: so much of it as relates to me is true: during the time when I was with the prisoner Knowles up stairs, and while he was dressing, one of the soldiers said to Knowles, you are a clever fellow, you understand making pikes very well: Knowles answered, he could make a pike as well as any man in England.

Taken before me, T. D. Whitaker.

No. 70.—LETTER from the Duke of Hamilton to Lord Sidmouth; dated Hamilton-Palace, November 6, 1819.

My lord; I have to acknowledge your lordship's two letters of the 1st and 2d of November, upon the subject of the yeomanry cavalry, and will endeavour to give every effect to the same; your lordship holding always in view, what I before said of the great difficulty attending it. To the natural difficulty attached to the situation of the farmer, &c. &c. in this country, there appears now a novel one, proceeding from the alarm excited by those who compose the various and numerous meetings in this district of country. In regard to the general state of affairs, your lordship has other sources of information, perhaps better than mine; but were I to venture to offer an opinion of my own, I should say that the state of men's minds is such, at this moment, that the most trifling irritation would lead to disturbance; and should any violence commence, there are no means nor should I be able to counteract it. As the meeting of parliament will occasion my absence from the country, ere long, I must repeat to your lordship, that this neighbourhood continues in a state of extreme distress—generally in want of employment, and under a considerable degree of agitation; all of which appear more likely to increase than diminish. If therefore your lordship should have any particular communication to make to me, or any directions to give connected with the public service in this country,

(U)

I am anxious to receive the same, before my approaching departure, which will probably take place in about eight or ten days. I have, &c.

HAMILTON & BRANDON.

No. 71.—LETTER from the same to the same; dated Hamilton Palace, Nov. 7, 1819.

My Lord; I yesterday communicated to the lord advocate, to be laid before sir Thomas Bradford, a letter that I had just received from a very respectable magistrate. He states that in his neighbourhood, the farmers, &c. &c. who were required to act as constables or volunteers, altho' well-disposed so to do, did not dare to come forward, on account of the menaces of their neighbours. I have again this day received a report, of which I have the honour to inclose a copy. Your lordship will see, that the alarm which prevails in their district precludes those gentlemen likewise from being able to procure signatures from the very persons who they are persuaded are disposed to sign. This part of the country is unfortunately surrounded by idle Irishmen, weavers and colliers, who create a general uneasiness; and if any means are to be carried into effect to separate the good from the bad, or to maintain order and public justice, it is requisite that the civil power, and the peaceable part of the population, should know how and where to find support and protection. I must recommend to your lordship's serious consideration the above important statement. I have, &c.

HAMILTON & BRANDON.

No. 72.—LETTER from a Deputation of the Parishes of Monkland inclosed therein; Parish of Old Monkland, 7th Nov. 1819.

My Lord Duke;—We the subscribers, the deputation from the committee of Old and New Monkland, for obtaining subscriptions to a declaration of loyalty, as well as for volunteer cavalry and infantry, beg leave to lay before your grace, as lord-lieutenant of the county of Lanark, the following statement with regard to these two parishes with which we are connected: that it is impossible to obtain a subscription to the declaration of loyalty with effect, or to obtain signatures for forming either volunteer corps of infantry or cavalry in the present disturbed state of the district, however anxious the loyal and well-disposed part of his majesty's subjects therein are, because of the apprehension they entertain from the ill-disposed and turbulent people with which they are surrounded: we, the subscribers, therefore, wish to represent the absolute necessity of having a rallying point, which we consider alone can be effective, by having a military force stationed at Airdrie, as the only proper place of rendezvous for that purpose: we therefore hope your grace will take the earliest opportunity of representing our statement to the secretary of state. We have, &c.

(Signed) DAVID BUCHANAN, Dep. Lt.
CHARLES PIE, Major-Gen.
JAMES TENNENT.

No. 73.—LETTER from the Earl of Glasgow, Lord Lieutenant of Renfrewshire; dated Hawkhead, November 9th, 1819.

My Lord;—On my arrival in this county I found that the tone of feeling and proceedings of the vast population of this neighbourhood were of a description calculated to excite the utmost alarm in the well-affected, and that the public mind was considerably agitated by the insidious and too successful promulgation of seditious principles, as well as by the late more open audacious attempts to interrupt the public tranquillity.—In this populous manufacturing district, revolutionary principles have made alarming progress. For a considerable period the utmost pains have been taken to spread a spirit of disaffection in this country by an unexampled spirit of proselytism, to perpetuate the evil by instilling the most pernicious principles into the minds of youth, and to obliterate all religious feeling in this once religious district.—The statutes for repressing seditious clubs and societies have induced the disaffected to conduct all their proceedings by committees, which are appointed at smaller meetings to manage the preparations for the larger; and a system of rapid communication of political intelligence and orders is organized, in which, what are called "Unions," hold a conspicuous place. These "Unions," which are daily becoming more numerous, consist of classes or subdivisions of Reformers, who hire an apartment convenient for their local residence, where they procure newspapers and pamphlets of a seditious tendency. Notwithstanding the distresses of the times there are few operative manufacturers who do not find the means of reading such publications.—The assumed right of mustering from various quarters to the point of meeting, with banners, bearing seditious symbols and inscriptions, or with inscriptions, which, though unexceptionable in the abstract, are made to serve the same purpose, has swelled the ranks of the disaffected, in consequence of the temptations which are thus afforded to idle curiosity; and the impunity with which this is done has added to the effect which the speeches delivered on such occasions have on the minds of hearers already discontented, and pre-disposed to listen with eagerness and credulity to the prospects of innovation so confidently held out to them.—Three of these meetings have been held within the last three months in the county of Renfrew. The second of these held on the 11th of September, was followed by disturbances which continued for three days before they were effectually suppressed. At the last meeting, held on the 1st of November, at a village some miles distant from Paisley, numerous flags were carried in procession, bearing inscriptions calculated to convey alarm into the minds of the well affected, and inspire those of different dispositions with confidence in an impending revolution.—There were also at this last meeting, two important features which had not been witnessed in those by which it was preceded—the junction of bands of females as part of the exhibition, and the display of arms. The ostensible arms were chiefly bludgeons, but it is well known that many were prepared both with pistols and other weapons. Both in proceeding to the place of meeting, and in returning from it, there was a striking exhibition of movements executed in the streets of the town by several thousand persons, with military precision, silence and order. The pretence alleged for arming was self-defence, and this precautionary measure was said to have reference to the late events at Manchester, and to the exertions of the special constables and military in quelling the riots which commenced at Paisley on the 11th of September.—While these public meetings, thus held with a display of banners and arms, serve to inspire the disaffected with confidence in their numbers, they overawe and intimidate many who would otherwise have disclaimed seditious principles, and have gladly arrayed themselves in aid of the civil authority.—Even the special constables who have been enrolled, and provided with batons for the preservation of public tranquillity, feel reluctant to act with that vigour which is necessary.—There is not, at present, in this county, any corps of yeomanry cavalry, nor armed association of any description whatever, to counteract these menacing preparations, nor any suitable accommodation for the reception of regular troops, so that they can be kept united when called on by the civil magistrate, or saved from that contamination of principle, which is also an avowed object among the reformers.—On the whole I think it my duty explicitly to state to your lordship, that while the reformers of this district call out “Order” at their meetings, and can systematically preserve it too when it suits their policy or humour, their public harangues are of the most audacious and revolutionary description: the expectation of a subversion of the government is so deeply rooted in their minds, that whenever a leader shall arise, or a favourable moment occur, I fear a considerable portion of the population could not be depended on.—I have been induced to enter more fully into the situation of this county, as I believe the above will not be found an inaccurate representation of the management and proceedings of the reformers in some other disturbed districts of the west of Scotland. I have, &c.

No. 74.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Colonel Horton to Mr. Hobhouse; dated Halifax, November 9, 1819.

Sir;—It was expected that great numbers of persons would from here attend the meeting at Huddersfield yesterday, but it was thought sufficient to close the alehouses at eight o'clock. It does not seem to me, however, that a most outrageous breach of the peace was effected last night here. In truth, all we can expect is, that on the next occasion, absolute plunder and destruction of property, and perhaps of life, will be the consequence. This is the natural and obvious march of the spirit that pervades this part of the country. I inclose for lord Sidmouth's information, copies of the examinations I have taken. It is my intention to apprehend the parties, and if the complaint be proved, to commit them, or hold them to bail to answer at the next assizes.

No. 75.—Two Examinations inclosed therein.

West Riding of Yorkshire, } John Brierly, Deputy Constables of Halifax, came before me this 9th of November 1819; and on oath saith,

That near eight o'clock last evening, he met many hundreds of persons near to Barum Top in Halifax, coming, as he believes from the meeting at Huddersfield; that they marched in ranks about eight or ten abreast, with music, and six or seven flags, and lighted candles; many of them had sticks, some large ones on their shoulders; that at Barum Top they shouted, and fired many pistols in the air; as they went on, he thought they became more riotous, repeating their fire quicker, and he thought it his duty, though quite alone, to attempt to preserve the peace of the town: that with this view he went to the man who had the great drum, and rapping on it with his constable's staff, charged him to cease playing or beating, saying, the town must not be disturbed in that way: that the drummer did cease to beat, as also the band in general, in a great degree; marching down the street, the firing went on again, also the music. Near the White Lion-inn, deponent received on his right leg a very severe kick, which nearly took his legs from under him; he is certain that Joseph Baines, of Halifax, is the man who so assaulted him, and ran away directly, threading backwards and forwards through the ranks, and that he must have known deponent; Baines was close to him, and deponent following him, till he was perfectly certain who it was; deponent then went down the street with the crowd, the band playing all the way, and pistols being fired, and loud shouting made: deponent says, the street down which the crowd marched, is the most public one in the town, and they must have marched about half a mile through it, reckoning from Barum Top to the Talbot; that seeing the crowd halt at the front door of the Talbot, he ran round to the back door, and went in to get the front door fastened: that a few of the mob had already entered the house.

That in going down the street he saw Joseph Wood, the son of James Wood, of Halifax, mason, and John Ingham, jun. of Halifax, plasterer, marching in the ranks of the mob; that he cannot say who it was that fired any of the pistols; that he left the mob at the Talbot door shouting and firing pistols, and went himself to have the alehouses near it shut up.

West Riding of Yorkshire. } Mr. David Mallinson, of Halifax, clerk, came before me this 9th day of November, 1819; and on his oath says,

That near eight o'clock last evening, he saw a large crowd of persons go down the main street of Halifax with lighted randles, a band of music and flags, shouting very much and firing pistols; that he followed them to the front of the Talbot-inn, where the crowd halted, the door being fast; that they marched in regular order; that he observed Joseph Roberts, of Halifax, nail-maker, on the Talbot steps, speaking to the crowd, beginning by calling them brothers or countrymen, or some such term; that he does not know exactly what he said, but thinks the object of his speech was, to call on the crowd to thank the band for their attendance, also saying something about radical reform; that he saw Roberts that morning going towards Huddersfield with a stick in his hand, not a yard long, like a cudgel, but does not know whether he had it at night.

No. 76.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Mr. Norris to Lord Sidmouth; dated Manchester, Nov. 10, 1819.

My lord;—The state of this town and neighbourhood remains much the same as when I last wrote to your lordship. On Sunday last between six and eight o'clock, a pistol loaded with ball was fired into the lodgings or sitting room of a Mr. Mutrie, who gave evidence before the coroner on the inquest of John Lees, as to the attack of the mob on the Manchester yeomanry. On Monday night, about eleven o'clock, a pistol, loaded with slugs, was fired into one of the bed-rooms of Mr. Thomas Hardman's house, in Quay-street; but fortunately, without injury; and two or three other instances of the firing of pistols, with malicious intent, have also occurred. I mean ultimately to collect the instances, on oath, for your lordship's information. I much fear they will increase before the meeting of parliament, and most likely in a degree to call on the legislature to interfere. Meetings still continue to be held, though not in this immediate neighbourhood; one was held at Wigan, about twenty miles distant, and another at Huddersfield, distant twenty-six miles, on Monday last, both large meetings. I have, &c.

No. 77.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Dr. Whitaker to Lord Sidmouth; dated Blackburn, Nov. 10, 1819.

My Lord;—I have thought it expedient to transmit to your lordship, drawings of different pikes, which have been seized in this neighbourhood, for the purpose of removing the incredulity which even yet seems to prevail in some minds as to their existence. I must now request your lordship's attention to another subject of immediate and urgent importance. It is the general opinion, that the spirit of the reformers, as they entitle themselves, is on the decline; an opinion grounded solely on their present quiet and silence. I have strong reasons for thinking very differently. For, in the first place, pikes continue to be made and circulated daily, in different parts of the country, and with perfect impunity, as, in consequence of former seizures, the makers will sell to none but known friends, and will enter into no conversation with strangers (excepting in a single instance) on the subject. I have, &c.

No. 78.—EXTRACT of a Letter from the Earl of Balcarras to Lord Sidmouth; dated Haigh-hall, Wigan, Nov. 11, 1819.

My Lord;—One of the seditious meetings, the nature of which I need not describe, was held on a common, distant about two miles from Wigan, on Monday the 6th instant. Its object was evidently to feel for the disposition of the inhabitants of Wigan and its vicinity. About six thousand persons assembled round the temporary stage, and probably about four thousand persons more were present, but they remained at such a distance as showed that curiosity alone had led them to that spot. The meeting was held at the requisition of some low persons of Wigan, but they were joined on the common by the dangerous rabble of Bolton, who were all armed with bludgeons, and rumour says, with arms, chiefly loaded pistols, which was manifested by the explosion of them towards the close of the day. Harrison addressed them from the stage or platform. The mob carried eighteen flags, with the usual symbols of sedition; they had selected the day of the quarter sessions being held at Liverpool, for their meeting; but the magistrates of Wigan and its vicinity were aware of that trick, and remained at their post. The magistrates were seven in number, myself being their chairman, which has induced me to trouble your lordship with a communication of the events of the day. Sir William Gerard, with thirty-nine of his yeomanry cavalry, being the effectives of two troops, attended Wigan at the requisition of the magistrates. As the leaders had selected a large common for their meeting, the magistrates thought it advisable not to interfere with them, as, situated there, they could do no mischief; and they thought it quite sufficient to send to the spot a body of special constables to preserve the peace and order; the magistrates, yeomanry cavalry, and the superior class of the inhabitants of Wigan, remained in the burgh, awaiting the result. In this position the magistrates rested, having determined, that as the meeting of parliament was so near, they would pay no attention either to the leaders or their flags, and the day passed away with the greatest order and tranquillity. I have, &c.

The following is an extract from the speech of Mr. Harrison, on Monday the 8th of November, 1819: "If any man molests you, or oppress you, knock him down—keep him down—and cut him when he is down." It has been inculcated here, and with too much success, that the people have a right to carry concealed arms, for the purpose of self-defence, against the disturbers of their meetings.

No. 79.—LETTER from the Boroughreeve and Constables of Manchester to Lord Sidmouth; dated Police-office, Manchester, Nov. 12th, 1819.

My Lord;—We have the honour to commence our official correspondence with your lordship on a painful and alarming subject—the attempted assassination of Mr. Nadin—an event which we understand was communicated to your lordship, by Mr. Norris, the evening it occurred. By the posting bill herewith inclosed, your lordship will be informed of the measures which we have adopted: and we beg leave to submit to your lordship's consideration, the propriety of offering a pardon, on the conditions proposed. Up to the present time, we regret to state, that we have not any further information on the subject, than the description given by Mr. Nadin; but every exertion will be made for the discovery of the offender. We have not hitherto addressed your lordship on the political state of the town and neighbourhood, having been informed that Mr. Norris has regularly communicated the passing events. On this important subject we regret that it is not in our power to report favourably. The system of arming is continued to a great extent, and although it does not appear to be the intention of the reformers to hold a general meeting previous to the assembling of parliament, from the best information we can obtain, we learn that arrangements are making for delegates, or agents, to attend and watch the proceedings of parliament; and in the event of measures being adopted, which they may consider inimical to their views, then a signal to be given for an immediate simultaneous rising. In a few days we hope for further information, which we will immediately communicate to your lordship, as well as the particulars of other information, which we have obtained periodically, during the present week; and which, we trust, will be acceptable. We beg to assure your lordship, that, during [this eventful period, our utmost attention and exertion shall be devoted to preserve the peace of this town and neighbourhood; to aid which, we rely on the cordial support of his majesty's government. We have, &c.

No. 80.—EXAMINATION transmitted by Col. Hargreaves, a Magistrate of Lancashire.

Lancashire } The Examination of ****, taken to wit. } upon oath, before Laurence Halsted, esq. one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the County of Lancaster, the 15th November, 1819.

On my arrival in Burnley this morning, I found colonel Hargreaves on horseback, and all the military in readiness. The reformers were coming with their flags, caps of liberty, and bands of music. They had with them large staffs and sticks. I went to the Bull public house, and shortly after the colonel came with one of the staffs in his hand, which he had taken from one of the reformers. It was the shaft of a pike. The man broke from him, and escaped in the crowd. The colonel was desirous not to call the military out to action on this circumstance alone; for he said to me, that if the reformers were quiet, the magistrates would suffer them to meet. I saw the reformers pass by the Sun orderly and quietly, and I followed them to the place where the hustings were erected; and then my friend and I found all those who had staffs and sticks with them, employed cleaning out the hole at the end, to admit the pike, for they were all of them shafts for pikes; they cleaned out the gravel; they had used the sticks and staffs to walk with, and they were full of dirt and gravel, which they picked out with the shaft end of the pike. They generally had the pikes in the sleeve of the coat, and some had them concealed in their breasts. I saw a great many pikes on the ground. They were not so very cautious in concealing them; a many showed them without fear. The pikemen were nearest to the hustings; and behind them there were a many who had pistols; I saw a great number of pistols on the field. I saw one person who was wounded by one of the pikes being accidentally thrust against his leg. Whilst writing this, a person came into the room, and said, that he had seen a man who was cut in the breast by his own pike. The shafts of the pikes were hooped with iron hoops, like that which the colonel had taken. On the hustings there were about thirty persons, all of them strangers to me except Knight, who wore the red cap of liberty on the hustings, and was chairman, the sailor boy (or Walker) from Manchester, and George Dewhurst of Blackburn. They had eighteen flags and three caps of liberty: on one of the flags was wrote, Fitzwilliam and the Yorkshire Reformers; and on one of the caps, Liberty or Death; which, in particular parts of the orators speeches, was hoisted aloft on its pole, and then dropped again, and taken off. The speeches of the orators were such as are generally made at the meetings of the reformers, holding up the ministers and magistrates, and officers of justice, to contempt and ridicule.

The number of reformers was very great; I measured the circle they occupied round the hustings; it was 150 yards; and I judge, that if all who were on the outside of the circle had been in it, they would have been as close as it is possible for men to stand. The most striking of their resolutions is, that which called upon them to oppose the measures of parliament, if they should attempt to pass any bills which should control their liberty of meeting; it called upon them to rise and oppose such things, and all those who were for them; and the passing of such bills should be the signal for universally rising. This resolution made a particular impression on the minds of the reformers; they all evinced a determination to oppose all such things. On the breaking up of the meeting, they separated into two bodies; one came to Burnley, and the other went a different way. They remained a long time in the road and fields adjoining where they separated, and then they began to discharge their pistols, swearing they should like to have a dust with the soldiers before they parted. They fired scores of pistols in the road, whilst they were there. I left them before they separated, for I was afraid they would do something that would bring out the soldiers; and all the way to Burnley (for the meeting was about half a mile from the town) as I walked on, I heard hundreds of pistols discharged in all directions. It resembled Manchester and its neighbourhood, on the night of a 5th of November, for firing in all directions as they went away. Mr. Knight did not stop in the lane, but went on to Burnley with the other of his friends; and the firing did not commence till he had left them in the road. They appeared anxious for the soldiers to come; happily they did not: for if they had, the mischief would have been serious on both sides. On coming into Burnley again, I saw the military posted in various parts of the town, and colonel Hargreaves in attendance at the Bull public house. My friend and I, when we had seen the pikes and pistols round the hustings, we went in search of colonel Hargreaves; we did not find him, but left a note for him, that if they wished to make a seizure of pikes and pistols they might take a great number, for all who had sticks or staffs had pikes in the sleeve of the coat, or in the breast, for we had seen a great many, and they were all like that which the colonel took, hooped at the hole end with a strong iron hoop. As soon as night came on, the town was thrown into alarm by the fire bell. I immediately heard the bugle sounding for the military. A cotton factory had got accidentally on fire; but was soon put out, without doing much damage. Whilst I was on the field, I heard a great many say, that if the colonel, that devil, came, they would give him enough; and intimating, at the same time, that they would put him to death. If he had brought up the soldiers, they could not have acted, from the particular situation of the ground. The field is a three-cornered one, with high hedges and walls near it. *****

No. 81.—EXTRACT of a Letter from Sir John Byng to Lord Sidmouth; dated Pontefract, November 18, 1819.

My Lord;—I have the honour to report to your lordship the result of such information as I have received in the several journies I have made since I left town, and from creditable authority in other places. It appears certain that simultaneous meetings had been agreed upon to assemble on the 1st of this month, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, at Carlisle, at Leeds, Halifax, Huddersfield, and Barnsley in the West Riding of Yorkshire; at Manchester, Bolton, Wigan, Blackburn and Burnley in Lancashire; at Newcastle-under-Lyme, at Nottingham, at Leicester, and at Coventry. I have heard other places named, but not from such authority that I can name them in this report; nor do I mention the meetings in London, in Scotland, and in places not in the counties composing the district in which I hold the military command. As meetings had very lately been held in almost all the above-named towns, those agreed upon for the 1st instant must have had some particular object in view. Although a schism among the leaders has prevented these meetings, yet in Lancashire and some few towns where disaffection has long prevailed, no difference appears, and the numbers of discontented remain undiminished; but in places where it is of less mature existence, a most desirable check, from various causes, has been effected; but it would be fatal to its annihilation in them, if there was yet any relaxation of our attention, and of means to suppress it entirely: a similar false security at times within the last three years, has brought disaffection to its present height in Lancashire, the vigilance of the civil authorities in it having ceased upon every short period of quiet. A plan has been adopted to circulate more generally seditious and blasphemous tracts, which is to send gratis such publications weekly, directed to the servants in large families, which I think worthy of mention, not merely to show how indefatigable the authors and leaders of sedition are, in effecting their purpose, but that it may be thought expedient to put the heads of families upon their guard. Six different attempts have come to my knowledge to seduce the soldiers, but without the least effect; some of them are under legal investigation. I have only further to add, that whatever disunion may prevail among the leaders of sedition and radical reform, they still unite in the endeavour (though I hope with less success) to excite irritation and discontent among their followers, and to intimidate the loyal and well-affected. With a firm belief in the accuracy of the foregoing statement, I consider it my duty to make this report. I have, &c.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, November 26.

REFORM IN PARLIAMENT.] Lord John Russell recalled to the recollection of the House, the notice which he had given towards the close of the last session, relative to certain Resolutions, which it was his intention to propose, affecting the borough of Grampound. As it was his present intention to give these resolutions a greater comprehension, he rose for the purpose of renewing that notice, and fixing the 14th of next month for the discussion. He had not yet prepared his resolutions in the precise terms, but their purport was, 1. That it is expedient the borough of Grampound should be disfranchised; 2, that it is expedient the two parliamentary seats now attached to that borough should be transferred to one or two of our populous and unrepresented cities; 3, that it is the duty of the House to consider of the best means to prevent corruption in the smaller boroughs; 4, that when the majority of the voters of a small borough should be found corrupt, that borough should be disfranchised; 5, that it is expedient to add to the number of representatives for large and populous cities. In moving these resolutions, he did not mean to propose a regular plan of parliamentary reform. This notice arose solely from the inquiry conducted last year into the state of the borough of Grampound, and might be considered as its result. A defect had been found in the national representation, which it was his object to correct, and he trusted the House would treat the subject with all the attention which its importance deserved.

ADDRESS ON THE PRINCE REGENT'S SPEECH AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION.] Mr. Somers Cocks brought up the Report of the Address on the Prince Regent's Speech. On the motion that the said report be agreed to,

Sir Robert Wilson rose. He expressed his disinclination to renew a subject which had been for two nights so fully discussed; but it was a question of such national importance, involving principles and consequences so essentially connected with the public welfare and tranquillity, that he felt it an indispensable duty to state his opinion upon it. In appreciation of the blessings enjoyed under the British constitution, he was as sincere as any man in that House; and to the eulogium passed upon it by the hon. member, who moved the Address, in a speech which evidently was the dictate of his own conviction, and not a mere echo to the communication from the throne, he as warmly subscribed. But it had been said, that Paradise was a place with many gates; and in directing the efforts of men to arrive there, too frequently had it happened, that fire and sword were used by those to whom religion should have communicated a purer and more congenial spirit. In politics, as well as in religion, he was one of those who never would meet with coercion those who might differ in opinion as to what they considered the privileges and the rights of that constitution. He was no radical; he objected to the vote by ballot, and thought it inconsistent with universal suffrage: he objected no less to universal suffrage, because if it existed, many of the institutions he had been sworn at the table to support could not be maintained. Yet he did not on that account think that radical reformers were to be placed out of the pale of the constitution. His objection, to their system should never lead him to act upon the Tory doctrine of putting down and coercing those from whom he differed. Such, however, was too frequently the spirit of high Tory politics, and was well portrayed in "The History of Lord Russell's Own Times," by sir R. L'Estrange, where he stated, that a citizen's skull was a pretty thing to try the temper of a soldier's sword on. With respect to the meeting at Manchester, it was undoubtedly a meeting of Radical Reformers. Much had been said of its legality and illegality by many of the hon. members who had preceded in that discussion; indeed, he that spoke now could only pick the gleanings which remained, after the rich harvest of eloquence and argument which adorned and illustrated the debate. If we put ourselves in the situation of the persons in question, we should be inclined to parody the lines of the poet, and say,

"The realm is not my friend, nor the realm's law:

"The realm affords no law to make me rich—

"My poverty and not my will offends."

As to the flags and their devices, an hon. baronet had given that part of the imputation a most decisive and satisfactory answer. By one right hon. and by one learned gentleman, it was contended that numbers constituted illegality. Against that doctrine he solemnly protested. The principle was unknown to the law—it was falsified by the usage of that House. Did he not speak within the knowledge of that House, when he reminded it, that when, on important occasions, petitions were presented by members from public assemblies, the members who presented them uniformly took credit for the numerous attendance of those from whence the petition emanated. He protested against its recognition as law, on the conviction, that, if such a principle were reduced to practice, the right of petition would be destroyed, and what were called the public meetings of the people of England would degenerate into close vestries. But if there was no proof of the illegality of the meeting at Manchester, there was ample evidence that the great body of the people who assembled there had no intention to commit any breach of the peace. They gave that guarantee by the presence of their wives and children; unless, indeed, it was to be argued, that, like the people of an ancient nation, they took with them to the scene of contest those pledges of nature, to animate their ardour, and to invigorate their despair. But there was, in the very disposition of the local circumstances, a proof undeniable that they assembled there with no intention of riot. Was it to be supposed, that if riot or rebellion was contemplated, those persons would have put themselves into a situation where escape was impossible? As they stood on the ground, with detachments of military on every side to hem them in, they were literally in a cul de sac—in a mouse-trap, as it were. Was that the position rioters would have selected for resistance? Escape was impossible, and they were obliged to place themselves at the mercy of the yeomanry. Admitting that the people were acting illegally, that was no reason why they should be cut and trampled down; and all would have been peaceable but for the orders of the magistrates. Nadin himself, the most obnoxious man in the town, admitted that he had received no insult. He did not mean to say, that the magistrates might not have acted on the act of George 1st, in the dispersion of that meeting; but they were bound, if they so acted, to abide by the provisions of the law. The law was tender of the subject's life; it was only in the last extremity that it enforced its penalty.—If the military, as had been stated by the noble lord opposite, acted upon their own discretion, without the orders of the magistracy, they incurred a great responsibility. There was not a more estimable officer in the British army than colonel L'Estrange, whom he knew well, but if he acted on his own discretion in ordering a body of cavalry to advance on men, women, and children which he did not believe, he incurred a great responsibility. His honour required that the subject should be investigated. The yeomanry might have been provoked beyond patience; but that fact, and many others, did not yet appear, though it might if proper evidence were adduced. At present they remained under heavy imputations, and he held in his hand a letter from an individual, on whose veracity he could safely rely, who had himself examined and relieved 121 cases of wounds and injuries, and yet had not seen half the whole number. In a few days he expected to be in possession of a perfect list of the wounded and maimed; and he should be happy to communicate it to ministers, that they might ascertain whether any imposition was contained in it. As to the stress laid upon the rejection of the bills by the grand jury of Lancashire, he believed that they threw out the bills from a misconstruction of their powers, and not from any decision on the merits of the case. The most lamentable part of the whole proceeding, was the precipitate approval of his majesty's ministers. The moment government identified itself with the magistrates by the vote of thanks, the nation did conclude, and had a right to do so, that it identified itself also with the system. In the answer of the Prince Regent to the city of London not one expression even of regret was inserted, while the letters of Mr. Hay and general Byng contained sincere lamentations over the unfortunate occurrences. Every thing showed that ministers intended to pursue a system not of conciliation, but of coercion; founded upon the fatal mistake, that the king of France might have preserved his life and his throne had he adopted measures of greater vigour and firmness. He differed from that opinion; and he had the authority of those who had the best information on the events of that day, that a system of greater severity would have aggravated the horrors of the French Revolution. Coercion had lost Holland to Spain, and St. Domingo to France. If disaffection existed, it arose from misery; and ministers, who acted in so unchristian a spirit as to refuse political liberty to the Catholics on account of religious tenets, ought to be the last to complain that irreligion prevailed in the country. Under all its afflictions and inflictions, the people had evinced unparalleled forbearance. They felt as men and as Englishmen, but they had mastered their resentments, and conquered some of their most inveterate habits. In time of peace they were now called upon to support additional forces; all would be ineffectual, for they dreaded much more the evils they felt than the arms that menaced them. A system of conciliation must be adopted sooner or later, connected with that reform which an enlightened judge on the bench had declared would extirpate corruption from the House, and restore confidence between the people and their representatives. Then might it be said of Great Britain—“Nemo enim illic vitia ridet; nec corrumpere et corrumpi sæculum vocatur.”

Mr. George Lamb said, that his wish was, according to the ordinary courtesy of the House, to have given precedence, after the speech of his hon. and gallant friend, to any gentleman on the opposite side who was anxious to address the House; but having in vain waited for the two previous nights of the discussion for an opportunity to present himself to his notice, he seized the present moment of doing so. One advantage at least had arisen from the adjournment of the debate, that the people would see that notwithstanding the discussion of a former night on what he supposed he must now call the fancied outrage of Manchester, their complaints were at least not dismissed without full discussion. It was rather extraordinary, that while so much labour was exerted to besiege the throne with protestations of loyalty and attachment, an indisposition was manifest to advert to those admitted distresses to which, even in the papers before the House, the discontents of the manufacturing districts were to be attributed. Those distresses were merely glanced at in the address, with the expression of hope that they were temporary—a hope which rested on no avowed, no reasonable grounds. He wished to avoid entering at large into the subject of the proceedings at Manchester, which had so long and so painfully occupied the attention of the House; but there were two circumstances to which he was desirous of alluding (having some means of procuring accurate information), and on which he was distinctly at issue with the noble lord opposite. It happened that he (Mr. Lamb) was near the spot soon after the memorable 16th of August, and from all the information he was able to collect, he decidedly disbelieved the two circumstances stated by the noble lord. He was convinced, first, that no interruption was given to any magistrate in reading the Riot act; secondly, that no attack or resistance was made to the yeomanry, until the latter had raised the cry of “Have at the flags.” This, however, was the time when bold assertion was substituted for inquiry. What one party asserted the other might contradict; and thus they were not likely to come to any conclusion on solid grounds. He hoped that the truth would be elicited, and, when it was, he would cheerfully retract his opinion, if it were an erroneous one; a course equally candid he should expect from the noble lord. A retraction on the part of the noble lord he should be sorry for, because it would go to the crimination of the Manchester magistrates; but he should be glad if circumstances were adduced which would justify a retraction of the opinion he had imbibed, since it would operate as an exculpation of those individuals. He was desirous to call the serious attention of the House to the appalling circumstances in which the whole country, but more especially the town of Manchester, was placed, in consequence of the refusal to inquire into the late proceedings. They were not now to be told, that great irritation existed on the part of those whose friends or relatives had been killed or wounded on that occasion; but even the individuals who had lost their dearest connexions, even the parents who had now to support the maimed offspring, from whom they formerly derived subsistence, even those persons, he believed, notwithstanding the efforts of the turbulent and seditious demagogues, who endeavoured to inflame the minds of the people at public meetings, had looked forward with some degree of confidence to the meeting of that House. They had indulged themselves in the hope, that parliament would meet and inquire into the whole of these proceedings for the purpose of affording them redress; but now they were to learn that that hope was fallacious, that they were to be disappointed in their honest expectation. What, then, would they first have recourse to? They would look to the debates of that House, and there they would expect to find some decided reason promulgated, some important circumstance stated, which would prove that inquiry was unnecessary, or mischievous. But what had the noble lord said? what had he, the polar star, by which the majorities of that House guided their course, thought proper to declare? He had told the House, in an after-statement, that the magistrates ordered the military to disperse the people; but he had not ventured to say, that they directed violence and cruelty to be exercised. Many observations were made with respect to the policy of employing that species of force denominated yeomen; but there were other considerations connected with this part of the subject, which had been but lightly touched on, and which he would briefly notice. The regular soldiery had no home but where they were ordered; in the event of any conflict with the populace, their removal put an end to all vindictive feeling. But a yeomanry force were connected by local circumstances with the place—they could not withdraw themselves—there they were doomed to live, held up to the abhorrence of the lower orders, for the act in which they had been engaged. These were sad reflections, and he would on that point say no more. The people of Manchester were told, that although inquiry was refused in that House, yet an indictment was preferred against Hunt; they were informed that they might look to that proceeding; they might attend to the progress of that trial, and there they would find a full justification of all that had been done. The people would naturally ask “who are the prosecutors of the indictment?” The answer was, the magistrates,—the very persons who were parties in the transaction complained of. In what he was going to observe, he was sure the attorney-general would not suppose that he had any intention of throwing a shade of doubt on the purity and propriety by which his conduct would be guided. But he would suppose this indictment to be preferred against a number of persons, A. B. and C., by a common prosecutor. If that prosecutor could not make out the case, without stating facts that must criminate himself, he would ask whether it was not very likely that he would let those persons escape, rather than disclose such facts? That was the point of view in which he could not help considering those prosecutions. The legal gentlemen on the other side of the House ought to have stated on what particular ground this transaction was to be brought before a legal tribunal, instead of being subjected to a general inquiry in that House. One thing was most certain, namely, that with respect to his majesty's ministers, no inquiry here or elsewhere could justify the part they had taken. Between the conduct of the magistrates and the yeomanry there might be a very great difference one of those bodies only might have acted improperly, and the evidence of the one might exculpate the other. But ministers had embraced the whole case, they had identified themselves with it, and which ever party was guilty, they could not be innocent. One passage in the papers before the House, showed that the people could not procure redress by any proceeding at law. It was there stated, that the distress and pressure of the times occasioned those meetings. If it were so, and no man could doubt it, how could those distressed impoverished people go into a court of law to seek redress for the injuries that had been inflicted on them? The answer was, that a subscription was set on foot in the metropolis for that purpose. It was most extraordinary, that this subscription, which had been spoken of by the ministerial press as the off-scouring of the Jacobin purse, should at length be recognized as the only means by which the people had a chance of procuring legal redress! Under the sanction of the gentlemen on the other side, who had disclosed this fact, guided and directed by them, he should now, most certainly, contribute his mite to that subscription; and, in his opinion, those gentlemen were bound in justice to contribute also. They stated, that a court of law was the only place in which redress could be obtained, and he thought they ought to afford the means of attaining it. In those who censured the late proceedings, to subscribe was an act of humanity and kindness; but with respect to the individuals who approved of them, it was nothing more than an act of justice and consistency. Gentlemen opposite might laugh, but he was perfectly serious. If they disliked the subscription which was now in progress, and would not give any thing in aid of it, they might set up a subscription of their own, and he would assist it most willingly. He thought it would be very well worth the while of the majority of that House to show, by a liberal contribution, by a free use of their purses, that they entertained a degree of feeling and sympathy for the sufferings of the people, which their vote seemed to imply they did not possess. He should not be doing his duty if he did not point out to ministers some means by which the ferment in the public mind might be allayed. He was opposed to violent measures, and besought ministers to have recourse to kindness and conciliation. With respect to the Manchester magistrates, it had happened to him to have lived for years in connexion with that body. He was acquainted with some of them, who, he would say, were most respectable men. Of one of them, his learned friend Mr. Norris, the resident stipendiary magistrate, he could declare that, in his opinion, a more kind-hearted man did not walk the earth. If the proceedings of the 16th of August were authorized by him—if his judgment were not overruled by the opinion of those with whom he acted—then must Mr. Norris have changed his nature on that day. The House had heard complaints of the seditious press; but it was not surprising that strong language should be used by the press when circumstances of a most unprecedented nature had taken place. They had seen proceedings before the coroner carried on in a manner perfectly novel. Those proceedings had terminated for the present, and certainly demanded investigation. They had also witnessed another very extraordinary circumstance; they had seen a magistrate taking on himself the two distinct offices of judge and jury. A person complained that he had been wounded by a shot from a pistol:

the magistrate heard both sides, and declared the accused party to be innocent. He should be surprised, indeed, if any legal gentleman, in or out of that House, would venture to say, that the case of Meagher, the trumpeter, whatever defence that individual might have made on his trial, was an unfit one to be submitted to a jury for their decision. He implored ministers to exert every means by which the irritated feelings of the people might be soothed—to restore that even balance of justice which once distinguished this country; or, at least, not to suffer it to be wanting in appearance, if it did not exist in reality. Next came the consideration of the measures that were to be adopted. The House was, it seems, to be called on in a time of peace, to increase the military forces, and to agree to coercive bills of various descriptions. It would be wonderful if, in the course of the debate, they had not heard any observations on the glories of the late war. It was now time, he conceived, that they should have something to say about the blessings of peace. Barren, naked glory, however showey and attractive, never could be considered a sufficient exchange for the welfare of a great nation. What had the late glorious war produced? It had procured for England an abundance of barren glory, and all those gagging-bills, which, having originated when this country was engaged in hostilities, were now, in a time of profound peace to be renewed. In the latter years of the war—he meant, during that period when our armies were under the conduct of that great general, of whom every Englishman boasted, and who, as he had fought for the independence of other countries would, he hoped, always be found the defender of the rights and liberties of his own—in those years all that could be done was, to repair the disasters previously incurred. But the war commenced with another object. It commenced for the purpose of destroying republican principles, and suppressing doctrines which were said to be subversive of all legitimate authority. Could the country boast of having achieved that object? He would not himself answer the question; he would borrow the answer from the address that had been recently read, in which it was stated, that republican principles, that even the doctrine of atheism itself, teemed in every street, and in every shop more plentifully than they did before the war was entered into. He thought that the House had in a great degree lost the confidence of the country; and that confidence could only be restored by giving a share in the representative system to all those who assisted in supporting the state. There was another evil of still greater magnitude—the loss of confidence in all public men. This, he thought, arose entirely from the conduct of his majesty's ministers, and their adherents. When they entered on their career, they found themselves not perhaps quite bankrupts, but exceedingly deficient in popularity. What was their conduct? He would not say that they used any base acts to procure popularity. No; of them it could not be observed, "gaudent nimium popularibus auris." But he would assert, that for several years their speeches had been all directed to one object, that of reducing every public man to a level with themselves. They had unfortunately succeeded in their efforts, and were, indeed, the worst of levellers. One prayer he earnestly made to them. It was stated in the address to the throne, and it was the only consolatory passage which that address contained, that the great bulk of the population did not appear to be infected with the dangerous doctrines in question. He conjured ministers to pause before they insulted that loyal majority by proposing any measures calculated to throw suspicion on them;—he conjured them to pause before they deprived the well-disposed of the proofs and arguments which the constitution, while it was preserved inviolate, would always afford to combat sedition and disaffection.

Mr. Booth Wilbraham felt that some apology was necessary for again addressing the House on the subject of the proceedings at Manchester, on which he had already declared his opinion; but an hon. member had on a former evening made several observations on the speech he had delivered, which he conceived himself bound to answer. He would not say what were the motives of that large body of men (at the smallest computation 30,000), in assembling together; the idea of their leaders was, perhaps, only to review their army, and to excite that degree of intimidation in the public mind, which such congregated numbers were calculated to produce. When he spoke of their object being plunder, he did not mean to use the word in its ordinary sense. His meaning was precisely expressed in the address of the chairman and grand jury at Chester, about a fortnight after the occurrence took place. The statement, which was unanimously agreed to by every person present, set forth that "whatever may be the real object of those who have obtained influence over the minds of the misguided, it appears that the object of the lower classes is no other than to destroy the orders of society so long established, to wrest, by force, from its present possessors, and to divide among them, the landed property of the country." On another point he also wished to set himself right. The hon. member had objected to the correctness of the account he had produced relative to the persons wounded. That statement was taken from an official paper sent to him from Manchester. In that account the number of out-patients was not included, which, he believed, amounted to 38, or thereabouts. He now had an official report dated the 20th of October, which contained an account of 26 in-patients, admitted to the infirmary in consequence of the proceedings of the 16th of August. In consequence of a riot which took place on the night of the 16th, some other persons were brought in. Amongst others who were hurt on that evening, was an unfortunate man, a Greenwich pensioner; who, having acted as a special constable, was pursued into a house by a number of persons, and so severely ill-treated, that he died in a few days. As to the statement, that an attack was made on the yeomanry before they molested the people, he believed it to be perfectly correct. He had examined all the evidence, and he was borne out in saying, that an attack was made on the yeomanry before they assailed the populace. In order that they might not injure the people, the yeomanry advanced in single files, and were immediately closed upon and surrounded. After taking an impartial view of the subject, all the circumstances proved to him the extreme impropriety of this case being taken up by the House. It was alone in a court of law that the evidence could be fairly adduced, and properly examined. Some gentlemen had expressed a wish that the magistrates should be dismissed. Such a dismissal would cast a slur on their character, and would be severely felt. Many of them were gentlemen of independent fortune, and had performed most meritorious services. For months after months they had preserved the public peace, at the risk of life and property. Though they had met with hard treatment in that House, such was not the case with respect to those who knew them, who had seen their conduct, and who were therefore the best judges of it. In an address from the town of Manchester to the Prince Regent signed by all the respectable inhabitants, the conduct of the magistrates was spoken of in the highest terms of praise.

Mr. Denman observed, that as a challenge had been thrown out to all those gentlemen who were connected with the legal profession, calling on them to state their sentiments on the subject of the meeting at Manchester, he felt it a duty which he owed to himself—a duty which he could not pass over, to declare to the House the opinion he had formed with respect to the legality of that meeting. He trusted he should stand excused for not accepting the challenge at the time it was thrown out, for, if he had proceeded to address the House at two o'clock in the morning, it was easy to anticipate the way in which such an entertainment would have been received, after a debate of 20 hours. He conceived that the meeting was perfectly legal, and that it was improperly dispersed. It was a most momentous subject, a subject that never would be exhausted, until the House granted a full inquiry. He had attended that evening with much inconvenience to himself, in order, on the motion of which notice had been given by the noble lord opposite, to assist in endeavouring to persuade the House to do its duty, by instituting an inquiry. As, however, the noble lord had deferred his notice until Tuesday, he should postpone any detailed observations to that day. All that he would now say was, that he could never concur in the address until he should be convinced of the necessity of the measures to which it referred, and until the greatest grievance of which the people of England ever had to complain—not merely the establishment of a military despotism, but, which was much more alarming, an attempt to maintain that military despotism was consistent with English law and justice—had been thoroughly investigated. Nor could he concur in an address which, overlooking all considerations of humanity, abstained from the expression of regret at the melancholy occurrences which had taken place. Whatever motive might have influenced his majesty's ministers to withhold the expression of their regret at the time of those occurrences, there could be no reason why the House of Commons should not now express its regret that the blood of their fellow-subjects had been shed. He really thought, that at least it was highly fitting to accompany a declaration of the necessity of farther restrictions on the liberty of the people, by an assurance of protection in the uninterrupted enjoyment of the rights still left to them.

Mr. Shepherd considered himself bound, by every sense of justice, to resist the amendment proposed, because he thought it would be most unjust to the magistrates, who had acted meritoriously, if they were harassed by vexatious proceedings. It would be, in his opinion, most inexpedient to enter into an inquiry in that House, because, whatever the result might be, such a course would operate to the disadvantage of the magistrates. The feeling of the public mind, if an inquiry were instituted here, would be, in the very first instance, that the magistrates were guilty. It had been said, that the Riot act was not read, and that the yeomanry attacked the people before any resistance was made. Now, it was immaterial whether the yeomanry did or did not assail the people first, nor was it of any importance, whether the Riot act was read or not, because the meeting was, ab initio, illegal. The reading of the Riot act would only aggravate the offence, and give to that, which, in the first instance, was an unlawful assembly, the character of a felonious offence. The meeting was, in point of law, a riot; and a meeting of that description had ever been considered a great offence, by men of the first eminence on the bench. His hon. and learned friend had risen to state his reason for thinking the meeting legal, but he had not advanced one. He did not argue the question, whether the meeting was legal or not. What his hon. and learned friend had said was mere assertion; and in opposition to his assertion, he would place the opinions of lord Holt and Mr. Justice Foster. The former of them had said, that any number of men who assembled in terrorem populi, were guilty of a riot, even though they were without arms, affront to that exemplary nobleman; and for which he contended ministers were entitled to the thanks of every honest man.

Mr. Wilberforce rose, for the purpose of correcting a mistake which he understood had gone abroad, relative to some observations made by him when he delivered his opinions on this question. He was made to say, that the great meeting lately assembled at Manchester had it in contemplation to keep together until night, and then to burn the town. He had never said any such thing: he recollected well what he had said. It was this. In the evidence which was offered to a committee of the House two years ago, it was stated that the leaders of a meeting, which had then been in contemplation, had intended to have waited till evening, and then to have set the town on fire at once in various places, in order to profit by the confusion and devastation which would have been created. It was also in evidence, that their reason for entertaining such intentions was, that a rate would have been laid on the county, to make good the damage done, and that such rate would have excited general discontent and dissatisfaction. He had said, that it was proper that the magistrates, who knew of such a scheme being once in contemplation, should be upon their guard to prevent its execution, whenever large meetings were assembled by the same or similar leaders. It had also been asserted in the course of the debate, that he had warmly defended the conduct of the magistrates; he was not prepared to defend, any more than he was to attack them; but he had said, that it would require a strong case to be made out, in order to justify such a measure as was proposed in the amendment. The conduct of the magistracy of the country, whose eulogium a right hon. friend of his had so eloquently pronounced on a former evening, was not to be lightly questioned. If there was any one body of people to whom the public were particularly indebted, it was to the magistracy of the country. They not only owed to them the great obligation of preserving the peace and supporting the laws of the country, but also that habitual disposition to obey the laws which was to be found in the people of England. This spirit was created by the impartiality as well as the readiness with which justice could always be obtained in the country; and therefore to institute an inquiry into their conduct would be to cast a slur upon them, which would be productive of most injurious consequences. It was admitted, that in the courts below justice would be done. But if the investigation were to be instituted in that House, the effect would be, to injure the character of the House, and to increase the discontent of the people. He was, therefore of opinion, that without urgent, imperious, irresistible necessity, the House ought not to institute any inquiry, because it would be imputing great blame to the persons concerned in the transactions in question, and still more, because, instead of improving the character of the House, and endearing it to the country, such an inquiry would have the effect of rendering it more suspected, and more unpopular with those who regarded its conduct in general with suspicion. But there was a mode pointed out by a right hon. gentleman near him, which was free from party feelings; that mode was, by trials in courts of justice. There the testimony given, was given upon oath; there the truth was developed and sifted out; there justice would be done to all parties, and by a body regarded by all with love and veneration, instead of a body which was become the object of aversion, suspicion, and censure. Although he agreed that it was infinitely desirable that the people should be taught to look up to that House as those who would redress their grievances, yet the circumstances to be inquired into were so various and so much connected with individuals (so much indeed, that there were as many varieties of cases as there were individuals concerned), that he could not consider the House the proper place for inquiry. A right hon. gentleman had animadverted upon the omission in the address of any expression of regret for the occurrences at Manchester. He did not think that the omission was improper. No person would have considered himself indebted to them for any regret they might express. There was no man there who did not from his soul lament those transactions. If that House were to state their sentiments, one by one, all would agree in lamenting them. If there were any who were not deeply hurt at them, they were those who looked upon slaughter and civil war as the natural regeneration of the country, and regarded the overthrow of religion and the law, and all the institutions to which we owed our soin his opinion, be more grateful to the sufferers, than all the mouthing speeches of the hon. gentlemen in their behalf. He had heard that an hon. baronet opposite had adopted several families who had been made orphans at Manchester. If so, it was highly to his honour; and he thought that it would be highly to the honour of other gentlemen if they would imitate so bright an example, and would not merely content themselves with making long speeches. He was against instituting a parliamentary inquiry into the conduct of the magistrates for various reasons. How could the House interfere if it were proved that a man was maimed or trampled on? Could it commit for trial, as the Court of King's-bench could do? If pecuniary damage had been inflicted, could it order the party inflicting it to make pecuniary compensation? By no means. The inquiry would therefore be useless to all intents and purposes. He should not, however, object so much to such an inquiry, if he thought it merely useless; but, in his opinion, it would be unjust, as it would disclose the cases of the individuals in question, which might afterwards be met in the courts of law by the foulest subornation and perjury. It would excite a prejudice on the subject, and that prejudice might be assigned as a ground for postponing their trials. As to the argument that the prejudice would be rather the other way, namely, in favour of the individuals accused, it appeared to him to be a very clumsy one. What he wished was, that there should be no prejudice either one way or the other; that the scales of justice should be held with perfect evenness. A great deal had been said of the evils that had occurred at Manchester. He was very sorry for them. He believed that several lives had been lost, and that a number of persons had been maimed. But to whom was all that attributable? In his conscience he believed it might be justly ascribed to the hon. gentlemen opposite; who had promulgated doctrines and stated opinions calculated to make an undue impression on the public mind. The country was continually told that ministers levied taxes for the purpose of putting the produce in their own pockets. The gentlemen who made such statements were accountable for the mischief produced by them; and he hoped that they would assist in averting the evils which they caused. If such statements were true, let them be proved. If it was true that the people would have meat, drink, shoes, and cloathing in abundance, were it not for placemen, pensioners, and sinecurists, let the fact be established; if false, those who were the authors of such statements, ought in fairness to come forward and disabuse the people. Let them inform the people of Manchester, or any other people, who held such opinions, that 20 years revenue of those expenses would not serve to purchase them a breakfast. There was another point to which he wished to refer, but not seeing an hon. member in his place, he did not wish to say any thing to which there could not be a contradiction given. The necessity of inquiry had been urged on the ground, that the magistrates would come out of it without any imputation of blame. Was there ever such a doctrine heard? Did any one ever hear it urged to a grand jury, that a true bill ought to be found against a man for a rape, or for murder, of which he was supposed innocent, for the purpose of giving him an opportunity of showing that he could handle the burning ploughshare without injury? The grand jury would answer the dolt who made the proposal, that they who were sworn to our sovereign lord the king to do justice to all parties, could not find a bill on such grounds. Such laws as this reminded him of a court formerly held at Rome, to try whether a man was a saint or not. On that occasion the devil had an agent, who pleaded against the miracles of the saint, but there was no advocate on the other side. He hoped a fairer trial would be granted on this occasion. It had been remarked, that in the thanks which had been given to the magistrates, no regret had been expressed for the lives lost on the occasion. It would be inconsistent to express such thanks, the idea was ridiculous. What! were they to suppose that the father of his people did not regret the loss of their lives on such occasions? The thing was self-evident, and it would have been bad taste to insert any such expression. After some observations on the dismissal of earl Fitzwilliam, the hon. member concluded by supporting the original Address. The hon. member concluded his speech by some remarks on lord Sidmouth's letter of thanks to the magistrates, and on the dismissal of earl Fitzwilliam from the lord-lieutenancy of the West Riding of Yorkshire, which, he maintained, was not an

Mr. Wilberforce rose, for the purpose of correcting a mistake which he understood had gone abroad, relative to some observations made by him when he delivered his opinions on this question. cial security and happiness, as the means of accomplishing their wishes. At the same time, he thought some declaration or other should be made, explaining whether they could alleviate the distress and improve the condition of the poor. He thought that, if employment could be provided for a certain number of them, the demand which that would create for various things would have a beneficial effect upon all other classes of the community. He thought it possible, by some such means, to improve the condition of the suffering portion of the people. It was a duty which must be felt by all, but especially by those in high offices (although from the responsibility of their situation they must be anxious to avoid exciting expectations which would only increase the severity of the storm), to do all that was possible for relieving the distresses of the laborious poor. There were ways by which their condition might be considerably relieved. Some general declaration, therefore, of that disposition of mind, which, no doubt, was felt by all, and especially by his majesty's ministers, might be proper and useful. By increasing the employment of the industrious poor, they would be brought into a situation in which they would be supported by their own labour, and their personal characters would be improved. The dependence for partial or entire support upon parochial aid tended to the injury of the public interest, and to the injury and deterioration of the personal character of the poor. He had been drawn aside unintentionally into those observations. He felt indeed at this time somewhat of the feeling of a noble lord, he meant lord Falkland, who put on mourning at the beginning of the civil war, and walked backwards and forwards, sighing and groaning, and often repeating the word "Peace!" He felt some difficulty in expressing his feelings. His views on certain points were not popular there, nor were they matter of popular feeling. When he heard in that House the one side charging the other with weakness and with wickedness, he saw a danger of people beginning to believe this. It was a persuasion produced upon his mind by irresistible force, for he was a rooted enemy to party, that many of the evils which we now suffered had arisen from the effects of party. There was not a single individual in that House whom he did not believe to have the benefit of the people in view. There was a certain understanding about several sentiments and expressions there, which was not received abroad, and which produced effects in other places very different from their original intention. He admitted that there might be much truth in what a right hon. gentleman had said of the benefit of parties in a free country; but he would not enter into that question. His intention in rising was, to vindicate himself into that question. His intention in rising was, to vindicate himself from stating what he really had not stated; but he could not avoid saying, that it would be an unspeakable comfort to his own mind, if they could all join in remedying evils which they all felt, and endeavour most diligently to counteract principles subversive of all social happiness. The attack now made upon religion was no slight way of attacking this or that particular mode, but a sapping of the very foundation of it. When they considered this—when they considered that, instead of respecting, as it had been well said, the very columns on which the edifice of society rested, those columns were attacked with unsparing wickedness, it became all who regarded the well-being of the community, to unite in defence of what had proved at all times the safeguard and protection of moral goodness and social happiness. It was necessary to join in applying the alternative which our political disease required. It was necessary to join in preserving institutions and principles by which the character of the people had been so far improved—principles and institutions which were made, not for the benefit of particular individuals, but for the benefit of the whole country. The bulk of the people in general were interested in maintaining the rights of property and the principles of religion—principles in their nature sound and sincere, and in their effects prosperous and happy.

Lord Stanley said, he was anxious to make some observations on what had been circulated relative to the late proceedings at Manchester as well as upon the proceedings of the grand jury of Lancaster. The station which he held as foreman of that grand jury made it necessary that he should speak upon the latter subject. He had expected to hear observations made in that House, upon the conduct of the grand jury—such as he knew had been made elsewhere. He was happy to find that no such observations had been made in that House. Observations had however been made elsewhere, reflecting severely upon their conduct. Even the learned judge in the Crown court, had permitted himself to utter expressions from the bench which were an indirect censure upon the conduct of the grand jury. A bill had been thrown out by them against a person who was afterwards tried upon the coroner's inquest, and found guilty of manslaughter. It might have occurred to the learned judge, that by the skill and practice in which he had grown old, he could extract the truth from ignorant and reluctant witnesses with more success than had attended the grand jury. The learned judge had asked the witnesses whether they had been examined before the grand jury; but though all the witnesses had been before them, all the evidence might not have been produced. A gallant general had said, that the grand jury could be proved to have thrown out bills upon a misconstruction of their powers. How could the gallant general know this? He did not believe that any one member of the grand jury could have divulged any thing against his oath; and from the consideration that they were restrained by their oaths from disclosing what took place there, he would not allow himself to make any observations upon this subject. He knew them personally, and most of them were personal friends of his own; and from his knowledge of them he could say, that they had acted, not from certain chance opinions, but upon grounds which they conscientiously believed to be correct. He would now pass over that part of the subject. Upon the question now before the House, which was whether the address should go up to the throne, although he wished that the address had contained something further, yet he could not deny what had come under his observation and knowledge, what they had on their table, and under their eyes from him. These things called for some measures to meet what the present laws were not sufficient to put down, what he confessed existed in his own country—atheism, blasphemy, and disaffection, to the greatest degree—he had almost said, to the borders of rebellion; but till the case should be fully made out, he could not pledge himself to any particular measure. Not having been able to deliver his sentiments when the question was before the House, he should take that opportunity of stating why he had supported the amendment to the address. He had done so, not because he had disapproved of the address, but because the address had not gone far enough. A right hon. gentlemen had said that inquiry was inconsistent with what he called the wholesome harshness of the amendment. He could not agree in that opinion. It was the duty of the House, if there was no other channel, to inquire when the lives of his majesty's subjects were lost, and particularly in such a case as this, when ministers put a speech into the mouth of his Royal Highness without any mention of what took place in Manchester; passing it over like an every day occurrence: was that the conclusion which the events of Manchester warranted? He would not venture to go into the consideration whether the meeting had been legal or illegal. He felt very considerable doubt upon that subject. He was certain, however, knowing the magistrates at Manchester as he did, at least many of them, that they would not have done what they did not consider themselves justified in doing. With respect to the yeomen, he was enabled by themselves to disclaim and deny many things that had been imputed to them. Several statements which had been made, he knew from his own knowledge to be incorrect: among these was one, which represented that the Manchester yeomanry cavalry had sent their swords to be sharpened for the purpose of cutting with them at the meeting. His own opinion was against the probability of that statement; but he had fortunately got what amounted to a complete disproof of it. He did not mean to say that the swords had not been sharpened, but every thing depended upon the time when, and the cause from which, they were sharpened. He had a letter from the individual who commanded on that occasion, an individual whom he was happy to have heard alluded to with respect in this debate. A more mild and more humane person did not exist. That individual said—"If any blame attaches for sharpening the swords, I must take it all to myself. At drill a sabre was drawn to screw a flint, and seeing the state it was in, I looked at the sabres, and finding them not serviceable, I directed them to be taken to the cutler's and put in order." Fortunately for captain Birley, this matter was taken notice of by a paper certainly not very favourable to the yeomanry corps. It was mentioned in the Manchester Observer of the 10th of July, five weeks before the meeting at Manchester took place. The order to the yeomanry to hold themselves in readiness to assist the civil power, if necessary, was issued on the 13th July, so that the circumstance of the swords being ordered to be sharpened was noticed in The Manchester Observer three days before the yeomanry cavalry knew that they were to be put upon such a service. It was also urged, as matter of objection, that the Manchester yeomanry ought not to have been employed. He could assure the House that, as he was informed, this arose from pure accident. A corps of the Manchester yeomanry, the 15th hussars, and the Cheshire yeomanry, were stationed at one side of St. Peter's-field, and a part of the Manchester yeomanry on the other. Orders were issued to bring some of the troops round to the point where the constables were stationed, and the Manchester yeomanry being the first moved forward. The crowd was so great that doubts were expressed whether the civil power could be effectually aided without some additional troops. The officer who commanded the yeomanry, seeing an open space leading to the hustings, near the line of constables, and fearing from the motion of the crowd, that it would be blocked up, pushed forward to occupy it. At this time there was no obstruction, and the soldiers advanced six abreast, until they got rather nearer the hustings. Here the line of constables was broken by the crowd, who, however, retired, and made way for the trumpeter, officer, and first part of the body. In a short time, however, the crowd closed, and obliged the remainder of the troop to move forwards towards the hustings in single files, contrary to the wish of the commanding officer, but the reason why the yeomanry did so was to avoid riding over the people.—Some followed the officer directly up to the hustings, while others went round, by which means the cart was surrounded, and the warrant of the magistrates executed. At this period, considerable tumult prevailed, and a struggle ensued between the constables and those persons in the cart, who wished to save the caps of liberty, banners, &c. Some of those who resisted were taken into custody, and the soldiers cut with their sabres at the flag-staffs. In doing this, it was possible that some persons had been hurt, but not intentionally. This was an answer to those who stated that the yeomanry cut right and left in their approach to the hustings. It had been lately the practice to post up in the windows of The Manchester Observer the names of the persons wounded, and also the names of those soldiers by whom wounds were said to have been inflicted. Among others, the name of captain Birley was frequently mentioned. Now the fact was, that captain Birley had, according to his own statement, never taken his sword from his shoulder, unless to make way for two poor women who were oppressed by the crowd. If that gentleman had seen the soldiery commit any of the acts so often talked of, he (lord Stanley) had no doubt that he would have exerted himself to put a stop to them. He understood from that gentleman that the real state of the case was, that a part of the yeomanry, when they had approached towards the hustings, were separated from the rest—that the individuals so separated from the rest were closed in on, and then assailed with stones and sticks, in consequence of which some of them faced round, in order to defend themselves. The situation in which these individuals were placed was perceived by the magistrates, who, on seeing what was going forward, thought it their duty, without delay, to order colonel l'Estrange to move forward troops in support of them. On seeing this confusion about the hustings, and the perilous situation of the yeomanry and constables, the expression of the magistrate, who ordered colonel l'Estrange to move forward, was, "for God's sake save the yeomanry!" They did save the yeomanry, and the crowd was in a very short time dispersed. But an hon. gentleman behind him had been misinformed, when he stated that there was no avenues for the escape of the crowd, but those occupied by the troops.—The great and leading street of Peter-street was open for them to disperse by, as no cavalry came that way. In addition to that, there were many minor streets open, though they were not all so broad as Peter-street, and at a good many corners, the mob, by closing up, created obstacles to getting on. Such was the impression on his mind, with regard to the statement of that gentleman whom he had just mentioned. With respect to the legality or illegality of the meeting, he could form no fixed opinion on that point, because he was not possessed of a sufficiency of facts to guide him. For that very reason it was that he wished for inquiry. With regard to what had been said by the noble lord opposite, the opinion of that noble lord was founded, no doubt, on facts known only to the government, and which could not be supposed to be known to himself, or those who were in the same situation with himself. He certainly felt a great anxiety to hear those statements on that subject, which they had been taught to expect. In the mean time he would say, he had that confidence in the magistrates, that, however hasty in some respects, and however injudicious in other respects, he might think them, he yet thought they would not have adopted such a course as was adopted, if they had not been convinced of its legality. He had no hesitation in saying, that he should prefer an inquiry in the courts of law, thinking, with many members of this House, that the courts of law were more proper, in many respects, for it, than the House of Commons, partly, because the inquiry could only be carried on in the latter on parole evidence. But he confessed that he was in doubt whether it could be so carried on. It had been said, "Look at the case of Coventry; there the court of King's-bench has directed the matter to be investigated." It was thence inferred, that a similar proceeding would take place if the transactions at Manchester were brought before it. But at Coventry no lives had been lost, whilst at Manchester the result was unfortunately very different. If the court of King's-bench should be of opinion that the matter would involve questions of felony, it would probably refuse to grant a criminal information. The judges of that court would refuse to take cognizance of it in that form of proceeding. The consequence might be, if the House relied on that particular course, that a subject admitted to be of great importance, not only to the unfortunate sufferers, but as it affected the constitution, would be passed over as completely sub silentio as it was in the address. Somewhere or other an inquiry ought to be made. From one end of the country to the other

he saw only one opinion on the subject. There was hardly a part of the country where a portion of the people at least did not call out loudly for inquiry. He confessed that he thought the House were bound to show some deference to the public opinion. He was compelled to declare his own private opinion that inquiry was necessary, and that he thought the House ought at some time or other to enter on the subject. A great authority (Mr. Burke) had said, that even the imaginary grievances of the people ought to be inquired into. And if it turned out that the people were, on the occasion in question, exercising a constitutional right, he hoped the House would show that even the excellent character of the magistrates of Manchester should not screen them from the consequences of their acts.

Mr. Philips bore testimony to the high esteem in which captain Birley was held by all who knew him. He had universally the character of a most humane gentleman.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the Manchester yeomanry fully participated in the feelings of the noble lord who had just sat down. They were also desirous of inquiry, because they were assured that its result would be to relieve them from that weight of calumny under which they had hitherto laboured. An inquiry conducted before the House would, however, as he conceived, be contrary to every sound principle of judicature. He would not now go into any argument with respect to the nature of the meeting, or assign any reason why in his opinion the facts ought not to be inquired into by the House. He must say, however, that he was rather at a loss to conceive what statement of facts the noble lord who had given notice of a motion on the subject for Tuesday next, and an hon. and learned gentleman opposite, who had signified his intention of arguing the legality of the late meeting at Manchester, were prepared to bring forward to satisfy the House of the necessity of such an inquiry. But he rose now to congratulate the House that an individual, who represented that great county where the proceedings so often alluded to took place, and who was the son of the individual charged with the king's commission in that county, and he was sure he only spoke the sentiments of admiration of that nobleman common to all who had the honour to be acquainted with the manner in which he discharged his official duties, when he said, that a brighter example could not be set than that of lord Derby—he rose, he said, to congratulate the House and the country that they had heard from the individual in the House most competent to give them information on the subject, who on this occasion had stript himself of all prejudices in the view of the public, not wishing to inflict any injustice on his majesty's ministers (indeed he must say, that he had never given any other than the most constitutional opposition to them), a statement of the utmost consequence with respect to the transactions at Manchester. Having voted for the proposition for inquiry, submitted the other night to the House, but which had not received their sanction, the noble lord had now come forward from a love of justice to discharge a debt, he would not say of gratitude, but a debt of justice to men who were suffering under unmerited obloquy. He did not wish to weaken the statement of the noble lord, but merely to allude briefly to what were the leading features of a transaction which had been represented in the light of a bloody massacre. But if he knew the country right, it would now be filled with indignation against those who had represented the transaction in that light; and if his countrymen were apt, and in his opinion they were but too apt, to take a severe view of a transaction before they could be possessed of sufficient information respecting it, there was something at the same time in the breasts of Englishmen to make the tide turn rapidly in favour of those whom, on mistaken information, they had been led prematurely and wrongfully to condemn. These yeomanry troops had been represented as charging an unarmed mob, and in the outset being guilty of the most unprovoked violence and cruelty. It now appeared, however, that they went up to the hustings by the only way by which they could get access, and in the manner least calculated to injure the people. They went up where they did, because they saw that the constables had so placed themselves as to leave an avenue for them to pass through; and they went into the crowd at the moment they did, because, when they arrived on the ground, they thought there was an opening for them. What was further the fact? When they arrived at that part of the ground, where an arrangement, it was said, had been deliberately made to keep the enemy out, they had so much coolness and presence of mind as to go in single files to surround the hustings. It was also stated, that captain Birley, so far from acting in the manner he was stated to have acted in, had, on the contrary, endeavoured to extricate women from the perilous position in which they were, a position in which women of this country had for the first time placed themselves. It appeared that captain Birley and the six yeomen immediately succeeding him were separated and cut off from their associates, and then attacked with stones. Then, and then, only had troops been ordered to support the persons who were thus endangered, by being cut off from the rest of the body. The noble lord had delivered the House and the country from all the delusion which had been so sedulously propagated on the subject; and had exonerated the magistrates and yeomanry from the calumnies which had been so industriously circulated and also from another calumny, of the streets being closed against the mob. Never was any thing so false. So far from this being the case, the magistrates actually withdrew the cavalry from the opposite side of the square, that they might not be an obstacle to the dispersing. But it was in order to carry terror and intimidation into loyal breasts, and to leave them exposed to violence, that these calumnies were directed rather against the yeomanry than against the king's troops. It had happened here as usual, that the supporting force was obliged to act with more activity than the force which was surrounded. Could there be a more striking illustration of this, than the magistrates saying, "For God's sake save the Yeomanry." He saw them in the midst of the crowd, and in peril. He was sure the House were satisfied, and also that the public feeling would now be satisfied on this question. He did not think with the noble lord however that it was necessary the House should go into an inquiry on this question, in order to rescue the magistrates and yeomanry from the torrent of unfair prejudice by which they had been assailed. He was confident the debates in parliament on this subject, and above all the speech of the noble lord, had placed them in a situation which rendered this unnecessary. He trusted that the country would now see cause to give credit to those magistrates for what ought never to be denied to men in their situation, and presume them innocent till the contrary was proved. All he asked of his countrymen was, not to run them unfairly down, but to believe them innocent till something was established against them. The noble lord by his explanation not only satisfied the claims of justice, but had done a signal benefit to his country by removing the disgraceful and foul calumnies attempted to be thrown on persons who undertook an arduous duty for public advantage, without any reward or consideration for their services, for doing that which they could have had no earthly object for doing but the due administration of the law of the land.

Lord Stanley expressed his thanks to the noble lord for the manner in which he had spoken of the services of his father, and what he had chosen to say of himself. The noble lord, however, seemed to labour under a little mistake. He appeared to represent him as vouching for the truth of the statements which he had made. As far as he had expressed his own opinion, he had no hesitation in saying he had that opinion of the magistrates, he did not believe they would act illegally;—but when he particularly alluded to the conduct of the yeomanry cavalry, he certainly stated he spoke from information received from that very yeomanry cavalry themselves. He had stated, indeed, at the same time, that he thought so highly of captain Birley, he was convinced, in his own mind, that gentleman would make no statement which was not correctly true. At the same time, he wished the noble lord to understand, that he did not mean to identify himself with that individual, as the narrator of the facts.

Lord Castlereagh said, he was perfectly aware the noble lord did not speak from his own knowledge, but from the evidence of others in whom he reposed confidence. He congratulated the House, however, on the opinion in this respect, the deliberate opinion of the individual who had had the best opportunities of becoming acquainted with the facts of the case, and who was not likely to have any bias on the subject. His majesty's ministers also spoke upon information which they had received on respectable authority, and from credible witnesses.

Mr. J. P. Grant agreed with the noble lord opposite, in hoping that the magistrates of Manchester would be believed innocent till their guilt was proved. But he was rather astonished at the inference attempted to be drawn by the noble lord opposite from what had fallen from his noble friend; for his noble friend had stated, that of his own knowledge he knew nothing. His noble friend had only repeated the statements of the accused parties; and therefore, as in all other cases where there were conflicting statements, they were bound to enter on an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining the truth. He should not hold himself pledged to any opinion now, but reserve himself till the time came for deciding on this subject, when he should give that vote, which, in his conscience, he should consider himself bound to give.

Lord Castlereagh said, the statement did not rest on the authority of the noble lord, however high, but was confirmed by the authority of an hon. member connected with that quarter.

Mr. Bennet said, three testimonies had been given in favour of the character of captain Birley—his character had not been called in question. He did not believe it had ever been called in question in Manchester, and he was certain it had never been called in question in that House; and he should wish to know, therefore, whether any gentleman could say he had heard it questioned. He wished to make another observation. The statement of his noble friend rested entirely on the statement of captain Birley himself. It might be true, and it might not be true. Other statements had been made by a number of individuals on oath, on the coroner's inquest, of a nature altogether contrary to it. These statements might be true, or they might be false. They were therefore called on to inquire which of these statements were true, the statements of the magistrates and yeomanry, or the statements directly contradictory of them on oath.

Mr. Bathurst observed, that the noble lord had expressed his confident belief in the veracity of the statement of captain Birley, and had borne testimony to his general disposition to humanity. That character was confirmed by an hon. gentleman from Manchester, whom he did not now see in his place. These were the attestations of persons competent to judge what authority any statement from him was entitled to, and his credit was therefore supported by the noble lord and the hon. gentleman whom he had alluded to.

Till something to the contrary, therefore, was produced against him, he must take the statement of the noble lord and hon. gentleman as a prima facie case in favour of that gentleman and of the magistrates. The yeomanry it appeared went through the opening which at first led from the house to the meeting; but, by the alteration caused by the persons round the hustings, who removed the waggon to a distance from where it originally stood, and who placed a cordon of not less than 15 feet of persons, known to be selected from the most determined part of the meeting, the troops with the civil power were not able to approach close to the hustings. It was to be considered that the magistrates had behind them the loyal population of that great town; and with all these loyal people (and when the people were talked of it was too much the fashion to include only under that description — disturbers of the peace) more in number, perhaps, than that of the people assembled at the meeting, the magistrates were called on to execute the powers of the law to rescue them from the perilous situation in which they were placed. It was well known at the moment the fury of the loyal people was so great against the mob, that the moment it was dispersed, had it not been for the intervention of the magistrates it would have been impossible to save many individuals from the resentment of those who felt themselves rescued from their outrages.

Mr. Baring said, he should not have spoken had it not been for what had occurred within the last half hour. If any thing could show the necessity of an inquiry, and the duty of that House to institute it, it was the course just adopted on the other side. The noble lord had declared that his noble friend had brought forward such information as ought to satisfy the country. And what had his noble friend stated? He had stated to the House information derived by him from the very persons who were implicated in these transactions. He was ready to believe the magistrates and yeomanry might be able to justify themselves; but he would ask the House whether that description of evidence which they had just heard would satisfy any part of the country. It was too much to hear such a supposition trumpeted forth by the noble lord. When his majesty's ministers knew that in all parts of the country so many meetings had taken place on this subject, all loudly demanding inquiry, he was astonished they should think such a statement from such a source, would prove satisfactory. There was hardly a person whom he had seen, who did not think inquiry was necessary. This was the opinion of many persons who never attended public meetings, and it was not fair to infer that those only who attended public meetings were in favour of inquiry—for, from what he knew, he would say there were still more who had not attended public meetings, than of those who had attended public meetings, who thought inquiry necessary. The hon. member for Yorkshire for instance, with his friends, the loyal declarators of that county had in fact admitted as much. This was itself an admission of the necessity of inquiry. If any thing proved more than another the necessity of inquiry, it was what had followed his noble friend's statement. He had not heard a single person who had expressed an opinion that the magistrates were to blame. But what had the right hon. gentleman who just sat down said? Why, that after the declaration of his noble friend there was a prima facie case, unless there could be shown something to the contrary, which proved the innocence of the magistrates. What was wanted was an opportunity to show these facts to the country. If the House did not enter into this inquiry, could the country remain quiet? In denying inquiry, his majesty's ministers were not only guilty of a great want of feeling towards the country at large, but of injustice to the parties themselves, in holding them up in an invidious light to the country.—He trusted the magistrates and yeomanry would be able to clear themselves from the charge of cruelty, but that was a reason why the inquiry should be gone into. However they might clear themselves of cruelty, he did not think they would be able to clear themselves of the imputation of gross neglect.—One thing was admitted on all sides—it was admitted that the magistrates were aware the day before that it was an illegal meeting. At all events when they saw the fellows coming in the manner they did, they could have no doubt that it was an illegal meeting. But though they saw them so coming in, what did they do? They waited till 50 or 60,000 persons were assembled together to make the case more difficult. Thus from their own statements there was a great want of prudence on the part of the magistrates. Supposing the magistrates and yeomanry however could acquit themselves of the severe charges against them, the noble lord was guilty of great injustice towards them, in holding them up to the country in so invidious a light. If it had not been for what fell from the noble lord he should not have troubled the House on this occasion. He was one of those who were convinced the present state of things must somehow or other be got rid of. He meant the state of things in the manufacturing districts—The manufacturers of those districts were a body of individuals on whom a great part of the prosperity of the country depended. All the manufacturers were in a state of derangement while this disposition prevailed. It was impossible that rich capitalists would remain in a country exposed to tumultuary meetings. Great numbers of manufacturers had been brought here from other countries, some from civil and some from religious persecution. But no persecution could be so fatal as a mob persecution. Every other persecution there was some means of softening, but this was unrelenting and implacable. Despotism itself was not so bad. Every man at all conversant with business must know that if this state of things lasted another twelve months it would be attended with the destruction of the manufactures of that part of the country, and would reduce to utter misery that part of the people of this country. He did not pretend to say what means would be successful for putting it down. Whether strong means or means of conciliation—but this he would say, that if such a state of things continued the manufacturers could not possibly go on. He really could not conceive what interest could be served by preventing the inquiry proposed from being carried on in that House. Every person possessed of capital was very much interested in the inquiry. He had only one more observation to make. He should say an inquiry ought to take place, not so much an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether the magistrates and yeomanry were guilty or not guilty, as an inquiry on general principles, to let us see whether there had been any interference of government with the ordinary administration of justice—whether there had been any interference with the coroner, the magistrates or lord lieutenants, for the purpose of preventing the ordinary course of justice. On this subject there was a prima facie evidence of some interference. He did not allude to the bills thrown out by the grand jury—whether the grand jury were right or wrong in throwing out these bills, this was in the ordinary course of the administration of justice. But when he saw one set of magistrates refuse to listen to the applications made to them in the ordinary form, because they were themselves concerned in the transactions complained of; and another set of magistrates refuse to interfere, because their neighbours were concerned—when he saw the approbation of his majesty's government given, at a time when it was impossible they could be acquainted with the case of which they approved—and what was most extraordinary, and what in his opinion too little stress had been laid on—when he saw the inquest of the coroner at Oldham stopped for six weeks, he could not help saying that this was a prima facie case, that the ordinary course of justice was not going on—this was a state of things which had never existed before. It had been said that an inquiry was prejudging men who might afterwards be put on their trial. He said that this was not the sort of investigation, which he wanted, but that higher and far more important investigation, to ascertain whether the wheels of government were going on in the ordinary way. These were the reasons on which he grounded the vote he had given, and which would have induced him to oppose any address which after the extraordinary circumstances which had occurred, should not contain a pledge to inquire into them.

Lord Compton said, that the reasons which induced him to support the address were these:—Though it might happen that the House should vote in favour of inquiry, yet a majority might vote against any of the three modes of inquiry which were open to them. The first mode of inquiry was by an examination of witnesses at the bar. This mode of inquiry was open to many inconveniences, and they had been well exposed by the hon. member for Yorkshire. The second mode was by a committee up stairs; but in the present state of feeling in the country it would be difficult to make a selection of members which would satisfy those whom it was proposed to conciliate. The third mode was to order the Crown lawyers to prosecute the magistrates, &c. in a court of law. But he could not consent, nor would the House consent, to act as the accuser of persons who were in its opinion not only guiltless, but meritorious. A great deal had been said of the thanks given by the ministers to the magistrates, because it was alleged that time had not been taken to inquire into the circumstances. But the magistrates were public functionaries, and surely, when they said that under such and such circumstances they had acted so and so, his majesty's ministers were bound to receive their statement as true, until it was proved to be false. If the statement of the magistrates had been found to be false, so far from being bound by their declaration, the ministers would have been justified in proceeding against them with the greater severity. The hon. member for Shrewsbury had said, that captain Birley's character had not been attacked in or out of the House. As to the House, the statement was correct, but in Manchester captain Birley's character was attacked in the most mischievous manner by a placard in a shop window. As to the dismissal of lord Fitzwilliam, he believed that nobleman to be as honourable a man, and as loyal a subject, as ever existed; but he thought, that if it was only that he differed from the ministers, not only in the mode of quelling the disturbances in his district, but even as to the nature of those disturbances—this alone would have been a sufficient reason for his removal. Besides this, the lord lieutenant was not merely the servant of the Crown, but of the ministers, and though lord Fitzwilliam would have been called upon by duty (entertaining such sentiments as he did), to demand an audience from the Prince Regent, to lay before him his opinion as to the conduct of the ministers; yet he was not justified in attending a meeting, to throw blame on the ministers for their conduct in the very department in which he had to obey their commands. But he followed the dictates of his conscience, and there was no disgrace in his dismissal. It was not more a disgrace for lord F. to differ from the ministers, than for the ministers to differ from him. As to parliamentary reform, before he (lord Compton) consented to enter into the consideration of that subject, he must be satisfied of two things; first, that the alteration of the constitution of parliament would be in a beneficial direction; and, second, that it would not go farther than he wished. What appeared to him an almost insuperable

objection to an attempt to reform the House, was, that if any interest was already too strong in it, the result of the change in its constitution by the same body, would be to make that interest stronger. He was extremely surprised at the language held by one hon. member, who seemed to consider that the Manchester magistrates had shown an unbecoming eagerness for shedding human blood. For his part, he thought they had proved themselves anxious to avoid shedding blood, and that they had, by their judicious measures, saved perhaps the town of Manchester—saved the lives of a large portion of the multitude that had been dispersed, and vindicated the majesty of the laws.

Mr. Hume thought some of the remarks which had been made were founded on a misrepresentation of what had fallen from him, which misrepresentation, however, he had not seen.

Mr. Valentine Blake said:—I beg to assure the House, that, after the ample discussion which this subject has received, I shall feel it to be my duty to say but a very few words. I am not vain enough to imagine, that it can be in my power to alter the opinion of any hon. member, whose view of this subject is different from my own; but when I consider the vast importance of the question before the House, its consequence not only with regard to the rights of the people, but also to the rights, independence, and character of the parliament, and even the very existence of the constitution, and when, to my very great amazement, I find a course adopted by the hon. gentlemen on the other side, equally new, unnecessary, and pernicious, supported by arguments futile and dangerous too, no consciousness of my own inability to do the subject that justice which it has received from others, shall deter me from recording my sentiments in justification to my constituents of the vote which I have given, in the discharge of the most solemn duty which I may ever be called upon to perform towards them. In the first place, I think it right to observe upon a part of what fell last night from an hon. and learned gentleman. That hon. and learned gentleman recommended conciliation and clemency; and I admit the principle, as I am sure every man does who votes on this side of the House, if applied at the proper season. But it is not when sedition and blasphemy and avowed treason go hand in hand with such alarming strides, that I would have recourse to measures which would be misrepresented by the disaffected, and called weakness. I would, in such circumstances, put on a firm resolution to suppress open rebellion, even if it went to that (as I sincerely hope it will not), and after having done so, I would then turn round and put on that air of clemency and conciliation so recommended by the hon. and learned gentleman. In taking this course I do not think that I could be charged with inconsistency; and therefore the imputation upon this identical point with respect to the inconsistency of the right hon. and learned gentleman, whose speech brought conviction to every unprejudiced mind, and whose life has been one uniform instance of political consistency and sacrifice appears to me to be wholly unfounded. The hon. baronet was not more happy than the hon. and learned gentleman in his attack upon the same quarter, and the ridicule which he attempted to throw upon the speech of the right hon. and learned gentleman must revert upon himself; for, surely, the hon. baronet cannot be so ignorant as not to know that the civil force of a parish or a district is not vested in the parish constables only, but in the magistracy of the county, with powers ample enough to warrant them in putting down a meeting so numerous as must be dangerous to the public peace, and the more especially so, when the temper and spirit of the persons who compose that meeting have been previously manifested by a training to military exercise, for the purpose, avowedly, of revolution. How such a meeting can be termed legal is astonishing, and only shows how far prejudice and party will cloud the best mind and the honestest judgment. The hon. and learned gentleman, who spoke this night on the other side, rose, as he said, for the particular purpose of giving a legal opinion in favour of the meeting; and having listened to him with anxiety, I never was more astonished than when that hon. and learned gentleman sat down, forgetting the express purpose for which he rose. I am perfectly sure that if a client went to that hon. and learned gentleman in his professional capacity, he would never think of giving his opinion without his reasons, because such an opinion would be looked upon as nothing; and from this it is fair to infer, that the hon. and learned gentleman has no reason to give. Another hon. and learned gentleman, who just sat down, gave a like opinion, and threw the weight of his authority into a scale opposed to that of the right hon. and learned gentleman, whose opinion, not only as to the illegality of the Manchester meeting, but of other meetings, was authenticated by the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman who spoke on the first night's debate from the floor, and who used the fact as a means of accusation against the law officers of the Crown, for not having prosecuted the offenders. But who, I will ask, ever heard of a prosecution against a multitude? That hon. and learned gentleman declared that he would, out of respect for the right hon. and learned gentleman who preceded him, consume a reasonable time in his reply, but although the time which he did consume was certainly very unreasonable, considering the matter of his speech, he did not consume one particle of the sound reasoning and unanswerable argument of the right hon. and learned gentleman. The hon. and learned gentleman by a long course of extensive employment, has raised himself in the estimation of every man (and in none more than in mine) to the head of his profession; but I hope it will not be deemed improper of me to say, that he ought as much as possible to refrain from legal device as a legislator. It must have happened to the hon. and learned gentleman, that when he was concerned on the wrong side, and found himself unable to meet the facts and the arguments of his adversary, as in the present instance, he found it for the benefit of his client to make a hash of those facts, and so to mix them up as to make them unintelligible, and thus to mislead the jury; but, surely, that course which would be advisable and proper for him to take as a pleader, ought to be repudiated by him as a judge; yet the contrary has taken place. Besides which, the hon. and learned gentleman had the candor to impute special pleading to a speech, which can only be justly appreciated, when its effects are considered after the display of talent and legal knowledge and eloquence to which it was a reply. The hon. and learned gentleman, I am astonished to say, also thought that it was necessary at this time of day, to go about to prove that the right of the subject to petition was a right which could not be taken away without annihilation of the constitution—but this was an extraordinarily unnecessary course. Who is it that does not admit the right? Yet if it was disputed, the record to which the hon. and learned gentleman adverted would have been but poor authority, when the circumstances of the times which it referred to are considered, especially when it is known that then in reality the king disputed the right, and went to such lengths as to induce the hon. members of that day to go to the House armed, prepared to fight, and not to deliberate. This right is not, nor ever shall be, with my aid, disputed, but I look upon an abuse of the right as most dangerous, even to its own existence, and therefore I will resist it. The liberty of the press is a valuable right; but what does a libel consist of but in an abuse of that liberty. The right to petition is also a most valuable right; but is a flagitious and flagrant abuse of it to be tolerated to an extent which would, by its explosion, produce revolution, with all its attendant horrors, as lately exemplified in France? while the guilty libeller is punished for a crime certainly much less dangerous, because less rapid in its effect. I have but one word more to offer; hon. gentlemen on the other side have often thrown out against us who support the government, charges of the most abominable corruption; but it is time to retaliate, and I will not shrink from the undertaking; individually, I confess, I respect and admire those hon. gentlemen denominated the Whigs of this day, but as a party I must point at the fallen image which they have so long worshipped. In the infancy of that party perhaps I would have admired its principles; in its growth I would have feared them; in its manhood I opposed them; and now, in the hour of its final dissolution, I despise them. Power, power, power (no matter by what means acquired) was their constant object; blinded by this passion, and goaded on by continual disappointment, they have at length delivered themselves over (without intending it) to the projects of disaffection and treason. It is in vain that they have laboured and tortured this fair inference, in order to separate themselves from their new allies; the impression has gone abroad, and will never be effaced. The substantial principles of this party have long since vanished; even the name, to which they would still fondly cling, is gone, and nothing remains to them but political distrust, insignificance, and ruin.

The report was then agreed to; and the Address was ordered to be printed by the whole House.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, November 29.

MISDEMEANORS BILL.] The Lord Chancellor rose to introduce a bill. He begged leave to assure their lordships, that it did not arise out of the circumstances of the times. It was well known that it had been his intention to introduce this bill, whether the circumstances which at present called for their consideration had occurred or not. He then proceeded to describe the object of the bill. He stated, that it was the practice of the courts to allow defendants, in cases of information or indictments to imparle or traverse. The effect of which was, to gain time till the next term or sessions. The effect of this practice had been, in several instances, that the trials of individuals against whom informations had been filed, or indictments found, had been so delayed that the prosecution failed to answer any of the purposes for which it was commenced. His object, therefore, in the present bill, was, to take away the right of imparling or traversing, by compelling the parties to plead in the term or at the sessions in which the information should be filed or the indictment found, unless, upon any special grounds urged, the court should think proper to allow the parties to imparle or traverse. This would prevent those unnecessary delays to which he had already adverted, without in any way interfering with substantial justice. His lordship presented the bill, which was read a first time.

Lord Holland wished to understand distinctly the object of the bill. He had not caught sufficiently the expressions of the noble and learned lord to understand whether the bill was intended equally to apply to imparling and traversing, to prevent both, or in what particular way it was in that respect to operate. He wished, therefore, for further information upon those points. There was another point also respecting which he wished to know whether any provision was introduced into the bill—he alluded to informations filed ex officio by the attorney-general. He wished to know whether there was any provision by which that officer, in case of his not proceeding after a certain time upon an information, might be compelled either to go on or to enter a nolle prosequi? He wished likewise to be informed, whether any provision was introduced into the bill for the purpose of enabling the court to grant a copy of an information or indictment to the defendant, at the public expense? As, according to what had been stated by the noble and learned lord, the defendant was to be hurried on to his trial much more rapidly than at present, it seemed more than ever necessary that some provision should be made, by means of which he should be enabled to know the precise nature of the charge against him. If this were not the case, the bill would appear to do every thing for the prosecution and nothing for the defendant.

The Lord Chancellor said, that what was called imparling in civil actions, was more generally known by the name of traversing in cases of prosecution for misdemeanor, and it was the right arising out of this practice, which it was the object of the bill to take away, except in those cases where, from special circumstances, the court, either of king's-bench or at the sessions, should deem it advisable to allow the party the benefit of traversing. Respecting ex officio informations, there was no provision in the bill, but it would be, of course, competent to any noble lord, in the progress of the bill, to move any clause he might think requisite. Neither was there any provision in the bill with regard to the granting of copies of informations or indictments to defendants at the public expense. Every court, however, would of course feel it to be a duty that a defendant (who must of course, know the general nature of the charge against him) should be made acquainted with the precise nature of the charges against him contained in any information or indictment on which he was to be tried.

The bill was ordered to be printed.

BLASPHEMOUS LIBELS—SEIZURE OF ARMS—TRAINING PREVENTION BILLS.] Lord Sidmouth rose to call the attention of their lordships to the measures which the ministers of his royal highness the Prince Regent thought it necessary to propose in the present situation of the country. He trusted that their lordships would find those measures to be such as would suit the necessity of the case, without going beyond it; and to combine a due regard to the right of the subject, with that consideration which was due to the safety of the state. It was unnecessary for him to go into any detail of the danger in which the country was placed; that was admitted: it was known, that a conspiracy existed for the subversion of the constitution and of the rights of property; and that it was intended to subvert the fabric of the constitution in church and state. Among the means adopted for the accomplishment of this end, it was with grief he had to state, that the press was one of the principal. It had greatly contributed to produce the danger against which their lordships had to guard. It was a subject of most melancholy regret that the free press, which had hitherto been the glory of this country, and had contributed so much to its greatness from a shield and guard of liberty, should become an instrument of its destruction. Yet this was what their lordships had witnessed. That act which was calculated to instruct and console, was perverted to rob mankind of all hope of future happiness; because it was supposed, that when the people of this country were deprived of all the consolations of religion, they would be the better prepared to throw off their allegiance, and lose their accustomed respect for the laws and the constitution.

He should now state to their lordships, as accurately as possible, the nature of the measures which were at the present crisis thought necessary to meet the enormous evil he had described. It was the great character of a free press that its productions were not interfered with before publication; but that when the publication took place, if it should be considered to be injurious to morals, to religion, or to the good order of society, it then became liable to prosecution. In the bill which he was about to describe to their lordships, as one of those to be submitted to their consideration, this great principle, on which the free press was founded, was not invaded. It had been, indeed, in consideration, but for a moment only, whether some step ought not to be taken preliminary to publication; but that idea was immediately discarded, as inconsistent with the principle to which he had referred. The bill he had first to propose to their lordships, had not in view to visit offenders with increased punishment in the first instance; but, in case of the repetition of any seditious or blasphemous libel, it was thought advisable that an additional punishment should be inflicted. It was therefore proposed, that any person, having been tried, convicted, and punished for a seditious or blasphemous libel, should, on conviction of a second offence, be liable, at the discretion of the court, to the punishment of fine, imprisonment, banishment, or transportation. It was also proposed that, in such cases of second conviction, a power should be given to seize the copies of the libel in the possession of the publisher: the copies so seized to be preserved until it should be seen whether an arrest of judgment was moved, and then to be returned to the publisher, if the judgment of the court should be in his favour. These were the chief provisions of a bill which he should have the honour to submit to their lordships; but he might here be permitted to advert to what was intended to be proposed in another place, in order that a distinct view might be obtained of the whole of the measures which his majesty's ministers thought it their duty to recommend. The principle of the bill which he had next to explain, he must acknowledge, was not similar to that which he had just described. It was intended to propose, that all publications, consisting of less than a given number of sheets, should be subject to a duty equal to that paid by newspapers. This might, perhaps, be said to be breaking in, in some degree, on the principle laid down in introducing the previous bill to the knowledge of the House. It would be for their lordships, however, to consider the necessity of the occasion, and to say, whether this degree of infringement of the principle was not indispensable, in order to check the progress of blasphemy and sedition. Another provision of this bill would be, that persons putting forth a publication of the kind to which he had adverted should be required to enter into recognizances, or give security of their ability to pay any penalty which might be inflicted on them. A great feature in the evil which their lordships were called upon to correct, arose from the assemblages of great bodies of people. Those assemblages were influenced by seditious publications and itinerant demagogues, who availed themselves but too successfully of the present state of the laws, in order to bring great bodies of people together from different parts of the country. As the law

now stood, any individual might issue his mandate to bring together all the idle and curious part of the population of the country at any time, or in any place he pleased. The persons who had called these meetings considered themselves empowered (whether legally or not was not at present the question) to attend them with martial music, flags, and banners, all of which ensigns, independently of that flagitious standard displayed at Manchester, and which was so indicative of the designs of those who bore it, were of a nature calculated to produce disorder and alarm. He should now state to their lordships, what were the provisions of the bill by which it was proposed to obviate the danger arising from such tumultuous and seditious meetings. In the first place, he could assure them, that it was not intended to interfere with the right of the subject to petition the Prince Regent or parliament, or to meet for the discussion of any grievance under which the people might conceive that they were labouring; but it would be seen, by reference to the bills on the table, that one of the principal causes of the agitation, alarm, and disorder which at present prevailed in the country, was, in addition to the licentiousness of the press, the assembling of great bodies of people to hear the harangues of itinerant orators. Nothing would be introduced into the bill that would tend to impede or interrupt meetings regularly called by a sheriff, boroughreeve, or other magistrate; but it would be proposed to enact, that if any parties should be desirous of meeting for the consideration of subjects connected with the church or state, their intention should be notified by a requisition, signed by seven householders, and that it should be illegal for any person not usually inhabiting the place for which such meeting was called to attend it. In another provision, it was proposed to give to the magistrates the power, with some limitations, of appointing the place and time of the meeting.

These, according to the best of his recollection, were the leading provisions of the bill relative to public meetings, which, with the preceding bill, would be introduced in another place. He had now to call their lordships attention to another measure which he should have to submit to their consideration. It appeared, from the correspondence now before parliament, that the persons who agitated the country by large assemblages, emboldened by their numbers, had contemplated means for attaining their ends, very different from their ostensible purpose of petitioning, and that they were prepared to proceed to accomplish their illegal object by force of arms. The preparation for this object had been carried on to a most formidable extent; and yet he had been told, that, in consequence of the present state of the law, unless the criminal intent should be proved, or a breach of the peace take place, meetings of military training could not be visited with any penalty. Full proof of the extensive drilling and military exercise which prevailed in Lancashire was afforded by the numerous depositions in the papers on the table. It might, it was true, be urged, that very few names appeared to these depositions; in many instances only the initials were printed, and sometimes the names of individuals were left blank. The reason of this was, that many of the persons who had been examined did not choose that their names should be made public: the apprehension of danger from such disclosure was great, and was sufficient to account for the suppression of the names; but for the authenticity of the depositions their lordships knew the magistrates were responsible. In all cases, the names of the magistrates were given, though the names of the individuals who gave the information might remain unknown. His lordship referred to the evidence of one person for what took place on the day previous to the Manchester meeting, and the deposition of that person was signed with his name. It was known that there was to be a meeting in the neighbourhood on the 15th of August, for training, and that that assemblage was to be the last previous to the Manchester meeting. Their lordship's upon reference to the papers, would see the account which was given of the conduct of the persons who assembled for military exercise at White-moss. The witness, after describing what he saw, stated, that he and his companions had been pursued by part of the persons assembled, and, when overtaken, received very severe treatment. In consideration of this state of things, it was proposed to prohibit military training, except under the authority of a magistrate or lord-lieutenant of the county. Their lordships were also aware of the terror which prevailed in consequence of the knowledge that the disaffected were in the possession of arms.

Papers on the table left no doubt of the danger which was to be apprehended from this source. It had, therefore, he regretted to state, been deemed indispensably necessary to give to magistrates in the disturbed districts, on evidence which might afford a well grounded suspicion of arms being collected for the purpose of being illegally employed, the power of searching for and seizing them. It was also proposed to give the power of apprehending persons carrying arms for such purpose, and of seizing the same, and of detaining the individual on whom arms might be so found; the right of appeal to the quarter sessions being, however, allowed to the person so apprehended and detained.

These were, in outline, the whole of the measures relative to the state of the country, which ministers thought it their duty at the present moment to submit to parliament. He had abstained from many details which appeared more suitable to subsequent stages of the bills. He was impressed with the hope, that, improved by the assistance of their lordships and the other house of parliament, they would be found suitable to the momentous occasion which required their introduction. Conciliation had been recommended, and it was with the most ardent wish of his majesty's ministers to resort to measures which were truly conciliatory; but they would not consent to compromise the safety of the state. Any mode which should be proposed for relieving the distress of the country would always receive their thanks and attention; for that was the great object which ought to be kept in view. If such proposition should present itself to the mind of any noble lord opposite, it would be gladly received by himself and his colleagues. But, to hold out a disposition to blend conciliation with concession, was a course to which he could not agree; for it was one fraught with danger; but what, he would ask their lordships, had they to concede. Did they not possess the constitution they had received from their ancestors? And was it not their duty firmly to maintain it? That constitution was now in greater danger than it ever had been at any time, since the accession of the House of Brunswick to the throne, and he therefore called upon their lordships to rally round it. He called upon the noble lords opposite to give their aid, to assist in defeating the common enemy that threatened the subversion of the constitution and every thing valuable in the existing order of society. Whatever differences they might have, let them in the mean time go hand in hand in this great object, and not only endeavour to avert the danger of the present moment, but, as far as possible to, secure the constitution against future attacks. He assured the noble lord that his great object was, that the government should be administered according to the constitution; that the country should never be placed under a military government, but should always enjoy the government of the laws. He proposed that the bills he had prepared should now be read a first time. On Thursday he would move the second reading, and in the mean time they would be printed.

Earl Grey said, he should object to so early a day as Thursday being fixed upon for the second reading of these bills. The noble secretary had, indeed, prefaced the proposition of his new measures with a statement which contained the grounds on which he meant to support them; and, by the connected view which he gave of the whole system, had enabled the House to understand the extent of the demands to be made upon it; yet their lordships would necessarily expect more information than had yet been given, before they proceeded to legislate, and would require that the introduction of each bill should be accompanied with a clear exposition of the reasons which rendered it necessary, or justified its enactment. On that day the House was summoned to the discussion of the bill brought in by the noble and learned lord on the wool-sack, which contemplated, as was rightly stated by the noble and learned lord, a most important alteration in the existing law of the land, an alteration which could not be allowed to take place without the fullest investigation, and the evidence of its necessity. With the prospect of this discussion on the second reading of the noble and learned lord's bill, their lordships would not, he was convinced, consent to appoint the second reading of three other important bills on the same day. The noble secretary had called upon their lordships to support his proposed measures, from a consideration of the dangers by which they were surrounded; and if he could be prevailed upon to think that the bills now before the House could meet and repress the evils described, he would be the first to obey the call, and lend them his cordial support. But, viewing as he did their character in a different light from the noble secretary; having a different conception of the danger, looking upon it as arising from causes and requiring remedies which were little attended to, if not entirely overlooked by his majesty's government; and believing that the system of force, coercion, and terror, which was now attempted to be established in this once free and happy country, was calculated rather to irritate and inflame the discontents that existed, than to allay or repress them; to increase the danger rather than to diminish it; and to confirm rather than to remove that settled distrust and want of confidence between the people and legislature, which, he was sorry to say, the proceedings of parliament were calculated to spread throughout the land!—thinking and believing in this manner, he would declare, that instead of promising his concurrence in those measures called for by the noble secretary, he must take the earliest opportunity of protesting against them, and state his conviction, that instead of saving, they would produce ruin to the country. He could not but view the encroachments now attempted on our most valuable rights with the utmost regret and alarm. The proposed bills went to impose restraints on the right of public meetings for petitioning, which, he allowed might, in some cases, be abused, but which restraint could not be established consistently with the maintenance of the right. The restraints about to be imposed on the press, he had heard with the utmost dismay. They were absolutely incompatible with the freedom which the noble secretary admitted had produced so much advantage to this country; which had protected those institutions and diffused that spirit which constituted its boast and its glory. The noble secretary had stated, that the seditious and blasphemous publications were one main source of the dangers with which the country was now threatened; but, had he ascertained that the destruction of the freedom of the press was the only mode of checking its abuses; and had he reflected on the evils which restriction would bring along with them? To the freedom of the press this country owed the preservation of its liberty, which could not be long maintained without such an alloy, and with its liberty, its strength, its happiness, and its glory. When, therefore, he saw a design to impose new restraints upon the press by enacting severe additional punishments in cases of second convictions, and requiring securities before publication, he could not but be alive to the evils which the measures would produce. He was alarmed when he reflected how it would raise the price of knowledge, and impede the progress of education to the poor. It took away the protection allowed to free discussion, and aimed a blow at one of our most valuable rights, such as the most arbitrary ministers in the most arbitrary times, never proposed to parliament, and against which he would never cease to protest.—But there was another view of the case which rendered the proposed restraints the more obnoxious, by taking away all pretext for them. The noble secretary now demanded the enactment of new laws for the protection of the government, and the maintenance of public order: but had the old laws been enforced, and found inefficient for that object? The noble lord, before he asked for additional restrictions, was bound to show that those seditious and blasphemous works which had been so long in circulation, had been made subject to the most rigorous exercise of the existing laws of which they were susceptible. He (lord Grey) knew that the law officers of the Crown had in one or two instances, prosecuted without being able to procure a conviction; but he knew at the same time, some horrible and disgusting publications—publications directly recommending assassination—publications supporting principles contrary to all law and order—had not been prosecuted. For two years the most seditious doctrines had been published in a work alluded to in the papers on the table—“Sherwin’s Political Register;” and yet no attempt was made to check their spread. Such works had poisoned the public mind, if the good sense of the people would allow them to be poisoned by such offensive trash; but no endeavour was made to suppress them by the existing laws. The noble secretary, therefore, before he came to ask for new enactments, was bound to show that such offenders had been prosecuted as they ought, and that the existing law was insufficient for their coercion and punishment. Feeling as he did on these points, and looking as he did with dismay on the proposed system of government, which would increase the danger it was meant to avert, he could not but take the earliest opportunity of expressing his sentiments, although he did not mean to enter at large into the separate measures: those measures comprehended restraints on public meetings and on the liberty of the press, and put it into the power of the magistrates to deprive the subject of those arms which he might have for his own defence. The justification of such restraints rested on the papers which had been presented to the House, and which were considered by his majesty’s ministers as disclosing a great extent of danger. Now, he was willing to allow that these papers, incomplete as he maintained them to be, and requiring many additions and explanations, did prove a considerable extent of danger, but a danger arising from the distress of the people—a distress amounting to absolute hunger, and admitted in their first accounts, as the cause of the danger. That there were persons who took advantage of this distress to inflame the discontents of the sufferers, he was willing to allow: but he said there was no evidence either in the papers on the table, or in the general state of the country, to convince him that any conspiracy against law and order had been formed, or that the public tranquillity was extensively threatened. Such a conspiracy, and such a danger, he neither saw in any way proved, nor could he believe in its existence. The noble lord had spoken of conciliation; but his notions of it were rather rigid. He had declared that he would subdue first, before he would concede. Now, he (lord Grey) could not conceive on what ideas of dignity the noble secretary went when he maintained such a maxim. If there were demands which the people had a right to make, and which, from the state of the country, it was proper to grant, why resist concession? He was prepared to admit that the people had a right to an indulgent attention to their grievances; that there existed abuses in the government, and defects in the construction of parliament which ought to be taken into consideration; and that a yielding to the prayers of the nation in this respect might allay discontent, without being a dangerous concession. To these and such things parliament ought to turn its attention. It ought to institute inquiries into their grievances, and show a desire to redress their wrongs or injuries where they have been suffered or inflicted. Such meaasures of conciliation would do more to bring back the country to peace and tranquillity than the present bills, and give it more strength and security than any system of restraints, or laws of severity and coercion.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he did not rise for the purpose of entering on the discussion of any of the bills which had been submitted to the House. The question now was as to the first reading; and to this there seemed to be no objection. But he could not allow the speech of the noble earl to go forth to the world without some reply, as it was calculated, if left uncontradicted, to produce a false impression. The noble earl had treated the proposed measures as a system of coercion; whereas he (lord Liverpool) was prepared to maintain that they composed a system of protection. If they prevented those acts which endangered the existence of our rights, they were the best safeguards of those rights. He was prepared to deny that any one of them, with the exception of the bill relative to the search of arms, went to affect the proper, legal, and well-understood privileges of Englishmen. The bill for preventing seditious meetings, so far from having any tendency to abridge the right of petition, was its best protection by putting a stop to those tumultuous assemblages which had grown out of a good, but which might endanger that good, by disgusting every Englishman with such an exercise of it. The bill before the House would thus give the right of petition tenfold additional security. It was a bill not to prevent meetings of the people in their own districts, but to put a stop to the assembling of great multitudes collected from distant parts, and guided by demagogues, who stimulated their minds to a hatred and contempt of every thing dignified or venerable. If such evils were allowed to proceed to greater inveteracy, how could they be put down? Why, by military force. And would any good man, or lover of his country, wish such a result? No; therefore such disorders must be checked and put down in time. Those were the best friends of the right, who prevented its abuse. The other bill regarding restraints on the press, he was prepared to contend, must be viewed in the same light. the noble earl had not understood the extent of the evil of seditious and blasphemous publications, or the power of the law as it at present stood in checking them.

(VOL. XLI.)

The present laws were not adequate to check the mischief. They had been tried; they were now in a course of trial; but unless some more effectual enactments were added, the evil would continue. The severity of the proposed measures did not justify the complaints of the noble earl. The extent of the proposition before the House did not go to alter the law, as far as respected first convictions. It merely said that a person who had been tried, convicted, and punished for a blasphemous and seditious libel, might, on a second conviction be subjected to greater severity of punishment, by imprisonment, banishment, or transportation, at the discretion of the court. The other measure affecting the press, which would go to impose a duty on a certain class of publications, could scarcely be regarded as any change of the law; it was rather an enforcement of an existing law which had been evaded, than the enactment of any new law. Nor did he see any thing particularly objectionable in the bill which required the printer and publisher to lodge securities, against any fine that might be imposed on him for the abuse of the freedom of the press. Was it to be endured, that these men should be allowed to scatter their poison about, without being known who were responsible for them? The noble earl had spoken of moral tracts; but with respect to them, some satisfactory resolution would be introduced into the bill. The only other law in what was called this system of coercion, namely, that authorizing a search for arms, was merely a re-enactment of the statute against Luddism. Having said thus much, he would not trespass longer on their lordships' attention than merely to speak of the arrangements for the second readings. His noble friend had fixed Thursday for the second reading of all the bills; if they could not be discussed then, along with the bill introduced by his noble and learned friend on the wool-sack, the debate might be postponed to another day. He could assure their lordships, that there was no disposition on the part of ministers to prevent the fullest examination and discussion. He would wish that the training and search bills, as they were of imperious necessity, should be first discussed. He would suggest, that the lord chancellor's bill might be read a second time on Friday.

The training and search for arms bills were ordered to be read a second time on Thursday; the lord chancellor's bill a second time on Friday; and the blasphemous a second time on Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, November 29.

PRINCE REGENT'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.] Mr. Speaker reported the Prince Regent's Answer to the Address, as follows:

"Gentlemen: I receive with sincere pleasure this loyal and dutiful Address. The determination of the House of Commons firmly to support at this important conjuncture the laws and constitution of the country, cannot fail to inspire every loyal subject with confidence: Their declaration on this occasion is most acceptable to me, and I receive it with the highest satisfaction, as the surest pledge that the public tranquillity will be effectually and permanently maintained."

REVENUES OF THE COLONIES.] Mr. Hume said, that towards the close of the last session, he had submitted several motions to the House respecting the state of the colonies; but as the lateness of the period did not allow them to be properly gone into, he now rose to renew his notice for the present session. The object he had in view was, to obtain a just account of the expenditure of the different colonies, which would be comprised in his motion. Preparatory to that step, he should now move for a correct account of the civil and military establishments in certain of our islands, in the years 1793, 1805, and 1818, in order to see what increase had been made therein, and to ascertain whether any and what benefit had been derived from those settlements. He should also move for another return respecting those which were denominated "King's colonies." He meant those colonies that were exclusively governed by the Crown, and did not partake of the benefits of British law and British legislation. It appeared to him to be a question of great importance, whether those colonies should remain, as they at present were, governed by orders in council, or be subjected to the system which prevailed in the other colonies; the more especially as the money derived from them was, he believed, expended in a manner little conducive to the interests of this country. He particularly alluded to Ceylon, the Mauritius, the Cape of Good

Hope, and the Ionian islands, as far as this country was concerned. The state of these colonies had never been investigated; and he would, in the course of the session, bring the question before the House, in order that parliament might decide, whether they should continue under the government of the king in council, or be admitted to reap the benefit of a participation in British laws. He should move for a return of the civil and military expenditure of the islands of Ceylon, Malta, Gazo, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Mauritius, to the latest period to which it could be made up. The hon. member then moved "for a return of the amount of revenue collected in the island of Ceylon, from the period when the said island came into our possession to the latest time to which the same can be made up, with the several items of expenditure of every kind, civil and military; also an account of civil offices, the salaries affixed to which exceed 250*l.* per annum, with the names of the officers filling them, the persons by whom they were appointed, and stating whether the duties were performed personally or by deputy; likewise an account of the military staff-officers, distinguishing their pay and emoluments." A similar motion was made respecting the Mauritius, the Cape of Good Hope, Malta, and Gazo, and the Ionian Islands; and also for an account of the civil and military establishments in the West Indies, in North America, and Canada, from 1792 to 1818, distinguishing the increase since 1797. The motions were severally agreed to.

BOROUGH OF CAMELFORD.] Mr. D. W. Harvey said, the House had, in the last session, agreed to certain resolutions respecting the borough of Camelford. One of those resolutions was, that the Speaker's warrant for a new writ for that borough should not be issued until ten days after the commencement of the next session, which period would expire on Thursday next; and another pledged the House to take into consideration the report of the committee on the Camelford election. He wished that the issuing of the warrant should be postponed until the report was considered; and, with that view, he would to-morrow move, that the order for not issuing the warrant until ten days after the meeting of parliament should be discharged, and that the Speaker be directed not to issue the same until the report should have been taken into consideration.

PUBLIC DEBT.] Mr. Hume rose to move for an account of the public debt of Great Britain and Ireland, to which he had called the attention of the House last session. The account which he was about to move for would, if produced, show the total amount of the funded and unfunded debt of this country, from the year 1786 to the year 1819, in a much more clear and correct manner than any that had ever been laid before the House. He then moved for "An account of the amount of the public debt of Great Britain and Ireland, and the interest thereon in British currency, as it stood on the 5th January in each year, from 1786 to 1819, in separate columns:—1. Debt redeemed, and interest thereon, Great Britain, including the Austrian and Portuguese loans:—2. Debt redeemed, and interest thereon, Ireland:—3. Total debt redeemed, and interest thereon, both countries:—4. Funded debt unredeemed, and interest thereon, including the Austrian and Portuguese loans, England:—5. Funded debt unredeemed, and interest thereon, Ireland:—6. Total funded debt unredeemed, and interest thereon, both countries:—7. Total funded debt, redeemed and unredeemed, and interest thereon, both countries:—8. Unfunded debt, and interest thereon, Great Britain (including all interest due, but not paid, on the 5th January 1819):—9. Unfunded debt, and interest thereon, Ireland (including all interest due, but not paid, on the 5th January 1819):—10. Unfunded debt, and interest thereon, both countries (including all interest due, but not paid, on the 5th January 1819):—11. Total debt unredeemed, funded and unfunded, and interest thereon, including all interest due, but not paid, both countries:—12. Total debt, redeemed and unredeemed, funded, unfunded, and interest thereon, both countries, including amount of annuities paid in each country, and the expenses of management."—Ordered.

MANCHESTER MEETING.—PETITION FROM MANCHESTER RESPECTING THE CONDUCT OF THE MAGISTRATES.] Mr. Bennet said, he rose for the purpose of presenting a petition signed by a large body of merchants, manufacturers, tradesmen, and other inhabitants of the town of Manchester, praying the House to institute an inquiry into the fatal transactions of the 16th of August. The signatures of between 6,000 and 7,000 persons were affixed to this petition, which bore the names of many eminent merchants, manufacturers, and tradesmen. It was, indeed, signed most respectably, and he thought that it spoke, in the moderation of its tone, and the propriety of its prayer, the sentiments of the great majority of the inhabitants of Manchester. It set forth, that which was unfortunately too well known to the House and to the country—that very great distresses had long prevailed in Manchester and its neighbourhood. Those distresses, which for some years past had weighed heavily on the lower classes, induced them to apply to parliament for relief; but their prayer not having been attended to, the consequence was, that a very general opinion had been entertained in that quarter in favour of parliamentary reform, as the only mode by which their situation could be ameliorated. In that opinion, he entirely concurred. He conceived that reform was necessary; but to what extent, or by what means it ought to be carried into effect, he did not at that moment presume to determine. The petition went on to state, that various meetings were held in that neighbourhood on the subject of reform, and at length one was called in the month of August last, which, in consequence of an illegality in the notice, did not take place. Another was convened for the 16th of that month. The result of that meeting, and the calamity which fell on many of the persons who were present at it, the House and the country were so well aware of, that he would not trouble them with any remarks on the subject. Notwithstanding what fell from the noble lord the other night, who thought fit to declare, that the whole case which had been made out on the part of the people, was founded in calumny—that it did not rest on the slightest evidence, he must say that he had read, and read most attentively, all the details of the transaction; and he pledged himself it would appear, that no less than eight or ten merchants and manufacturers, whose credit was perfectly unimpeached, had distinctly sworn to the truth of those allegations which the noble lord had attempted to disprove. When those statements, which were now only partially known, were laid before the public, containing, as they did, verbatim, the evidence of most respectable people, they would be found to corroborate much of what had been said relative to the transactions of the 16th of August. He did not mean to assert, that they would establish completely the truth of all that had been advanced; but he was bound to declare, that, in his opinion at least, those eight or ten persons had spoken nothing but what was strictly true. If it was necessary to sum up the evidence, he believed it would be found that all those points which appeared to be contradictory, might be so united together, as to make out one clear, distinct, plain tale, that would not impeach the testimony of any man of honour, acting in the capacity of a witness, but would fully establish this truth—that the conduct of the military on that occasion was cruel in the extreme. The petitioners stated, that they, as well as the persons injured, had endeavoured, as far as lay in their power, to appeal for justice to the ordinary tribunals of their country. In the first instance, certain cases were selected, and sent before the grand jury, but unsuccessfully. It would be highly unbecoming in him to cast any reflection on the decision of that body, because independent of the respect which was due to an institution of that kind, and leaving out of consideration the conviction which he felt that twenty-four gentlemen, acting on their oath, would proceed cautiously, he might be permitted to say, that there were individuals on that grand jury, with whom he had been connected in ties of intimacy and friendship during the whole course of his life, even from his childhood, who, he was convinced, would perform their duty most conscientiously. Amongst these was his noble friend below him (lord Stanley), who acted as foreman of the grand jury, than whom no man possessed a more honest head or heart. He was incapable of doing an unworthy action. Having tried the grand jury, and failed, the petitioners applied to the magistrates, and were informed by them, that they could not interfere, since it would ill become them to act as judges in their own cause. They next laid their complaint before the magistrates at Warrington, who stated, that they did not approve of the transactions at Manchester, but declined to take any cognizance of the business. Thus situated, they deemed it necessary to address that House, as the grand inquest of the nation; they prayed for their interference, and besought parliament to cause an investigation to be set on foot with respect to the whole of the proceeding. They entreated the House to inquire, whether the magistrates had exercised a sound or a mischievous discretion; and, above all, whether his majesty's government, in giving thanks to the magistrates for their conduct during these proceedings, had not afforded the sanction of the Prince Regent's authority to an act which was viewed throughout the country with universal abhorrence. He most anxiously called on the House to receive this petition, and to attend to its prayer; because, from all he could learn, he believed there did exist a general distrust in the proceedings of parliament, which he wished, as much as possible, to remove. The tone and temper of the popular mind was much soured by those recent transactions. He believed one great feature of the English character to be, the love of impartial justice. It had "grown with their growth, and strengthened with their strength;" and the little attention which of late years had been paid to the petitions of the people, appeared to him to be one of the greatest calamities that had ever befallen the country, because it had tended to widen the differences which unfortunately existed between the Commons of England and the Commons House of Parliament—a difference which no man could perceive without deep regret, and which all who wished well to their country would endeavour to remove. The hon. member concluded by moving, "That the petition be brought up."

Sir Robert Wilson, in seconding the motion, said, he concurred most cordially in all that had been offered by his hon. friend. Having read the whole of the evidence, as well as the papers that had been laid before the House, and which might be said to be a bill of indictment against the people of Manchester, he would plainly declare, it was his conscientious conviction, that the only offence committed by the people was, not a resistance vi et armis, against the civil power, but that sort of unintentional resistance which a dense crowd of persons could not avoid giving to those who endeavoured to force their way through them. He believed that no resistance was offered to prevent the party from approaching the hustings; and it appeared to him, that no attempt was made to apprise the people that the civil power wished to approach, for a particular purpose. If such an intention had been made known to Mr. Hunt, he had declared that he would himself have made way, and submitted at once to the civil authority. This was proved by what occurred when Mr. Hunt was apprehended. He immediately asked, "Have you a warrant? I will yield to the civil power; but I will not recognize military authority." The magistrates did, most unconstitutionally, order an armed body to advance against an unoffending multitude, composed of reformers and non-reformers, of spectators as well as actors. This was undeniable. But whether the military conducted themselves with temper—whether they exercised that sound discretion which they ought—whether they advanced with due caution—whether they were accompanied by a civil officer—and whether, having flourished their swords about their heads, they advanced rapidly, killing a constable and an unfortunate woman and her child, overturning and trampling on a feeble old man, who was supported by a crutch, and maiming in their course 400 or 500 persons—these things had not been inquired into, and they were matters of too serious a nature not to demand investigation. However the encomiums that had been pronounced on captain Birley by his hon. friend, and by the noble chairman of the grand jury, might have been deserved, still nothing appeared in that gentleman's evidence which controverted the statements that had been made relative to the conduct of the cavalry. He wished to say nothing to prejudge that individual's case, but he was certainly charged on oath with being one of the party who, on that occasion, cut down a man near the hustings, which man was supposed to be John Lees, and he was therefore implicated in the business which was now pending before the coroner. Another point of importance was the fact that the swords of the yeomanry were sharpened. Notwithstanding all that had been said within the walls of that House, nothing had been adduced that could contradict this statement, which was fully borne out by the evidence given before the coroner. [Coughing, and other marks of impatience.] If gentlemen would have a little patience, he could substantiate his statement. Daniel Kennedy, who was the cutler employed on the occasion, gave the following evidence:—"In the week ending the 17th of July, I had done 63 swords. Previously to the 16th of August I was told to sharpen those that remained very well." He was asked "Did you make them very sharp?" The answer was, "Yes." It was next demanded, "Were the swords ever brought to you to be sharpened before?" He answered, "From time to time they were brought to me to be cleaned, but not to be sharpened." "Did any of those swords want repairing?" "Some of them," said Kennedy, "might, but they were sent to be sharpened." He was then asked, "Did they want sharpening?" He answered, "They were as sharp as swords usually are." If this evidence could be disproved, it must be done by information not yet before the House. As no judicial inquiry was likely to be obtained under existing circumstances—as there was no chance that justice would be done to the parties injured, in the county of Lancaster, and inquiry ought to be instituted in that House. When, in the first instance, the coroner's officer refused to proceed with the inquest—when one coroner had manifested a degree of indecency which he would not state to the House—when they saw another acting most improperly, as he had done—when they knew that 27 persons were kept in custody for eleven weeks, and then discharged without any offence being proved against them, and without being held to bail, it was impossible not to conclude that the county of Lancaster, under the present circumstances, was out of the pale of the law. He therefore hoped, in common with his hon. friends around him (to whom he was bound by no party ties, whom he supported, because he thought they had the best interests of the country at heart), that the whole of the case would be minutely investigated. He trusted his hon. friends would persevere in the course they had adopted, that they would place themselves in "the imminent deadly breach," and defend to the last the laws and constitution of the country. He hoped they would not allow any bill to go through that House which was calculated to trench on the liberty of the subject, until a full, fair, and impartial inquiry was conceded.

Mr. Mansfield said, he had no opportunity, more than the gallant general who had just sat down, of forming an opinion on this subject; but, having read the papers that were submitted to the House, he was free to confess, that they had led him to form a conclusion very different from that which the gallant general had adopted. The gallant general had spoken of the yeomanry carrying their swords to be sharpened; but he must say, that he was far from being convinced by any thing that had fallen from him, that their swords were improperly sharpened. He admitted that they were sharpened; but it struck him that it would have been a more extraordinary circumstance if they were not sharpened. Because, if he rightly understood the papers in his hand, it appeared, not merely from the statement of the magistrates, and from the evidence given before them, but from the declaration of the grand jury of Chester, that meetings were held at which persons attended armed with pikes and pistols—weapons no doubt proper for the purposes of reform [Hear, hear!]. Could it be supposed that an immense multitude would assemble, armed, for any good purpose? When men met together to petition for their rights, was it necessary that they should carry a pike and a pistol? Was it wonderful that the commander of a military force, when called on to attend such a meeting, should ask his men, "In what state are your arms?" and should direct them to come properly prepared? The gallant general had laid a great deal of stress on what was said at the inquest at Oldham. He must, however, tell the gallant general, that he was very much disposed to disbelieve many of the persons who gave evidence, even on their oath, because several of them were present at the meeting, and had partaken largely of that stream of sedition, impiety and blasphemy, which flowed through the country, and which taught men to treat our Saviour as an impostor. Would men who propagated or who cherished such doctrines be bound by the obligation of an oath? Assuredly not. Men who avowed a hatred to the magistrates, who were opposed to all order, who were desirous to pull down the constitution—such men had an interest in giving evidence of the description to which the gallant general had alluded. Without this explanation, it would be extraordinary if he refused to give credit to the evidence of many of those persons, on oath. In the last session an hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennet), whose philanthropy no man could doubt, brought a case of grievance before the House, which was very proper for inquiry. It was answered by his majesty's ministers; and in the course of the discussion the hon. gentleman said, Dr. Johnson had somewhere observed, "that cases might arise where even powerful circumstances would not carry the weight of conviction against the strong course of probability." In this instance, he conceived the strong course of probability was opposed to many of the statements that had been made. The yeomanry were said to have cut down women and children. He did not believe it. He would not believe that a yeoman or any other man—no, not even the infamous Carlile himself—could be guilty of such an act.

The petition was then brought up and read. It sat forth:

"That for several years past a great proportion of the labouring classes in the district where the petitioners reside have been suffering very severe privations, arising partly from the want of employment, and partly from the inadequacy of their wages to afford them a comfortable subsistence, evils which they have attributed in a principal degree to the great pressure of taxation consequent upon the inadequate representation of the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland in the House; that the same classes have therefore an earnest desire that a reform in the representation of the people may speedily take place; that the political bias of the labouring classes having, as it appears to the petitioners, been rendered more decisive by their personal sufferings, they have, to a great extent, publicly expressed their opinion, that annual parliaments and universal suffrage are necessary, in order sufficiently to guarantee the purity, the independence, and the integrity of the House of Commons; that into the consideration of this point the petitioners do not enter, but they state to the House, that within the last two or three years numerous public meetings, having in view the forwarding of this object, have been held in Manchester and the neighbouring towns, all of which, except where an interference by, or by order of, the magistracy has taken place, have been conducted from their commencement to their termination in an orderly and peaceable manner; that in the latter part of the month of July last, a meeting was announced, by public advertisement, to be held on the 9th day of August, 'to take into consideration the most speedy and effectual mode of obtaining radical reform in the Commons House of Parliament, and also, to consider the propriety of the unrepresented inhabitants of Man-

‘chester electing a person to represent them in parliament, and the adopting Major Cartwright’s bill;’ which meeting having, in consequence of the purpose for which it was called together, been publicly declared by the magistrates acting in and for the division of Manchester to be illegal, was immediately given up by its projectors, and a new notice issued for a meeting to be held on the 16th of August, ‘in order to consider of the propriety of adopting the most legal and effectual means of obtaining a reform in the Commons House of Parliament;’ that for several days before the 16th of August this notice was publicly and widely circulated; that as no intimation whatever was given, or, as the petitioners presumed, could legally be given by the magistrates, that the intended meeting was contrary to law, on the day appointed very numerous bodies of persons from most of the circumjacent towns and villages entered Manchester, walking with considerable regularity in parties of from three to six or eight abreast, accompanied by many women and children, and having along with them bands of music, and also various flags bearing different mottoes or inscriptions, and some of them surmounted with caps of liberty; that all these parties proceeded peaceably by different routes to the place of meeting, viz. the area near St. Peter’s church, where, at about a quarter past one o’clock, the chair was taken by Mr. Hunt; that within ten or fifteen minutes after his arrival, and before he had entered upon the question for the consideration of which the meeting was called together, the corps of Manchester yeomanry, acting as the petitioners believe, under the order of the magistrates, or of some of them, rode impetuously into the immense crowd, many of whom were trampled upon by the horses, or cut by the sabres of the men, and surrounded the hustings, where eight or ten persons, including the chairman of the meeting, and several of those who were most active in calling it together, were, under a warrant issued immediately before by the magistrates, who were then assembled in an adjacent house, taken into the custody of the civil power; that the corps of Manchester yeomanry, together with the regiment of Cheshire yeomanry, and a body of the fifteenth hussars, both of which had by this time come upon the field, did then charge upon the people in all directions, and to a great distance from the place of meeting, in consequence of which eight persons have lost their lives, and not less than four or five hundred of his majesty’s loyal, though suffering subjects, including all ages, from old men and women of seventy-five to young boys and girls of fourteen, were grievously crushed, trampled upon, bruised, maimed, or sabred; that had the only object of the magistrates been to take into custody the persons against whom legal process had been issued for any real or supposed offence by them committed, such object might easily have been obtained without the intervention of any military force, and without injury to any of his majesty’s subjects; that the petitioners understand and believe, and indeed many of them are by personal observation enabled positively to assert, that no act whatever, giving to the meeting the character of a tumultuous and riotous assembly had at the period of this violent incursion of the cavalry been committed; that in the absence of any breach of the public peace, or of any act having a direct, manifest, and unquestionable tendency thereto, it does not appear to the petitioners that the large discretionary powers given to the magistrates by the statute of 1 Geo. 1, c. 5, commonly called the Riot act, can legally be called into action; that, admitting, however the right of the magistrates, in the exercise of their best discretion, to make proclamation commanding the meeting to disperse, the petitioners are induced to believe that at the meeting of the 16th of August no such proclamation was made; because they understand that at none of the inquests held on the bodies of persons who lost their lives upon the occasion was any proof of its being made given; and because neither themselves, nor any person with whom they have conversed upon the subject, ever heard it; that even if the rumour of the reading of the Riot act should turn out to be true, the petitioners have still no hesitation in asserting, that it was not read according to the spirit and intention of the statute, that means were not taken to give due publicity to the circumstance of its having been read, or to induce the people peaceably to depart without incurring its penalties; and further, that not one third of the time allowed by law for the dispersion of an assembly had elapsed between the opening of the business of the meeting and the period at which it was forcibly dissolved by the cavalry; that the petitioners, in common with an immense majority of the country at large, and, as they fondly hope, of the House, are fully convinced that transactions evincing such a total disregard for the safety of an immense multitude of their fellow citizens, involving the infliction of so much severe personal injury, so much loss of life, and constituting such a complete infraction of the inalienable right of Englishmen to assemble, in order to petition for the redress of grievances, real or supposed, peremptorily and imperiously require the most rigid, extensive, and impartial investigation; that, accordingly, with a view thereto, and to obtain justice for the sufferers, at the last assizes for the county of Lancaster bills of indictment were presented against certain individuals, who were identified as having inflicted severe wounds upon the people in the course of the dispersion of the meeting; that, notwithstanding the positive testimony by which these indictments were supported, the grand jury did, for some reason unknown to the petitioners, and of which they can form no conception, think proper to return the said bills 'Ignoramus;' that application was afterwards made to the magistrates acting in and for the division of Manchester, by or on behalf of persons who were wounded on the 16th of August, for warrants against certain individuals on charges of cutting and maiming, such application comprehending not only those persons against whom indictments had been presented at Lancaster, but others whose cases had not previously come before any court of justice, and that the said magistrates positively refused to hear the evidence upon which this application was founded, or to grant the warrants, notwithstanding they were informed that the cases which had been presented at Lancaster were supported by additional evidence, whilst the testimony as to the others was distinct, positive, and complete; that on the 7th day of September, one of the persons who had been wounded on the 16th of August, named John Lees, died at Oldham, and that in the course of the inquest held on the occasion, the reception of evidence necessary, as the petitioners conceive, to the full elucidation of the case, was repeatedly refused by the coroner, who did afterwards, in a manner totally unprecedented, and which was calculated, as the petitioners believe, and intended to obstruct the course of public justice, adjourn the proceedings of the said inquest (without assigning any reason for his conduct) to a distant period; that the petitioners regret the necessity which has obliged them to call the attention of the House to matters cognizable by the established courts of law, but that all the avenues of public justice having been hitherto found so unaccountably closed, they can only look to the House for a full investigation of the affair; that the petitioners feel it necessary to remind the House, that on the 9th of February 1818, a petition from certain of the inhabitants of Manchester was presented to the then House of Commons, setting forth various arbitrary, illegal, and unconstitutional acts, which the petitioners pledged themselves (if so permitted) to prove by evidence at the bar, to have been exercised by the magistrates of that district in the early part of the preceding year; that the House of Commons not only refused to inquire into the truth of the allegations of the said petition, but in conjunction with the other branches of the legislature passed a bill, giving impunity, and even full indemnity to the persons by whom the illegal acts were stated to have been committed, although not one single statement contained in the said petition was ever disproved or shaken; that the impunity and protection then granted to acts contrary to the law of the land, and subversive of individual liberty, have, as the petitioners apprehend naturally emboldened the magistrates, or at least those amongst them by whom the proceedings of the 16th of August were conceived, advised, and directed, to commit that more flagrant violation of the rights and liberties of Englishmen, and that more alarming outrage on the lives of his majesty's subjects, of which the petitioners have now felt it their duty to complain; that the petitioners, appealing to their uniform respect and obedience to the constitutional laws under which they live, in proof of their own constant loyalty, are anxious that the dignified supremacy of the law should be fully and effectually maintained; that its protective powers should be extended equally to the poor as to the rich; and that any breach of it, by whomsoever, or under whatever pretence committed, should be duly yet temperately punished; that the petitioners deeply lament the fact too notorious to admit of denial, that the labouring part of their fellow townsmen and neighbours have upon many recent occasions been treated by the magistrates of that district in a manner utterly unwarrantable and illegal; that, in proof of this statement, the petitioners would inform the House, that on or about the 16th of August last many persons were taken into custody on charges of a political complexion, and that for a period of nearly eleven weeks those persons were detained in prison, whilst they were ultimately discharged from custody on the 30th of October last, not only without trial, but without any bills of indictment, or even articles of the peace having ever been presented against them; that as the poverty of these unfortunate victims of capricious tyranny, prevents them from seeking legal redress, the petitioners conceive that unless the House interfere to procure them justice the protection of the law will be virtually withdrawn from them, whilst, to assert the practical equality of the enactments of law, its administration here remaining unchanged, will only be adding the cruelty of insult to the injustice of oppression; having therefore a deep sense of the importance of the circumstances which they have herein stated, knowing their momentous consequence with reference to the future liberties of Englishmen, anxious for the speedy rendering of strict and impartial justice, and that the magistrates and soldiery, if guilty, may be punished, if innocent absolved from blame, the petitioners do most earnestly request and intreat, that the House will be pleased to institute a prompt, public, impartial, and full inquiry into the transactions of the 16th of August, and those which have resulted therefrom."

On the motion, that it be laid on the table,

Mr. Boote Wilbraham said, he was desirous of expressing his firm conviction, that the statements made by the hon. gentleman and the gallant general were not at all likely to be proved. He was convinced that the statement he had made on a former evening was the just one. The speech of the hon. gentleman was calculated to make an impression on the House which the petition itself did not warrant. He here begged to make an observation respecting the sharpening of the swords. About the middle of July an order was given for sharpening them, and the swords which were sharpened in the end of July and the beginning of August belonged to those members of the corps who had forgotten to send in their weapons originally, for no order was given subsequent to the first.

Mr. Bennet, in moving, that the petition be printed, said, the hon. gentleman who had recently spoken was rather too harsh in his censure on all the persons who had been examined before the coroner. Of the facts, he (Mr. B.) certainly had no personal knowledge; but he would pause much before he condemned all the persons who attended at the meeting of the 16th of August, as being tainted with the doctrines of Paine, and converted to the principles of infidelity and blasphemy. He, for one, thought those sweeping censures did a great deal of harm. They tended to widen the unfortunate breach which existed between parliament and the people. Whatever the opinions of gentlemen might be with respect to individual guilt, they ought not to cast a general slander on large bodies of men, about whom they knew nothing. He would tell the hon. gentleman who had uttered this censure, that there were amongst those who gave evidence, persons of sober, calm, and religious habits. One of them had come up to town on a journey of philanthropy, to propose to the House those measures for the protection of children in factories, which were carried last year. He knew that individual, and his object was, to protect not only him, but all those persons who had given evidence, from the charge that had been made against them; because it was most unfair to make those general accusations in the absence of all proof.

Mr. Mansfield said, he had not meant to make so sweeping an assertion as was attributed to him. He felt, however, that he had a right to make a strong assertion, because one of those persons who gave evidence against the magistrates, admitted that he had himself marched a large party from Leeds to that meeting.

The petition was then ordered to be printed.

PETITION OF MR. HUNT COMPLAINING OF MISREPRESENTATION OF HIS CONDUCT.] Mr. Alderman Wood said, he had been requested to present a petition which he had previously read, and which contained nothing disrespectful towards the House. It complained of the Manchester magistrates—of the juries—of the officers—and more pointedly and strongly of his majesty's ministers. Attached to the petition there had originally been five affidavits respecting the intention of the petitioner to institute proceedings in the court of King's-bench, which he had been prevented from doing on the ground of his not being a professional man; but as the forms of the House did not allow such documents to be presented, he had removed them. After what he had said, the House would not be surprised when he told them that the petitioner's name was Henry Hunt. He stated generally the nature of the transactions at Manchester, declared that the papers laid on the table of the House were entirely false, and prayed that he might be called to the bar to prove his allegations, which he confidently pledged himself to do, not by his own testimony alone, but by the testimony of numerous respectable characters, totally unconnected with the reformers.

The petition was then brought up, and read. It purported to be the petition of Henry Hunt, esq. of Middleton Cottage, Hants: and sat forth, “ That the petitioner having been invited to preside as chairman at a public meeting proposed to be held at Manchester on the 16th day of August last, for the purpose as expressed by the requisitionists, and by the advertisements and placards published for calling the same, of taking into consideration ‘ the most legal and effectual means of obtaining a reform of the Commons House of parliament;’ and the petitioner approving of such intention, and considering the objects to be perfectly legal and constitutional, as well as necessary, without any hesitation accepted, and attended the same as an act of public duty towards his distressed and suffering fellow countrymen; that on the petitioner's arrival in Lancashire on finding that considerable irritation had been excited among the people by an interference of the magistrates to prevent a previous meeting which had been announced, the petitioner with a view to tranquillize the public mind, secure the public peace, and exhibit the true objects of the meeting beyond the possibility of successful misrepresentation wrote, and caused to be printed and circulated, an address to the inhabitants of Manchester and its neighbourhood, of which the following are the principal paragraphs: ‘ You will meet on Monday next, my friends, and by your steady, firm, and temperate deportment you will convince all your enemies you feel that you have an important and an imperious public duty to perform, and that you will not suffer any private consideration on earth to deter you from exerting every nerve to carry your praise-worthy and patriotic intentions into effect; the eyes of all England, nay, of all Europe, are fixed upon you, and every friend of real reform, and of rational liberty, is tremblingly alive to the result of your meeting on Monday next; our enemies will seek every opportunity, by the means of their sanguinary agents, to excite a riot, that they may have a pretence for spilling our blood, reckless of the lawful and certain retaliation that would ultimately fall on their heads; every friend of real and effectual reform is offering up to Heaven a devout prayer, that you may follow the example of your brethren of the metropolis, and by your steady, patient, persevering, and peaceable conduct on that day, frustrate their hellish and bloody purpose; come then, my friends, to the meeting on Monday, armed with no other weapon but that of a self-approving conscience; determined not to suffer yourselves to be irritated, or excited by any means whatsoever to commit any breach of the public peace; our opponents have not attempted to show that our reasoning is fallacious, or that our conclusions are incorrect, by any argument but the threat of violence, and to put us down by the force of the sword, the bayonet and the cannon; they assert that your leaders do nothing but mislead and deceive you, although they well know that the eternal principles of truth and justice are too deeply engraven on your hearts; and that you are at length become (unfortunately for them) too well acquainted with your own rights, ever again to suffer any man, or any faction to mislead you; we hereby invite the boroughreeve, or any of the nine wisemagistrates who signed the proclamation declaring the meeting to have been held on Monday last illegal, and threatening at the same time all those who abstained from going to the said meeting; we invite them to come amongst us on Monday next; if we are wrong, it is their duty, as men, as magistrates, and as christians, to endeavour to set us right by argument, by reason, and by the mild and irresistible precepts of persuasive truth; we promise them an attentive hearing, and to abide by the result of conviction alone; but once for all we repeat, that we despise their threats, and abhor and detest those who would direct or control the mind of man by violence or force: I am, my fellow countrymen, your sincere and faithful friend, Henry Hunt: that several affidavits were on the second day of the present term tendered by the petitioner to the judges of the court of King's-bench at Westminster, for the purpose of obtaining a criminal information against the bench of magistrates of Manchester, for the criminal acts and wrongs therein described; which affidavits were not however permitted to be read, on the novel ground that no one could be allowed to move in a proceeding which merely tended to establish a criminal prosecution except through his majesty's attorney or solicitor general, or other counsel; although this new rule of court is obviously contrary to the principle, which permits every man in person to accuse before a grand jury, and is in direct violation of Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights: the petitioner therefore immediately applied to the public law officer of the crown, the attorney general, and offered to lay his whole case, and the affidavits before him, that he might move the court on behalf of the public, which the attorney general refused; the petitioner is therefore compelled to submit his case to the consideration of the House, as the only means which the constitution now appears to present, and which at the same time is commensurate with the power and influence of the offenders, particularly after they had received the countenance of his majesty's ministers by the official thanks of his royal highness the Prince Regent; the petitioner respectfully submits to the consideration of the House, that as the persons guilty of the outrages described in those affidavits, consisted of ten magistrates acting in the vicinity, having extensive local and family connexions, and as the officers and privates of the yeomanry cavalry who perpetrated the cruelties therein described were in like manner intimately connected with all or most of the persons exercising juridical and magisterial authority in the county of Lancaster, and were supported by a numerous train of dependents, unprincipled and desperate characters connected with the police, as it is notorious

it must always be the case in police establishments; the petitioner and ten other persons, whose political rights had been violated, and whose persons had been outraged, had, and can have no chance of obtaining redress or justice in the said district under such influence; and therefore the petitioner and his fellow-sufferers not only found themselves insolently baffled in every attempt which they made to obtain legal redress, but the said criminal parties, for the purpose of giving colour to their errors or crimes, conspired to invent, fabricate, and sustain criminal charges against the petitioner and his friends, and had the hardihood to commit them to solitary dungeons in the local prison, on charges of high treason; which impotent and malignant charges they afterwards abandoned, but for the pretence aforesaid, still persisted in charging the outraged, injured, and insulted petitioner and his friends with a misdemeanor and conspiracy, demanding excessive bail of them, and in a vexatious and wanton manner sending the petitioner and others upwards of fifty miles through the country to Lancaster castle, under the parade of military escort, and accompanied by every circumstance calculated to wound the feelings of the petitioner and his friends and fellow sufferers: and as it happened: that the assizes were held about ten days afterwards the said criminal parties hoping to take advantage of the excessive irritation which all the circumstances above described had created in the county, and of the influence which they necessarily possessed over the prejudices of many of the grand jurors, who consisted wholly of persons in the magistracy of the said county, and who therefore were unavoidably actuated by the very same party violence which had misled their brother magistrates of Manchester in committing those crimes which it was now become necessary, under colour of law, to screen from inquiry and punishment; that is to say, the said magistrates and yeomanry of Manchester, through the agency of their friends, connexions, and relatives, who composed the grand jury aforesaid, and aided by the solicitor of his majesty's treasury, proceeded to act the unworthy farce of presenting indictments against the petitioner and his friends for a pretended conspiracy, for acts committed by them in the open face of day, in presence of the whole world, and in which they were supported by the immemorial rights, customs, and usages of the English people, and by the laws and constitution of the realm as exercised by their ancestors, and secured by acts of parliament, by the common law of the land, and by the coronation oath of the sovereign; the petitioner who profoundly respects all the legitimate arrangements of the jury system, is nevertheless persuaded, that his suspicions, in regard to the purity of the proceedings at Lancaster, will not be considered either as light or frivolous; and he ventures to suggest that so palpable was the connexion of the magistrates and yeomanry with the grand jury at Lancaster, that nothing but the consciousness of the necessity of shielding themselves under the colour of a form of law, could have stimulated them to adopt the gross measure of appealing for their justification to a grand jury of such men so situated; but although the petitioner formally protested against some of the jurors, who he had been able to discover were relations, and notoriously connected with the parties against whom he had better reason to complain, and who were implicated in the atrocities committed on the 16th of August at Manchester, and against whom bills of indictment for capital felonies the petitioner was prepared to present: yet these objections of the petitioner were overruled by the judge before whom the said parties were about to be sworn as grand jurors; and the said grand jury, composed as aforesaid, proceeded to entertain the said charges against the petitioner and his friends, and actually laid aside certain indictments which the petitioner and his friends had previously preferred against three persons who had committed palpable perjury before the magistrates at Manchester, and who, as afterwards appeared, were witnesses on the indictment against the petitioner and his friends; and to this, and the following circumstances, the petitioner most earnestly invites the attention of the House; viz. that the said grand jury had found a true bill for perjury against one Owen, and they had before them other indictments against two wretches of the names of Platt and Derbyshire, who had falsely sworn to the very same facts as the said Owen, and against whom the very same evidence was ready to be adduced; but as soon as the indictments against the petitioner and his friends for the said pretended conspiracy were carried before the said grand jury, composed as aforesaid, and the names of the said Platt and Derbyshire appeared as witnesses on the back of the said indictment, the said grand jury refused to proceed further in the investigation of the three indictments before them, one of which they had found, but proceeded to investigate the indictments against the petitioner and his friends, actually receiving the evidence of the said Platt and Derbyshire in support of the same, and then, after finding on such evidence, and that of three or four other similar dependents of the police true bills against the petitioner and his friends for a conspiracy as aforesaid, the said grand jury ignored the indictment against the witnesses Platt and Derbyshire, although they had found a true bill for the very same fact, on the very same evidence, against Owen; that these facts, of which the petitioner has made affidavit in the humble judgment of the petitioner, prove beyond the possibility of doubt or equivocation, that although there were honourable men on the said grand jury, yet that the number of twelve required by law to determine a bill were influenced in their judgments by passions and feelings of which men are too frequently the patients and therefore it cannot be a matter of surprise, that a true bill was found against the petitioner and his friends, for acts which, it is palpable, were as notorious as the sun at noon day, and which, till it suited their purpose, had always been considered as meritorious duties of Britons and freemen, while the bills for unparalleled and cruel outrages were ignored; nevertheless, as the petitioner respectfully submits to the House, it must be obvious, that against so powerful a conspiracy of local authorities countenanced as they have been by his majesty's ministers, and aided by the law officers of the crown, who are supported by the public treasury of the United Kingdom, the petitioner has no rational ground of hope for justice and redress but in the power and authority of the House; that besides the application above described, to the court of King's-bench, and to the attorney general, the petitioner brought witnesses from Lancashire at a heavy cost, for the purpose of presenting indictments before that grand inquest, which, as appertaining to the court of King's-bench, may be supposed to have co-extensive jurisdiction with its court, which jurisdiction it unquestionably had before the judges were made itinerant, and which has been taken from it by no statute; yet on this occasion, the said grand inquest of all England, by which name it was heretofore known, was designated by the judge as the grand jury for Middlesex, and described as local in its jurisdiction, and incompetent to receive the indictments preferred by the petitioner; that as the petitioner verily believes the said criminal parties, for the purpose of securing their own impunity, have made false representations to his majesty's government by which they obtained the thanks of the Prince Regent, while the ministers of his Royal Highness, with a view to support their own hasty proceedings in so thanking the said criminal parties, have submitted their false statements to the House as authentic documents worthy of the respect and credence of the House, but the petitioner hereby declares, that within his knowledge, the greater part of the said statements, as relating to the proceedings at Manchester, are utterly false; and he therefore earnestly prays, that he may be called to the bar of the House, and there permitted to prove all and every the allegations contained in this his humble petition, which he is anxious to do, not only by his own testimony but which he respectfully pledges himself (if permitted, to confirm beyond the possibility of doubt, by the testimony of numerous respectable persons of family, fortune, and character, totally unconnected with the reformers in any way whatever."

On the question, that the petition be printed, there was a loud cry of "No, no!" and there appeared a momentary disposition to divide, but it was abandoned and the petition was ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the House resolved itself into a committee to consider of a motion for granting a Supply to his Majesty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved a resolution, "that a Supply be granted to his Majesty."

Mr. Grenfell observed, that he had seen in the public papers that there had been a deficiency in the revenue in the last quarter to the amount of eight millions. The amount was so great that he confessed it staggered him. It, however, required some explanation, and he requested his right hon. friend would have the goodness to give it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the alleged deficiency was not an actual deficiency, unless the sum issued to make good the deficiencies of former periods could be so called. There was an actual surplus. Since the incorporation of the treasuries of Great Britain and Ireland two millions and a half had been borrowed in the Spring from the consolidated fund for the service of Ireland. To this was added six millions for the purpose of making good the deficiencies he had already described. Instead of any deficiency having taken place in the quarter ending the 10th of October last, there was an increase. It was true, however, that the surplus in that of every year was generally considerable; and, comparatively considered, the surplus of the quarter ending on the 10th of last October, was not so great as that of the corresponding quarter of the preceding year, it being only 300,000*l*. The total amount of the deficiency of that quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter of the year immediately preceding, was 1,100,000*l*., although it exceeded the amount of the corresponding quarter of the year 1817. Of that 1,100,000*l*. of comparative deficiency, 920,000*l*. was under the head of Customs, which was chiefly attributable to the stagnation of trade, of which so much had been said in the discussions last session in the Bank committee, and in some degree proceeding from the consolidation of the customs in the last session, which occasioned a larger sum to be paid in preceding quarters by those who were desirous to avoid the increase of duty caused by that consolidation. The comparative deficiency in the excise was nearly 200,000*l*. He was happy, however, to say, that in the period which had elapsed between the 10th of October, and the meeting of parliament, a very considerable improvement in the revenue had manifested itself.

The resolution was then agreed to.

SEDITIONOUS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] On the motion of lord Castlereagh, the clerk read the following passages from the Speech of his royal highness the Prince Regent, on the opening of the session:—

"I regret to have been under the necessity of calling you together at this period of the year; but the seditious practices so long prevalent in some of the manufacturing districts of the country, have been continued with increased ac-vity since you were last assembled in parliament.

“ They have led to proceedings incompatible with the public tranquillity, and with the peaceful habits of the industrious classes of the community; and a spirit is now fully manifested, utterly hostile to the constitution of this kingdom, and aiming not only at the change of these political institutions, which have hitherto constituted the pride and security of this country, but at the subversion of the rights of property, and of all order in society.

“ I have given directions that the necessary information on this subject shall be laid before you, and I feel it to be my indispensable duty to press on your immediate attention the consideration of such measures as may be requisite for the counteraction and suppression of a system, which, if not effectually checked, must bring confusion and ruin on the nation.”

Lord Castlereagh said, that in rising pursuant to his notice to call the attention of the House to the state of the country, as described in the passages which had just been read from his royal highness the Prince Regent's most gracious Speech, he confessed that he never felt a more awful impression of the painfulness and difficulty of any task that he had undertaken to execute. It was painful, for what could give greater pain to a minister of the crown than to be required by an imperative sense of duty to propose to parliament the adoption of measures of a restrictive and coercive nature? It was difficult—for while the House, the country, and every loyal British subject were entitled in the present serious crisis—a crisis, indeed, of imminent danger, unless parliament met the evil with manly firmness and vigour—to look to his majesty's ministers for the means of affording adequate security for life and property, and for the safety of the constitution, they were entitled to claim from his majesty's government that they should make any propositions which they might determine on bringing forward, as much as possible, in the spirit of the constitution under which we happily lived; and to expect, that while they recommended the measures which to them appeared calculated to meet the public exigency, they should not forget the sacred principles of right and liberty, which had made Great Britain a source of admiration and envy to all surrounding nations. He could assure the House, that his majesty's government were most anxious to secure this double object; and while they directed their efforts against the abuses by which the public tranquillity was menaced, to protect as much as possible the best and dearest interests of the people. Having endeavoured to reconcile these conflicting principles, his majesty's ministers looked with confidence for the support in that House of a large portion of those who differed from them on questions of general policy, as they were most earnest in wishing to preserve the freedom of the subject, while they purged the land of the evils that the abuse of that freedom had generated.

As the House naturally looked to him for an intelligible detail of the circumstances which made the measures he intended to propose necessary, as well as of the nature of those measures, he felt he must occupy their attention for a considerable portion of time. He should now, without any further preface, even though some of the measures were to originate in the other house, offer all of them to their consideration, in order that no member might give an opinion upon them without seeing the full scope of each individual proposition, both as an isolated proposition, and as a proposition connected with others, and without being able to judge whether they would so fit in with each other as to make a perfect and consistent whole. He should, of course, support each and all of these measures, and the general principles upon which they were founded; but, in order to save the time of the House, he should not enter into any minute reasonings upon them at present, but state them broadly though distinctly. In order the more fully to direct the attention of the House to this point, he hoped he might for the present be allowed to assume as fact, the existence of the evils which the measures in question went to correct, not depriving the House of the right of discussing this part of the subject at any future stage of their proceedings. He would then assume for the present on the authority of the Speech from the throne, that great danger existed in the country; that there had been disclosed in the country a spirit which was incompatible with the constitution of the kingdom—that it threatened the destruction of all those rights which were most valuable—and that it aimed not only at the change of all those political institutions which had hitherto constituted the pride and security of the country, but also at the subversion of property, and of course of all those rights on which society depended, which, if not speedily checked, was calculated to overthrow the principles upon which the property and happiness of society rested. These facts he had a right to consider as fortified by the speech of the right hon. member who moved the amendment to the address, as well as by the statements of several of the hon. members who supported it. That right hon. member had admitted, that there had gone abroad a wild and impracticable spirit of reform, which menaced not only the happiness of society generally, but more particularly the interests of the poor deluded persons who possessed it, and with several of his friends, had pledged himself to uphold the constitution against such doctrines to the utmost of his power. He was also confirmed in the statement which he had just made, by the opinions which had been formed by a set of gentlemen best calculated to judge of the situation of the country—he meant the magistracy and the grand juries of Cheshire and Lancashire, and of several other counties. If he wanted any farther authority on the subject, he had it in the statement of the noble lord who represented the county of Lancashire, a county containing a million of inhabitants, and possessing a large portion of the wealth and commerce of the country. In that county, according to that noble lord's statement, there existed a spirit of disaffection bordering on rebellion. The hon. member for Taunton also had mentioned the order of things in some of the manufacturing districts to be such as that either the House must put them down without delay, or else they would overpower the constitution, and further, that there were no interests more at stake than those of the poor deluded people by whom such opinions were entertained. From these statements he felt he had a right to assume the existence of that danger which induced his majesty's government to bring forward such measures as they in their consciences believed to be imperatively called for, and most effectual in rescuing the country from its perilous situation. In the statement he was about to make, he should be sorry to make any impression on the country that could be considered as imputing disaffection to the great mass of the people. He had an individual pride (individual, he meant, as he was connected by birth and education with that part of the empire), in stating, that as far as Ireland was concerned, she had never experienced a greater degree of tranquillity, and he might add prosperity, than at this moment. There were, perhaps, one or two exceptions, but they were of a very trifling nature. Long might she continue in that state! Long might she continue to feel the value and importance of that constitutional position in which she had at last had the good sense to place herself, and which he doubted not would prove the source of numerous benefits to her, while it entitled her to the entire confidence of the sister country. In Great Britain, also, he was happy to state that the great body of the agricultural interests never enjoyed a greater state of repose than at this moment; and he hoped he might add, that it was fast recovering from that depression into which it had unhappily fallen. When he said this, he was not insensible to the difficulties with which the landed interest had still to contend; but comparing its present situation with that in which, at no distant period, it had been, he thought he was warranted in expressing himself in the language which he had used. Considering nothing so important as that the subject should be stripped of all exaggeration, he was bound to state, that even in the manufacturing districts, he believed the loyal were sufficiently strong to put down, by themselves, the disaffected; but this could not be accomplished without risk of great devastation, ruin, and misery. It was not for the state therefore that he trembled, but it was for the inhabitants of certain districts, who had claims on the government for protection, and for the deluded reformers themselves; and on those grounds he called on parliament to support the law and to guard against the evils of a threatened rebellion. Into the causes of the discontent and dissatisfaction which prevailed, he did not feel inclined to enter at present; on a future occasion he should not shrink from discussing them; but all that he should now say was, that as far as his inquiries went (and they had not been scanty), he could not discover that the market for our industry had been narrowed either at home or abroad. At home it had certainly increased, and abroad there was no defalcation but in one instance, which was well calculated to teach the deluded men who were ever complaining of the system of government established in this country, a salutary lesson. The American market was the only one that had failed us. It was there—in a country which was represented as a perfect paradise—in a country governed under a system which many in England believed it was only necessary to adopt here to relieve us from all our burdens; it was in America that the greatest distress was found to exist, and there our commerce had experienced failures which were unknown in Europe. There had certainly been a depression felt in various branches of our trade from the termination of the war, but these were no more than were to be expected in the common course of things, and to these time alone could bring an effectual remedy. He was confident that no sober-minded rational man could for a moment believe that they were to be removed by any parliamentary interference.

He would now proceed to the most important object of the night, to the remedies which his majesty's ministers proposed to apply to the evils complained of. In enumerating them, he would name them in the order in which the state of the country seemed to call for them. They divided themselves into five heads. He would begin with that which was most pressing in point of time, and name that last which was most important with a view to tranquillising the country. The first subject was the tumultuous meetings which had become common, which were marked with a character wholly different from that of peaceful deliberation, which had never been known in this country till of late years, which were quite an innovation upon all its habits, customs, and prejudices, which were borrowed from the worst days of France, and which conduced most essentially to the progress of the revolution in that country. The second subject was that part of the system of the disaffected, which, if not checked, would lead to results the most extensively mischievous;—he meant the training of large bodies of men for military, he might add, for rebellious purposes, without the authority of the Crown. The third was more of a local character, and went to give magistrates the extraordinary powers confided to them by an act passed in the year 1812, and enable them to search for and seize arms, where they had a right to believe they were secreted for improper purposes. The fourth measure would go to ensure the more speedy administration of justice in certain cases, and particularly to expedite the trials of those charged with misdemeanors. The fifth went to affect that great and most important engine, the press, but only that part of it, which, in contradiction to the general press of the country, he might be allowed to call the treasonable, blasphemous, and seditious branch of the press. With regard to the first of these measures, he must desire the House to consider the abstract right on which the right of meeting to petition was founded. No man could value more highly than he did the right which the people unquestionably enjoyed to meet to consider on the grievances which they felt, either individually or collectively, and to carry to the foot of the throne or of parliament their petitions for redress of them. From the mode, however, in which this right had recently been laid down, and from the doctrines which had been founded upon it, it appeared to him, that unless common sense was applied to the law which had recently been promulgated on this subject (and law and common sense did not travel so far asunder as some people thought), the abuse of that right must inevitably lead to sanguinary rebellion in the first case; and that which was its never-failing concomitant, military despotism, in the second. He lamented most strongly, and he thought that several of those who had signed the requisitions for county meetings also lamented, that they had stated in such broad terms the right of the people to assemble. He had, however, never seen among the many resolutions which had been adopted any document officially signed, which carried this right to a higher point than the famous one signed by Thistlewood, who, no doubt, had good legal radical assistance. In that document it was stated, that he (Thistlewood) knew of no law that could prevent 1,000, 10,000, 100,000, or 1,000,000 of persons from assembling; and no magistrate, it went on to say, could touch them till they struck some blow; and that it made no difference whether they met with or without arms, with or without flags, or with or without all that novel paraphernalia which had lately rendered those meetings so conspicuous. Now, he would ask, if this ought, in common law, or in common sense, to be allowed. He would ask, whether it was consistent with common law or with common sense, to assert that the people (and, for the sake of the argument, he was at liberty to assume the whole of the people), might meet at one place, and to say that the magistrates were to stand quiet after the meeting was assembled, until some positive damage was done? If such a principle existed, it proved that the law was, on the face of it, an absurdity, totally ineffectual for the purpose of preserving the lives or liberties of the people. If this were the case, the House must allow him to say, we were living in a country whose government was degraded and debased. If this were the case, then the magistrates must on all occasions have recourse to the aid of the military, of the exercise of whose power the country was so naturally jealous. Was it to be tolerated, that in a country whose constitution was so justly the envy and admiration of other nations, the whole of its industry was to be convulsed—the quiet part of the population were to be alarmed,—not with childish fears, but with just terror—that they were to be driven from their business—obliged to close their shops—that the public mind was to be kept in a state of continual ferment and agitation, by a set of itinerant orators, who marched large bodies of men 25 miles through the country, in military array? The minds of the lower orders in this country, were inflamed by artful tales about sinecures and pensions, and they were told that if these were done away, all their grievances would be at an end. He would take upon himself to say, that if the sinecures which had not yet been abolished, were done away—if the whole pension list were surrendered to their wishes, that the benefit derived would not in ten years give the Manchester cotton-spinner, who could earn 30s. a week, the 5s. which he wasted in one day of idleness to attend a reform meeting. This he could prove to demonstration, and with equal ease could he show, that if the reformers could succeed in their dishonest and destructive scheme of annihilating the national debt, that the withdrawing of the interest of 29,000,000*l.* of money from general circulation, though it might relieve some who now contributed largely to the taxes, would depress the markets of the country, augment the general distress, and carry ruin to the humble cottage as well as to the mansion of the great. The gentlemen who advocated the doctrine of Thistlewood, ought to recollect that the law provided against a bellum levatum, as well as a bellum percussum; that meetings even without arms were not allowed to assemble to the terror of his majesty's subjects; and that the magistracy were bound by their oaths to protect the lives and properties of the people, under such circumstances, as far as lay in their power. This fallacious doctrine, however, he was glad to say, was refuted by the late debates in that House, and if no other result had followed from the assembling of parliament, the late discussion was calculated to produce the most beneficial effects in the country. The house and the country were deeply indebted to a right hon. and learned gentleman opposite, for the able and eloquent manner in which he had stated that point on a former evening. Independently of his high legal authority (and higher there was none), there was something so clear and sound in the opinion he gave on the illegality of such meetings, that he must have removed all doubt on the subject. That right hon. and learned gentleman had well said, that although the rights of a British subject allowed him to do every thing which the law did not forbid, he was not permitted to contravene or to trench upon the rights of another. He did not wish to say any thing complimentary of the stream of eloquence which came from his own side of the House; but was there no inference to be drawn from the silence which had prevailed on this subject among the learned and hon. gentlemen opposite? There were occasions when silence was as eloquent, if not more eloquent, than words; and he conceived the present to be one of that nature. He certainly did suppose, that a gentleman of high legal talents on the other side (Mr. Scarlett), notwithstanding his explanations, had pronounced as decided an opinion as was possible, upon the illegality of that meeting, and that he had followed up his argument by making a complaint against his majesty's ministers for suffering several meetings like it (and he had instanced that of Smithfield) to take place subsequently. Another hon. and learned gentleman, who followed in the debate, seemed rather disturbed by the explicitness of this opinion, and therefore introduced into the discussion the swords of the cavalry, which he asserted to have been sharpened for the occasion. That, however, was now exploded. The noble lord opposite had clearly proved, that those swords were sent to be sharpened several days before any intimation was given that a meeting was to be held. Another hon. and learned gentleman, who bore a high, and, he believed, a well-earned reputation in his profession, whom they were to hear to-morrow, had promised to prove the lawfulness of the meeting. With regard to his speech in expectancy, he (lord Castle-reagh) had a right to take it on his side of the question; for if that hon. and learned gentleman had felt any difficulty on the subject, the recent decision of the House must, he should conceive, have removed it. This, however, he would maintain, that if any man could still doubt, whether or not meetings such as he had described were legal or illegal, it was high time for parliament to take care that this embarrassment should be felt no more, regarding what was and what was not the law upon the subject.

He would now call the attention of the House to the measures necessary to meet the evil. In framing the proposed remedies, the first object was, to suit the characteristics of the meetings against which they were to be directed. His first enactment would therefore be, the limitation of numbers. The second was intended to prevent persons residing in distant districts from attending meetings in districts where they did not reside. The third was, to prevent the existence of simultaneous meetings, for the House would recollect, that they had it in evidence, in the letter of general Byng, that this plan, though defeated by a schism among the leaders, had been seriously entertained, in order to divide the military power, and thus give the reformers a better opportunity of making a trial of their physical force. These were the three grand points on which he would stand, and for which he would now use a few short, but, as he thought, decisive arguments. Nobody would say, that any bill could effectually meet the evil which did not limit the numbers; and nobody would assert, that by limiting the numbers, they were trenching upon any substantial right of the people: for if deliberation were the object of their meetings, the great numbers in which they had recently assembled were not calculated to aid it. He had no wish to prevent them from assembling, when deliberation was really the object which they had in view; he had no wish to put an end to those meetings which were the peculiar boast of England, and which, till modern times, had been productive of so much benefit and advantage. In latter times, however, these meetings had been of a different kind, and seemed, from the manner in which they were called, and in which they were conducted, to have been borrowed from another country. They had been held under the sanction of the laws to consider of the means best calculated to overturn, by physical force, the very laws under which they met. Far was it from him to call on the House to do any thing that would operate against the ancient and sacred right of the people to petition, under the protection and with the sanction of the magistrates, or the other constituted authorities of the land. He would, on the contrary, give increased facilities to this mode of petitioning. But meetings not called under such authorities, convened by men without character, rank, or fortune, were, in all probability called for improper objects, and therefore were a fit subject for the animadversion of the law, and it was but reasonable that they should assemble under circumstances that gave a sort of prima facie security against outrage; for the House might rely on it, that unless we could reconcile the exercise of our liberties with the preservation of the public peace, our liberties would inevitably perish, and society come to a speedy dissolution. With respect to the local and numerical modes of regulating the constitution of meetings, it was obvious, that when they came to the extent, in point of numbers, to which meetings ought to be allowed to go, it was impossible to fix any precise limit. An hon. gentleman on the other side had said, that meetings ought to be of such a description, as that the civil power would be sufficient to preserve peace, in order to prevent the indignity of calling in the military power. He could assure the hon. gentleman, however, that meetings could not be reduced to such an extent without chilling all deliberation. Besides, nothing could be more calculated to embarrass magistrates than such a limitation of meetings. Therefore he would propose what would effect the object, without encountering those difficulties or objections. From his proposition he would except county meetings, regularly convened, meetings called by corporate bodies, by grand juries, or by five magistrates. With these exceptions every meeting must be preceded by a notice, for a certain number of days to the magistrates of the intention to call such a meeting, and must be within the parish of the persons assembling; the natural place for deliberation where they could meet with safety, and without loss of time. In reference to the impropriety and danger of allowing immense multitudes to assemble in the manner which had been recently witnessed, he would read the sentiments of a noble lord, who always looked with the greatest jealousy on every thing that might affect the liberty of the subject, and who could not be suspected of a disposition to curtail any popular right. Lord Erskine, in a publication lately given by him to the world (the Defence of the Whigs), applied the following observations to the public grievance of tumultuary meetings: —“ — but holding sacred, as I do, the never-to-be-surrendered right of British subjects to assemble peaceably, to express to each other and to the government of the country their grievances and complaints, yet I feel no difficulty in saying, that nothing can be more obviously useless and mischievous than the assembling of immense multitudes, not in their own communities or neighbourhoods, but by moving upon other thronged and agitated districts. Such meetings, however legal they may be, cannot but be dangerous to the industrious poor, collected at a distance from their own homes, only to disturb the industry of others, aggravating the sufferings of poverty by the interruption of employment, by the hazard of fatal accidents, and the probable temptation to crime.” He did not think it necessary to labour this part of the subject farther. In confining meetings to their respective parishes, it was proposed to make it a misdemeanor for any person, not resident in the parish, to attend a meeting in it. Two objects would be effected by this regulation. But before mentioning them he would remark, that some parishes consisted of more than one large township, under distinct overseers, and were so populous, as to require farther limitations as to public meetings. There were in the country about 30 parishes that were extraordinary populous, that was, they contained a population beyond 20,000 souls. No parish whose numbers were under that population was restricted from a meeting of the whole parish. But with respect to the parishes whose population exceeded that number, a power would be given to quarter sessions, who would not be apt to abuse such a power, to divide them into districts, of which each should contain a population not exceeding 10,000. By this arrangement, it was manifest that there was no intention on the part of ministers to reduce meetings in such a manner as to destroy their popular character. They would, on the contrary, become better fitted for the purposes of discussion, at the same time that they would cease to be attended with danger. One hundred thousand persons would no longer assemble, and those individuals who reduced grievance-making into a trade, would no longer have it in their power to travel about the land and poison the minds of men who had not been aware but that they lived under the mildest government, and had not known that their greatest enemy was the House of Commons. The second object was, to prevent the distraction of the attention of magistrates by vast numbers of simultaneous meetings, not perhaps known to them till the very time of meeting, and then often corresponding with other public meetings, fairs, or markets. For that purpose, it would be required of the persons calling meetings to give notice of their intention six days beforehand to the magistrate, in order that he should have time to consider. The magistrate should also be invested with the power, within four days of that fixed for assembling, to change both the time and place, if he should find it proper, so as to defeat any plan which might have been formed to create confusion. The tumultuary character of meetings would thus be removed, and the system of itinerant orators destroyed. Another measure was one with respect to which, he apprehended, there could be but one sentiment in that House; it was, to put a stop to a practice which never had been British, but was borrowed from the worst times of the French revolution. None would be allowed to attend those meetings either armed or in martial array, nor with those symbols which threatened confusion and danger to the peaceable part of the community; and which presented the appearance of an assemblage demanding rather than petitioning for a redress of grievances. It was the law of this country, that a man might possess arms for the protection of his house; but he felt a persuasion that none would contend, that every person was intitled by law to go forth armed. The principle of laying on certain restrictions in this respect was not unknown to our law. That which he proposed was in fact nothing more than a declaratory law, but he should certainly add a clause, which happily had never been called for before in this country, to prevent any kind of arms from being carried to a public meeting. This would extend to county meetings, as well as to meetings confined to the parish, because even a county meeting in this country had been disgraced by all the weapons and symbols of radicalism. All meetings were therefore comprehended in this measure. There was one point on which he should propose no law; it was the part which women had borne in the late transactions, for he trusted that it would be sufficient to restrain them from similar conduct in future, to let them know, that when the French republicans were carrying on their bloody orgies, they could find no female to join them except by ransacking the bagnios and public brothels. He was happy that no female had attended any public meeting in the metropolis. Such a drama would, he trusted, be put an end to by the innate decorum and the innate sense of modesty which the women of this country possessed, and which would purge the country of this disgrace. The bill which he should propose would, therefore, limit meetings (with the exceptions which he had mentioned) to the parish; would require six days notice to be given to the magistrate before a meeting; would invest the magistrate with the power of changing the day and place within four days of its being held; and would make it an illegal offence for non-residents to attend; or for persons to come with arms or revolutionary symbols, giving a French character to British transactions. The magistrates would of course be empowered to seize such persons, and take them away from the meeting; for, to render the measure effective, it was necessary to strengthen the hands of the magistracy, that they might resist the inroads of people not belonging to their parish. He did not mean that they should turn out any individual whom curiosity might have led to the spot; but if the influx of strangers had a tendency to endanger the peace, or change the nature of the meeting, they should read a proclamation, ordering all strangers to withdraw. If this proclamation was not obeyed, they might then pronounce the meeting to be illegal, and dissolve it. A quarter of an hour would be allowed for the strangers to retire, and half an hour for the meeting to disperse. If after that time more than twelve individuals were found assembled, he should propose to make it not felony with death, but a clergyable felony.—If the hon. and gallant general who had cheered his last statement, was acquainted with the principle of the Riot act, he must be aware that any person standing out against authority was guilty of felony. In 1817 (he did not know whether the gallant general was then a member of that House) a similar principle was acted upon. It would be, in the proposed measure, a clergyable felony; but as parish meetings could not require the usual time to disperse after proclamation, only a quarter of an hour would be allowed for strangers to withdraw, and in half an hour afterwards the meeting should become illegal.

The second subject to which he would call their attention was, the practice of training and drilling. He had omitted however to remark, that debating societies not regulated by a magistrate's licence, were, as by the bill of 1817, included in the restriction which he had detailed. The practice of training and drilling was foreign to every principle of our constitution, and must be reprobated by all who agreed in sustaining constitutional principles. Training, with or without arms, and all military manœuvres, would be prohibited. Meetings for those purposes would be rendered illegal, and magistrates might disperse them at their discretion. A distinction would be made between the drillers and the drilled, because the drillers must be supposed to be more intelligent than the drilled. It was most gratifying to him to be able to say, that, although it had been reported that old soldiers, forgetting their allegiance, had assisted in training others in military exercises, and that although in one or two cases it might be so, yet that the offence had been seldom imitated, and that in general nothing could be more exemplary than the conduct of those who having been the first to take up arms in the service of their country, had been the first at the return of peace to lay them down. For drillers, not only would fine and imprisonment be assigned as a punishment, but it was intended to vest in the court the power of transporting those convicted of that offence, if they thought proper. He now came to the third head. The state of the country, and the secret and seditious practices which prevailed in certain parts of it, called loudly upon parliament to enact some measure without delay for the detection of arms provided for an illegal purpose. The measure he would propose would be drawn from a similar measure which he had proposed to the House in 1812 (the Disarming act for the midland counties). It would extend only to certain counties, but it might be extended to others at the desire of the lord-lieutenant of any county. There was no principle introduced by this measure which could be considered new, always connecting it with the actual state of certain parts of the country; and it would be liable like the measure of 1812 to be repealed if found unnecessary.

Another measure which he had to submit to them, respected the unbounded licence of delay which existed in certain cases of misdemeanor, and it would provide that such persons should go to trial immediately, unless they showed cause to the contrary. No principle could be more congenial to the spirit of the laws, and no measure more called for by the situation of the country, than one which would render the administration of justice in these cases more prompt. An individual charged with a crime which affected his life, was immediately put upon his trial: but in cases of misdemeanors, the accused had it in his power to postpone his trial, so as to defeat the ends of justice, perhaps for a year and a half. The object was, to make such a regulation as would bring misdemeanors more nearly, in that respect, to the state of graver and capital cases. He must observe, however, without stating technical reasons, there were instances in which some delay must take place, as in cases in which there were rights of removing by certiorari from inferior to superior courts. The object of the new law would be, to reduce the time as much as possible, without reducing those rights. On this point it was unnecessary for him to enter into any further explanations; but he should add, that the measure would be connected with another, which the state of the country, he trusted, justified his majesty's ministers in bringing forward, and which should consist in an attempt at realizing the intention which they had long entertained, of facilitating the administration of justice in the country by some regulation respecting the going judges. The long interval between the autumn and spring assizes afforded great opportunities for escaping due punishment, and presented difficulties in repressing dangerous and seditious practices. It would, therefore, be matter of consideration, whether a system could not be arranged that would give a third assize to those counties. His majesty's ministers would have been liable to the charge of having acted upon ex-post-facto principles, if they had proceeded against the individuals charged with a misdemeanor in the county of Lancaster, per saltum, and that was the reason why they had not appointed a special commission, as the accused would thereby have been deprived of the power of traversing.

He now came to what he had postponed to the last, as being, in every constitutional point of view, the most difficult and the most important—he meant the danger which arose from the abuses of the public press. He was very happy to say, that the measure which he had to propose to meet this danger, applied only to what he might call the treasonable and seditious press of the country—to that class of publications, which, unfortunately as the law now stood, were made vehicles for the dissemination not merely of treason and sedition, but also of blasphemy. It was in his opinion utterly impossible for the mind of man long to withstand the torrent of criminal and seductive reasoning which was now incessantly poured out to the lower orders; and unless some remedial principle could be hit upon, compatible with the genius of the constitution, not only all the other measures which he had proposed would be inadequate for the restoration of tranquillity, but the mind of the country could never settle down to industry and content. He was ready to admit that this country owed much of the intelligence and high character, for which it was so eminently distinguished, to its free press; and that we could not hope long to retain that envied pre-eminence without the possession of what every rational man would call a free press; but if a free press could not be made compatible with morality, peace and religion, then a free press might become a great evil, and produce effects by which a free press itself and every other right and advantage we possessed, would be swept away in one general ruin. No endeavour then could be more laudable than one to dispel that well-founded alarm which now existed with respect to the press. He conceived, that nothing which he had to propose would strike at, or touch, what might be considered the two great pillars of a free press. Every man would be at liberty to publish his sentiments without any previous investigation into their nature, and without any thing in the shape of a censorship or restraint upon individual discretion. In the second place, nothing should be done to affect the trial by jury as applied to the question of libel in which the jury had the decision of both law and fact. There was no intention to affect the tribunals appointed by law for the trial of libels, or to prevent any man from publishing his sentiments in the first instance; but measures ought to be adopted to cut off the pestilent abuses of the press, because nothing could lower a free press more than such abuses. The first part of the measure he would propose, was one to which no serious opposition could be made, because, in his opinion, it involved no new principle, but left the law in the same situation as before. It went to protect that law, and to punish and destroy an abuse which had already been long in operation—he knew not precisely how long—but one from which he thought every mischief arose. This abuse had operated greatly to defraud the revenue, and greatly to the prejudice of the respectable persons who were engaged in the conducting of newspapers. If this evasion were to be tolerated, it would have the effect of throwing all the periodical press into the hands of men who had neither property nor the means of procuring security, and enable them to inundate the country with poison, at a price so humble, that no individual, however necessitous, would be unable to purchase it. The law, therefore, which he meant to propose, was, that the political publications, now published without a stamp duty, should be hereafter subjected to a duty like other newspapers. By the stamp laws all advertisements inserted in newspapers were liable to pay a certain tax, consequently the general stamp duty to which newspapers were subjected, had reference more to the other matter contained in them than to advertisements—namely, to the accounts of events and comments on these events, matter of a similar nature to that contained in the publications which, in point of duty, he now wished to assimilate to them. It was also to be taken into account, that as the political pamphlets now circulated were of a small size, they could be furnished at a much cheaper rate than newspapers. Indeed, the authors of some of those publications which had done the most mischief, so far from considering themselves exempt from the law of newspapers, did for a great length of time continue to publish on stamped paper. The price of Cobbett's paper, for instance, had been ten-pence; but suddenly it was published without a stamp and sold for two-pence. What he now proposed was, to follow up the intentions of the Stamp act—to follow to its legitimate conclusion the law as it now stood with respect to newspapers, and while adopting a means to guard against offences of the press, to guard also against frauds committed not merely against the revenue but against the respectable newspaper press—to place the publications in question on the same footing with newspapers. Without now entering into any general definition he might state that it was proposed that any thing of the nature of pamphlets or newspapers, and not exceeding two sheets, containing either news, intelligence, or political discussion, or the description of political and religious subjects, in short, all subjects which might be considered as political, should be held as coming within the description of newspapers, and subjected to the same duty. Such a measure was necessary to prevent the respectable circulation of newspapers from being defeated, and to render the circulation of dangerous publications more expensive. Such was the first regulation which he had to propose. The second regulation was also a principle already established and recognised by law, particularly with regard to this class of publications. The law now declared that the names of publishers in general, not merely of publications of the description of newspapers, but of publications of all sizes, should be given, and that every publication should be considered unlawful which had not the name of the publisher on the face of it, for the purpose of making him amenable to justice. But that regulation was at present rendered completely nugatory by a practice which had been adopted, by which the individual who did the mischief was enabled to escape from the consequences of it. When it was wished to do any act which would draw down the animadversion of the law, the mode adopted for that purpose was to put forward some wretched hack, who for a small hire would run all risk of punishment. Now, if any man would run the risk of being lodged in gaol for a trifling sum, while the individual who was the real author of the offence ran no risk whatever, the object of the law was entirely defeated. He had heard in the case of an individual who was convicted, while another individual for whom the illegal acts was done, could not be touched, that the latter had the impudence to say, "For half-a-crown a day I can always procure a man to stand in my situation, and I can carry on my trade in his name, while he runs all the risks." When it was recollected, too, what time elapsed before applying the penalty of the law after conviction, some remedy on this subject was imperiously called for. What he proposed, was, to check the practice of publication by individuals who had no property in their hands—the practice of individuals who had no visible means of paying the penalty to which they made themselves liable, making themselves responsible for others who derived nearly the whole of the benefit from the publication. In the case of these small publications, he proposed that all persons should be required to give a previous pecuniary security, to abide any judgment that a court of law might pronounce against them either for treasonable, blasphemous, or seditious libels. He did conceive that this would operate in every way for the protection of the respectable part of the press. It would have the effect of bringing forward the man at the bottom of the whole, who would not be allowed to put a faggot in his place. The judgment would attach to the security given, and this he trusted would have the effect of throwing the punishment on the proper person. The third regulation with regard to the press which he proposed was rendered absolutely necessary to give effect to the other two. It was to impose a moderate penalty on all persons publishing or hawking about publications not duly stamped, or not published by persons who had never given any security. If the persons engaged in these publications were not to find instruments for propagating their poison in this manner, they would fail in their object; and therefore it was he proposed to impose a moderate penalty on persons found hawking them, and that the penalty should be recoverable on conviction before a justice of peace or other magistrate. He knew that reproaches had been thrown out against ministers for not taking effectual means for putting a stop to these seditious and treasonable publications, but these reproaches came with a very bad grace from gentlemen who had complained against the late attorney-general for the number of informations ex-officio which he had filed. He knew it might be asked by the other side, "Have you applied the existing laws?" In his conscience he believed, under the existing law, the mischief was beyond the reach of any public prosecutor; his learned friends felt that it could only be dealt with by the regulation proposed, which he had no doubt the House would accede to, as the whole country was interested in protecting the people against the pernicious poison.

He had nothing to state upon the subject of the regulation of the press, but these three measures,—1st, To apply the existing stamp duty applicable to newspapers, to all publications not exceeding two sheets, of the same character. 2nd, To require all publishers to give previous personal security, and two responsible securities in the same sum as himself. 3rd, To apply a penalty recoverable before all magistrates, for hawking about publications, with respect to which the provisions of the law had not been complied with. He was now to call the attention of the House to a subject connected with the last. It was a principle not unknown to our law in many offences, and which he thought ought to be applied to the specific offence now under consideration. The House would remember that in 1796 it was enacted, that upon a second conviction for sedition, a higher punishment might be imposed, and in addition to fine and imprisonment, transportation or banishment for seven years might be inflicted when a person had been convicted a second time. He did not mean a cumulative offence, but an offence committed after judgment being pronounced for a first offence, when the person so offending was liable to transportation, or banishment for seven years. He proposed that the court should be empowered, on a second conviction, for either treasonable, blasphemous, or seditious libels, to transport the person so convicted for seven years, or banish him for such shorter period as might be thought advisable. If there were individuals among us who had such an abhorrence of our institutions, that they were determined to sin with their eyes open after they had once been punished, they could not be considered as visited with a punishment disproportionably rigorous, by being subject to transportation. With these measures and the other measures which his majesty's ministers had adopted, he trusted the evil would be arrested.

Having made these observations, he did not know any thing further which he had to state, excepting that it had been found necessary to augment the military force. This augmentation had been made in the manner, which was conceived to be the most effective, the least expensive, and the least connected with any motive of interest or partial views. It would be most gratifying to government to find that the state of the country rendered all farther augmentation unnecessary. Much depended on the spirit and energy with which parliament acted; and much on the readiness and determination of the sound part of the community to defend themselves against the dangers which surround them. He hoped they would feel it necessary to come forward in armed associations, and to show, that if any persons were disposed to make efforts against the constitution, the friends of the constitution were determined to make greater and more effectual efforts to defend and preserve it.

He did not think it was necessary for him to say any thing farther as to the proposed measures—he had opened to the House what in candour he was bound to state with respect to them. He was perfectly sensible that when any law was proposed of the nature of an infringement on the valuable rights for the protection and maintenance of which the constitution was established—when parliament were called on to abridge such rights, or only temporarily to suspend them—when it was necessary for any minister of the Crown to propose the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act (though it was a great gratification to ministers that at the present moment they were not under the necessity of proposing any such suspension), the only just ground for passing such measures, was the necessity of parting for a moment with some of our liberties for the permanent benefit of the whole. But he begged the House to take distinctly into their consideration that the measures now proposed were not directed against the rights of the people, but against the abuses of these rights, which abuses shook the security of the rights themselves. With respect to the bill which he was now proposing to introduce, similar to that in 1812, giving extraordinary power to the magistrates to search for arms, he had it not in contemplation to offer that bill on any other principle than as a local and temporary measure. But if he distinctly understood the nature of the rest of the proposed measures, and in particular of that intended to repress seditious meetings, it appeared to him that they should be made permanent. He was not aware that they infringed on any popular right. If it were objected that seditious meetings were now confined only to a part of the country, and that the measure applicable to them ought also to be partial, he would say that he did not conceive such a measure could be considered in the light of an infringement on the liberties of the country, being only a solitary protection against the danger from those meetings. The same observation would apply to the bill against training and drilling, to the traversing bill, and also to those regulations which could not be looked on in any degree as an infringement on the liberty of the press, fairly understood, but merely as a remedy against a crying evil. He should not propose, with respect to those bills, any limitation in point of time. He did not mean to say, but that on the country coming back to its former state—or on the game of the disaffected being rendered hopeless—he did not mean to say but that the hon. and learned gentleman opposite in some future review of the laws, when this measure would have ceased to apply to the state of the country, might question whether it should not undergo some alteration, or whether it ought to be allowed to remain on the Statute book. But if there was really nothing in these bills which narrowed the rights of the subject; if they were rather to be considered as protecting the subject in the exercise of those rights, and if a fatal influence had often already been produced on the minds of the wicked and evil-disposed from the indisposition of parliament, to apply temporary laws to temporary evils, he thought the House ought to make them perpetual. They had already seen with what cunning, wicked and evil-disposed men often availed themselves of the expiration of a law or the circumstance of parliament not sitting, to resume all their old practices; and therefore if the House saw those laws in the light in which they were viewed by his majesty's ministers as a remedy against abuse, and not as an encroachment on rights, they would think that much greater benefit would be derived by the country from rendering them permanent. They were called on in political wisdom when they looked to the scenes around them—when they saw what was passing both at home and abroad—when they considered what theories of government were afloat, not only here, but elsewhere, they were bound, he said, to create a fence around the constitution, and a bulwark to protect it against those spurious rights which were so foreign to its sober genius. How long were the prosperity and tranquillity of the country to be put in danger in this manner? He implored the House for God's sake to look their difficulties in the face. The evil was permanent; at least as permanent as an evil of such a character could be. Wicked and dangerous men ought to be deprived of the power of keeping the country in continual agitation. He therefore proposed the measures without any limitation as to time, leaving it to the wisdom and discretion of parliament to deal with them as it might think proper when the motives for adopting them were passed away; for he believed they were safeguards to the constitution, and not encroachments. He regretted he had been compelled to trouble the House at so much length. The bill giving magistrates a power to search for arms would be introduced first into the other House, as also the traversing bill. The other bills would be introduced in the House of Commons. With respect to one of them, it would be necessary they should go into a committee of the whole House on the subject of it, previous to bringing in the bill; and he should tomorrow or next day, propose such a committee. He should now move for leave to bring in a bill "for the more effectually preventing Seditious Meetings and Assemblies."

Mr. Tierney observed, that the awful denunciation by the noble lord, of many of the principles which he (Mr. Tierney) had been accustomed to hold most sacred, must of course occasion him to rise under considerable embarrassment; but that embarrassment would be greater if he imagined that after the statement of the noble lord, the House would expect him on the sudden to be prepared to go into a general argument upon the question. Great variety of matter had been introduced, the greater part of which, to him at least, was perfectly new. When he came down to the House he had not the most distant conception that the noble lord would advert to many of the points on which he had dwelt at large. He assured the House, that he attended in his place, (and he hoped the noble lord would believe him), with a very sincere inclination to listen calmly and dispassionately to all that was to be advanced; he felt not the slightest prejudice on any of the points (on some it was impossible that he should feel any, as he was totally ignorant of them); but after what he had heard, he was conscious that he should not discharge his duty, if he did not trouble the House with a few, and a very few, observations. The noble lord had stated, that members on the opposition side of the House, on the first day of the session, had in substance agreed with all parts of the address relating to the seditious spirit pervading the manufacturing districts. It was almost needless to remind the House that the noble lord had no authority for that statement; for his own part, he (Mr. Tierney) had expressly asserted his agreement with the allegations in the address, as far only as they should be established by evidence to be produced. It was really astonishing that the noble lord, who could be candid enough on the first day of the session, should now, for some purpose of his own, not only state that which went even beyond the address, but attempt to ratify that statement by a supposed confirmation derived from the other side of the House. He (Mr. Tierney) had said then, and he repeated it now, that the measures to be adopted must depend upon the necessity, and that necessity could only be ascertained by due inquiry. He did not say that a possible case might not arise where new laws might be required; that a House of Commons in the discharge of its duty might not entertain projects of this kind, but what he maintained was that they ought not to do so until the necessity had been clearly and unequivocally made out. He denied that necessity at starting: no such case had been made out that justified such measures as had been proposed, even supposing, upon examination, it should turn out that the safety of the country required them. All the House had before it was the notoriety of certain proceedings; but the grounds of those proceedings, their motives, and extent, was only to be gathered from the papers communicated by the Prince Regent. Without meaning to anticipate the debate of tomorrow, to be introduced by his noble friend, he would say, that a more garbled, mutilated account was never presented to the House of Commons. The noble lord had stated what undoubtedly was very consolatory, but for the comment with which it was accompanied—that the main body of the nation was sound and loyal; that in principle it was attached to the law and the constitution. Even in the disaffected districts, it had been admitted to-night, that the great mass of the population was untouched and untainted by disaffection, and that they were prepared to stand by the law and the constitution; nay, the noble lord went further; he had stated what would have astonished him, if any thing could astonish him from the present ministry on the subject of finance,—that the internal state of the country was perfectly prosperous; that in our foreign trade there was nothing to apprehend, but from the distress of America; that all our manufactures found their accustomed vent on the continent; and that it was the condition of America alone that restrained the commercial industry of the nation. Certainly, if the representations of the noble lord were to be believed in opposition to the evidence of our own senses, the country ought to be in a very happy condition; but how was it then that, as if the nature of the people had changed, as if they had become blind, obstinate, and perverse, it turned out that the nation was to be called upon to sacrifice its constitution on the altar of public security? The subjects of the realm were now told, that the old laws of England were not sufficient to guarantee protection to property; that what they had been accustomed to venerate as their safeguards were inadequate; that not only 10,000 additional soldiers were to be placed over them, but that those soldiers were to be backed by corps of yeomanry, and by statutes hitherto unknown; and after all this, they were to be assured that their condition was fortunate, and their finances flourishing! The noble lord had maintained, that by the amendment, he (Mr. Tierney) had marked his sense of the schemes by which the lower orders were misled. He admitted it; he meant to mark his opinion decisively, that those schemes were dangerous to the constitution, injurious to the public quiet, and most of all injurious to those who were deluded by them. If those unfortunate men could now look into the House, they would see the result of their endeavours; let them abuse the Whigs as violently, and stand by their champion Hunt as firmly as they pleased, if they could now witness the proceedings of parliament, they would see to what a miserable pass their leaders had reduced them, bound hand and foot, and delivered into the hands of those who, by new laws, and new troops, were establishing an inquisition upon the ruins of the constitution. A right hon. gentleman had said on a former night, that the Whigs had been for 50 years excluded from power. It was true, and here was the fruit of that exclusion. After the lapse of 50 years of rule, what had the opponents of the Whigs done for the nation? They had brought it to such a condition of discontent and disaffection, that in a period of profound peace, the tranquillity of the country could not be maintained without new laws, not consistent with the spirit of the constitution. The noble lord had opened five bills to the House. The first was against Seditious and Tumultuous Assemblies—the second against Drilling—the third against the Possession of Arms—the fourth was against Traversing—the fifth branched out into two or three heads; and was aimed at the liberty of the press. With respect to the right of traverse, he freely confessed that his mind was open to information. He did not profess to be acquainted with all the grounds on which that right had originally been conceded to the subject; inconveniences might have arisen from it, and the remedies of the noble lord might be applied without danger. Yet with fear and trembling he should undertake to change an established principle of the common law, founded upon almost immemorial usage; and though he did not undertake to pronounce peremptorily against it, he approached it with a degree of awe, and would not change it until the necessity should be sufficiently established. If by the power of searching for arms the noble lord meant to go the length of saying that an Englishman was not to be allowed to have weapons for self-defence in his possession, a most grave case indeed must be made out before he could consent to the proposition. Going about in armed bodies from place to place was already illegal but between that and the established constitutional principle that a man had a right to have arms for his own defence he took a wide and material distinction. He begged of the House to pause before it sanctioned a measure which directly violated that privilege, in which twenty years ago men would have shuddered had it been even hinted that an alteration was intended. As a temporary measure it might under some circumstances be necessary; such as that large bodies of men were arming themselves in a way dangerous to the community. What was the fact? The papers upon the table merely proved, that certain persons had been making a limited number of pikes, that certain other persons had obtained some pistols and that a few more were in search of other fire-arms, if they could obtain them at a cheap rate. It was only pretended that Lancashire, Cheshire, a small part of Scotland, though thickly populated, and some districts of Yorkshire, were in a disturbed state: yet upon no better testimony than this the whole people of England were to be deprived of arms. [Lord Castlereagh said, across the table, that the Arms' bill was only to be local.] What then were the districts to which the law was to apply? [Lord Castlereagh replied, "Those included in the Watch and Ward act."] As he (Mr. Tierney) had not that measure precisely in his memory, he would not waste time by observations upon it. As to the law against drilling, he had heard with great astonishment, that such practices were not already against law; that no punishment could now be inflicted upon men who drilled and trained at night, and formed themselves into military array. If this were not so, he was, ready to submit to a new law on this subject. If it could be worded so as to meet the exigencies of the case, he honestly admitted that he had no objection to it; guarding himself with this observation, that it must be drawn so as not to go a single step beyond the necessity of the case, and that it was established that the men were drilling themselves evidently for the purpose of military operations. He next came to what in his mind was the great question of all—the new regulations against seditious and tumultuous meetings. Upon this subject the noble lord had asserted, that all the learned gentlemen on the other side of the House had very carefully abstained from giving any opinion whether assemblies of a particular description were or were not illegal. If he had understood his learned friends, their difficulty was this—that the question must depend upon particular circumstances; and until the facts of a case were laid before them, it was impossible to give an opinion upon it. No doubt a case might be shown in which it would be highly improper for the magistracy not to exert themselves by preventing a projected meeting, to preserve the public peace, a breach of which might threaten the safety of the country. Here the only question was, whether the particular circumstances under which the Manchester meeting was held were of such a description as that nothing but a military force could have put an end to its proceedings? To this he answered, that a meeting as large, or nearly as large, had taken place in Yorkshire; bodies of men had marched to Hunsletmoor of the same description as those that had attended at Manchester, with flags flying, and what had been termed an appearance of military array. What had become of it? The mayor of Leeds had felt no disposition to interfere; he had taken the proper precautions for the security of the peace, in the event of danger, though he did not think it right to make an ostentatious display of those precautions until a justifiable cause (which he did not apprehend) should be afforded for resorting to them. Such a cause did not occur. The persons assembled dispersed quietly; and from first to last, in Yorkshire, there had been no symptom of confusion. In Scotland, also, the magistrates had exercised a sound discretion; they had let the feeling of animosity waste itself; it did waste itself; and no such proceedings as those of Manchester had occurred there. And now the noble lord came forward, and assumed it as indisputable, that meetings must be confined within some other limitations, than those which at present existed, either numerical or local! The noble lord's plan appeared to be this—that no meeting should be allowed in any county, unless convened by the sheriff, the lord lieutenant, or by five magistrates: in certain towns, it must be called by the mayor; or if called by individuals, that no man could discuss and deliberate upon any public question out of his own parish. If such were the plan, there was at once an end of all the old wholesome spirit of the law upon this important subject. It would really seem from the cheers, as if the noble lord was restoring that old wholesome spirit, and that he (Mr. Tierney) was resisting it. Yet under that old wholesome spirit this country had flourished more than it would under the sage administration of the noble lord if he were to live for a century. Whether in former times any meetings as numerically great as those of which the noble lord complained had been held, he did not know; but every page and every corner of every page of our history showed that assemblies had been convened, where men were allowed to harangue in any times of alarm. Mr. Burke had well called them the safety-valve of the constitution, by which all the foul air was permitted to escape. This safety-valve with all his fears, the noble lord would destroy, and while he exclaimed that his only purpose was to preserve the constitution, no man could fail to see that he was preventing the exercise of an accustomed constitutional right. This attempt was to be viewed with the utmost jealousy; it was to introduce an entirely new system, and that not merely temporarily, but permanently. When the bills came before the House, many opportunities would be afforded for objections in detail, and he was much mistaken if they would not be found in every corner of every measure: he was now objecting only to the principle, and it ought not to be forgotten, that these acts were not to be local; they were to extend to England, Scotland, and Ireland. When the noble lord mentioned that he should open a whole system, he had flattered himself that a part of that system would be conciliation. It was now seen, however, that nothing but rigour and coercion were to be resorted to: a blow was struck at the very vitals of fair and free discussion, and did the House really believe that in following the steps of the noble lord it would not be treading upon very dangerous ground? Did it believe that the danger arising from the state of the country was as great as it was represented, or that the refusal of what the noble lord demanded, and a reliance upon the venerable laws of the kingdom, would not be the least hazardous experiment? Would not the new bills rather exasperate than repress? If there were these large bodies of men in a state of dangerous effervescence, which he much doubted, would not the peril be doubled, when they were told that they must expect nothing but coercion—that new laws should be invented to put them down, and that none of their grievances, whether real or imaginary, should receive a moment's attention? If parliamentary reform were mentioned in any shape, the immediate answer was—"Now you are going to innovate." Yet ministers were to make what innovations they pleased; they were to invade the most dear and settled rights of the people; to infringe upon privileges that the practice of many centuries had confirmed; and if a charge of innovation were made against them, they met it with a look of astonishment and a cheer of surprise. What must be the event? Would not those who were now agitated be worked to a state of madness or desperation, instead of being quelled and subdued? He warned the House how it consented to steps that might be attended with the most baleful consequence, and neglected the voice of the people; not merely of those who were enthusiastic on parliamentary reform, but of sober thinking men, whose experience gave them this unanswerable demonstration—that something was wrong here, and that something must be altered. Ministers might fancy that they could control the distressed by overawing them with 10,000 men; but they would find it impossible. A dead silence in the country might for a season be produced by soldiers and penal laws, but nothing could reconcile the people to the loss of their rights, or compel them to submit quietly to that grievous deprivation. The number of armed men might, in time, be rendered greater than the unarmed, and then, instead of venting their feelings by becoming spouters at public meetings, the discontented would be converted from empty boasters in public places, into real conspirators in dark corners. These matters well merited the attention of the House, and especially of that portion of it who thought of nothing (and he did not blame them for it) but of the preservation of property. Property never could be exposed to greater danger ultimately than for a popular representation, as this House called itself, to pass nothing but acts of rigour, and omit all attempts at kindness and conciliation. The right of meeting was not only to be taken away, but what the noble lord had called the broad liberty of the press was to be invaded. As to the cheap publications as they were called, no one viewed with greater disgust than he did their effusions, as well on the subject of religion as in vilification of the best characters in the country; and his chief astonishment had arisen from observing, that for three or four years together no attempt had been made to put a stop to them. The noble lord had observed that complaints had been made against the number of ex-officio informations, and it was true: they had been objected to as arbitrary and needless; but could any man read but the tenth part of the cheap publications, and not be persuaded that grand juries would have found true bills, and petty juries verdicts of guilty against their authors? Did ministers by this abstemiousness of prosecution mean to bring the matter to a crisis like the present? Did they contemplate a time when the vast accumulation of the evil would warrant them in this new infringement? If the libels had been brought before juries, ministers seemed to apprehend that the existing law would have been found sufficient, and they would thus have been deprived of one main ground on which their measure rested. As to the question of the liberty of the press, if he were to enter into it, a wide field indeed would be opened to him; but though he might lament the excess to which that liberty had in some instances been carried, he was persuaded that the old and recognized laws were adequate to restrain it. Upon this point the case was as defective as upon others; and as nothing was more valuable than the preservation of the liberty hitherto enjoyed, he hoped the nation would feel it, and that before the noble lord's bill passed into a law, depriving the people of their ancient privileges, they would assemble without fear, and pour in upon the House a tide of remonstrances which even the noble lord would not be able to resist. It was unnecessary for him on the present occasion to say more. The liberty of the press was as yet in safe hands—in the hands of the press itself: which would no doubt speedily throw light enough on the subject to show what the real causes were of the licentiousness of the few, that was to be made the ground for encroaching on the liberty of all. He had come down to the House with a sincere inclination to listen impartially to what the noble lord might suggest, and disposed to concur in the measures proposed, rather than to oppose them; but he had then no notion of the extent to which the demand would be made. He might have been willing to concede something if a necessity had been shown, but nothing would satisfy the noble lord but an attack upon the very vital principles of the British constitution. Were we to live in entirely new times? Were we now to hold up to the world, that the constitution which we had hitherto venerated for its antiquity, and loved for the blessings it has conferred, was of no value? Formerly, when foreigners asked in what way we became possessed of such and such institutions that attracted their admiration, we could reply, that we were indebted for them to the right which the people of England enjoyed of thinking and speaking freely. But now another lesson was taught by the noble lord, who would convince us, that what had been the salvation of our liberties was the destruction of our happiness—that what we and our forefathers had believed, was false and foolish; and that to preserve freedom and property, the constitution must undergo a change which, in his conscience he (Mr. Tierney) believed it could not survive. He said fairly and openly that suspecting as he did the administration from which these measures emanated, he considered them as only the advanced guard of the array of bills which they were to direct against the constitution. He saw on the part of the government an evident determination to resort to nothing but force; they thought of nothing else; they dreamt of nothing else; they would try no means of conciliation, they would make no attempt to pacify and reconcile; force—force—force, and nothing but force! that was their cry, and it had been the same for years: one measure of coercion had been, and would be, followed up by another, and the result would justify what he asserted, that 10,000 men would not answer their purpose; one measure of violence must succeed another, and what they gained by force they must retain by the same detestable means. The people would never rest until they were allowed to live under laws equally administered; until their honest industry could procure them the means of maintaining their families, and until they should again enjoy the blessings of that constitution which their ancestors intended they should partake. If not, discontent would increase to disaffection, and distress would produce discontent, notwithstanding the bold assertions of the noble lord, that the nation was prosperous, and had no wants but those which arose out of the present condition of America. If the noble lord had confined himself to the grant of 10,000 men, he should have deemed it a strong measure in a time of profound peace. Was any evidence offered that a body of the military had been overpowered, or even that it had not always been sufficient to the dispersion of any meeting? But if the country gave him more troops to put down new meetings, surely it was somewhat hard that he should also ask it for new laws, that were to prevent the possibility of new meetings. If the noble lord thought that the new laws would be effectual, where was the occasion for the 10,000 men? It was clear that the noble lord felt that his new laws were more likely to exasperate than to conciliate, and the best comment upon all the noble lord had advanced in favour of his new projects, was his declaration, "I want 10,000 men into the bargain." His sincere belief was, that the noble lord would want many more than 10,000 men, and what a melancholy prospect did that hold out to the country! It might be said that he used violent language. He admitted it; and all he could say in answer was, that he did not utter a single syllable that he did not on his honour, believe. He was an alarmist, he felt alarm, because he was compelled to trust to men who would rely on nothing against the people but brute force. He was alarmed because an attempt was to be made, under false pretences, to destroy all that was valuable in the constitution, unless it were defended by the free spirit of a yet free nation. Therefore it was, that he indulged a hope, that while the right of meeting remained, the people would meet and express their opinions with such effect that the threats and measures of coercion might be abandoned. He had hoped that a more moderate course would have been pursued, because, with the exception of the disturbed districts, as they were called, there was no part of Great Britain where assemblies might not be held, even by the admission of ministers, without the slightest danger to the public peace. He trusted that the country would thoroughly understand the nature of these novel laws, that the real objects of government would be evident, and that those objects by the public voice would be for ever defeated. If the country abstained from that course, and if the House, without any evidence to warrant those innovations, should consent to follow the noble lord in his desperate and adventurous course, all he could say was that he should witness it with the deepest and most sincere regret. He should then have lived long enough, and could no longer be of use to his country in that House. He saw an hon. gentleman on a bench below him smile. If that hon. gentleman expected him to secede, he should tell him that it was contrary to his principles to do so. He did not mean to retire from parliament—he would still attend, and by his vote oppose the progress of laws destructive of the nation's rights, but he should not feel bound, after the people had shown such apathy, to sacrifice for them as he had hitherto done, his time and his health. He hoped that all members would give the subject their most deliberate attention. The new laws were not such as the public exigency required; the extent, or even the existence of disaffection was not proved; and until it should be so, it was the duty of every honest man to pause. At least, attention ought to be paid to this point—whether some course of conciliation might not be adopted; whether steps ought not to be taken to satisfy the people, and to prove that, while the House was willing to repress sedition, it had a fixed determination to listen to their grievances, and, as far as possible, to apply a remedy.

Lord Castlereagh explained. He had not asserted that the only distress arose from the diminution of the trade with America; but he stated it as a consoling circumstance, that amidst our distress, it did not appear that the consumption of our manufactures in foreign markets was diminished, except in America, where the diminution was to be attributed to temporary circumstances. He had admitted the distress, though that, too, he believed to be exaggerated; nor were those the most disaffected who were the most distressed. He held, too, that the distress depended upon causes to be removed by time alone, not by the hand of parliament, still less by the particular nostrum which had been brought forward for their cure. Any thing which might now be done by the House would not prevent them from taking that distress into consideration at some future period.

Lord Folkestone said, he was unwilling to offer himself to the attention of the House; but he felt it impossible, after the speech of the noble lord, to suffer them to separate, without expressing his detestation of the measures proposed. He conceived he should not be performing his duty, if he did not endeavour to impress upon the House the necessity of extreme caution and consideration, before they adopted any of those measures. He fully concurred in one part of the noble lord's speech—in the confident hope that the House would stand by the constitution. He conscientiously hoped that they would not suffer the proudest pillars of that constitution to be pulled down by the audacious hands of ministers. He would put it to every gentleman in the House—to those, even, who cheered the noble lord's speech—whether, on their conscience, they did not believe that the objects of the noble lord were, on the one hand, to put down the liberty of the press, and, on the other, to prevent all public meetings. County meetings were indeed left open; but, after the so prevailing fashion of the sheriffs refusing to convene them, could it be mistaken, that the noble lord's object was to prevent altogether those numerous meetings, in which Englishmen communicated to one another their sentiments of attachment to the laws and the constitution, and of opposition to the inroads of arbitrary power? Besides these measures, as if they were not considered sufficiently severe, there was what he conceived a most serious attack on the liberty of the press. On this subject he begged of the House to consider fully the nature of the course that had been already adopted. Scarcely had a statute been passed connected with this bulwark of our liberties for the last thirty years, which had not placed additional trammels upon it; and what was now the result? Why, that ministers felt themselves called upon to ask for new measures of severity. They had thus, on their own showing, only made the matter worse by continued restrictions. Now, he would ask, whether, having failed in so many trials of one course, it would not be prudent and politic to resort to another, and see what might be done by that? Upon one of the proposed measures he begged to offer a word; it was that which went to restrict the right of traverses under particular circumstances. The noble lord had said, that he did not see why, when a man accused of a capital offence could not put off his trial without stating strong grounds, such an indulgence should be given in cases of misdemeanor. One would think that the noble lord was wholly unacquainted with the forms of law upon this subject. The cases were very different. In the case of felony, the person knew from the first the particular crime of which he was accused. It was stated in the warrant of commitment. But the man accused of misdemeanor very frequently was ignorant of the precise nature of the charge against him, until after the grand jury had found the bill. It could not, therefore, generally speaking, be expected, that he would be then ready to proceed to trial. Indeed, the cases, if he was not mistaken, to which allusion had been made (the cases of the commitment for a conspiracy at Lancaster), were in point upon this subject. There the parties had been detained in solitary confinement for 11 days, and it was then uncertain whether they were to be charged with conspiracy or treason. They were at length accused of a conspiracy, and they could not of necessity until that moment know the nature of the charge. Would it then be surprising, under such circumstances, that men should not be disposed to go to immediate trial? He would not now advert to the other topics embraced in the speech of the noble lord, but he could not help remarking on the tone and manner of the noble lord on the occasion. The noble lord would wish the House to think it an act of kindness on his part, that some of the measures were not most severe. In his kindness he had said, that it was not intended to make the stranger who should remain a quarter of an hour at one of these meetings after it was ordered to disperse, liable to the punishment of death. In his kindness he had mentioned, that it was not intended to put a general censorship on the press; in his kindness he had informed them, that it was not intended to take away the invaluable privilege of trial by jury. But, notwithstanding this apparent kindness, he trusted that the House would see and understand the real nature of the measures proposed; and if they did not resent the tone in which their dearest rights were treated of, they could not be possessed of the spirit which it was imagined belonged to every Englishman. He could not help connecting the words of the noble lord with what had fallen from his hon. and learned friend on a former night. Only one of the measures which were now proposed was to be local and temporary, all the others were to be perpetual, and to apply to the whole country. Mark the conduct of the ministers in this case.

They had brought down evidences of disturbances in a particular part of the country, which might pass away, as they had passed away before. They had brought down measures restrictive of liberty, general and for all time to come. His hon. and learned friend, in referring the other night to the seditious publications which had been allowed to go forth in different parts of the country during the last two or three years, had fairly asked, why they had not been prosecuted, and their authors punished? He had said at the same time, that although he did not think this neglect intentional, yet it would seem as if those publications had been permitted to accumulate, in order that a pretence might be found for striking a blow at the general liberty of the press. Would his hon. and learned friend now think, after what he had heard, that there had been no intention? If he did, he (lord Folkestone) for one, differed from him on that point. Again, he asked, why these publications and practices of a seditious nature had not been sooner checked? Why had not the law of the land been before applied? According to the opinion of the learned solicitor-general, the seditious practices complained of might have been checked by the existing law; for he had declared that they were contrary to the law. The magistrates of Manchester themselves had said the same thing, and in their letters, upon which all these proceedings were to be founded, had over and over again complained of these meetings and practices, and begged to be enabled to arrest their progress. They prayed ministers for some clue to direct their proceedings; but ministers would give none. From the account of the affray of the 16th, it appeared to him to be very evident that ministers wished not the event that took place, but that which arresting Hunt in the face of the meeting it was very probable would occur. They had let the mischief grow up, and the storm gather to its present height, in order to induce parliament to pass, and the people to sit by whilst they passed measures restrictive of the rights, and subversive of the liberties of the subject.

Mr. Brougham said, it was not his intention to trespass long on the attention of the House, but he felt it due to his hon. friends and himself to state why it was they did not wish to take the sense of the House in this stage of the proceedings. It was not because they did not object to the proposed measures as a whole. It was not because they now concurred in any part of them: for against the spirit which pervaded the whole, he fully agreed with his noble friend who had just sat down, in entering his solemn and decided protest. But at this time, when they were so little aware of the detail of the noble lord's plans of restriction, when they knew so little of what was really meant, when the parts were so little before them, he thought it better to take the sense of the House at another stage. They were now but little aware of the precise shape of this momentous measure for putting down public meetings, by confining every man to his parish, and even by cutting and carving particular parishes, according to a standard of numerical propriety, so that every man called to a public meeting, must consult the population abstract, to know whether the population was 19,000, and he might go, or 20, that he must stay away. The noble lord had not said whether the new act was to apply to meetings within doors, to assemblies in taverns, or to associations purely literary. He had not told them whether it would be lawful to attend a Bible meeting, or assist in promoting a charity out of one's own parish. An hon. friend of his had lately attended a public meeting at Kendal, for a good purpose, but in a sort of itinerant manner: was it now to be understood that he should be no longer allowed to attend such meetings, unless he belonged to the parish in which they were held? The right hon. the president of the board of control, whom he regretted not to see in his place, and the more so as he understood his absence was caused by indisposition, must be in favour of the principle which he (Mr. B.) now urged, as his practice had been in accordance with it. The right hon. gentleman had attended meetings in this very county of Lancaster, out of his own parish too, above ground and below ground, in all sorts of places—at Liverpool before his election, and at Manchester, after it—at Manchester, of which he could not be member, and at Liverpool when he was not its member. Was it to be now said, that a repetition of such conduct would be illegal? Or did the noble lord mean not to extend this measure to canvasses for elections? Did the noble lord mean to say, that no person proposing himself as a candidate for . . . in parliament should be allowed to address a meeting in his canvass, unless he belonged to the place for which he offered himself as a representative? What distinction did the noble lord make with respect to parishes having 20,000 inhabitants, and other less populous parishes? How was the act intended to operate in conterminous parishes, in one of which a meeting should exceed a certain number? Were strangers to be warned off, as soon as the excess in point of numbers was perceived? (Or suppose some hapless orator were to stand exactly in the boundary, and address two parishes, one having a greater number than the act allowed, would it not then appear that one part of his frame might be committing an illegal act, because although on one side he addressed himself to 10,000, on the other his auditors exceeded that number? Another ground why he and his hon. friends did not wish to press this question to a division was, that they had no information as to the facts alleged. There were many assertions, but not one had yet been proved. He would not now give any farther opinion upon this subject, but he trusted that, unless the House should get security for the truth of all the facts now brought forward as the ground and justification of these measures, and for their absolute necessity, they would object to them in toto. Even should those facts be substantiated, he would not now pledge himself to the vote which he might feel it his duty to give on any part of these measures. As to the liberty of the press, and the proposed restrictions on it, he would only say, that, admitting a certain degree of mischief to exist, and allowing that something should be done, yet one of his great objections was, that while the proposed measures tended to submit that great blessing to a kind of arbitrary authority, they did not tend to provide a remedy for the actual evil complained of. What that remedy should be he would not then pretend to say; but he pledged himself to oppose every restriction which did not, in his opinion, provide one; and at some future period to put the House in possession of his views on the subject.

Lord Rancliffe observed, that it had been his custom to express his sentiments merely by his vote; and he should not now have deviated from it, but that being convinced by the reasons of his hon. and learned friend, he would not press this matter to a division, and was therefore desirous of declaring, that he regarded the whole of the proposed measures as highly unconstitutional.

Mr. George Lamb thought the time was now arrived when the House should show that it meant to deal even-handed justice to the people. He viewed with perfect horror the measures which had been proposed; but he wished to know whether there was to be a scintilla of justice—something like a show of reparation—to the people for a right taken away? When the House was about to pass measures restrictive of their liberties, and to deprive them of some of their ancient privileges, it would be but fair to remove certain practices which they, on their part, had found to be oppressive. He would ask the attorney-general whether, when the right of traverse was under some circumstances to be taken away, and the party accused put immediately on his trial, it would not be just that he, the law-officer of the Crown, should be deprived of the power of suspending ex officio informations for any length of time, over the heads of his majesty's subjects.

Strangers were again ordered to withdraw, and the gallery was cleared, as if for a division. None, however, took place: the bill was read a first time, and the second reading fixed for Thursday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, November 30.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] The Marquis of Lansdowne rose, in pursuance of his notice, in furtherance of a duty, the importance of which he most seriously felt, to propose to their lordships to appoint a committee to inquire into the state of the country, and more particularly with reference to the distress of the manufacturing districts, and the execution of the laws. In doing this, he felt all the difficulty of the task he had undertaken, and was sensible how much reason he had to lay claim to their lordships' indulgence for the details into which he should find it necessary to enter in bringing this important subject under their consideration. He was aware, however, that he came before them at a time when there could be little difference of opinion as to the momentous nature of the subject on which he was addressing them. It had been common, and nothing was more natural on ordinary occasions, to impute to noble lords on that side of the House, a disposition to magnify the dangers of the country, and to accuse the noble lords on the other side of placing them in a point of view by which they were too much diminished. But, at the present moment, this difference of opinion did not prevail. Indeed, when he recollected what had taken place within these few years; when he considered that within the last month there had been added to an already large standing army, a force, or rather a new army, greater than that which a hundred years ago had been thought sufficient for internal defence, and external operations; when he found their lordships' table, and that of the other House, covered with measures for restraining the liberty of the subject; when he saw all this, joined to the great anxiety which every where prevailed respecting the state of the country—an anxiety which was greatly increased by the conduct of those in whose hands the government of the Prince Regent was placed—he was convinced that it would be a waste of their lordships' time to offer any argument on the extent of the existing danger. He felt this conviction the more, when he considered that their lordships were called upon by the Prince Regent's ministers to adopt measures to check or avert the evil. It must from all these circumstances be admitted that a primâ facie case was made out for requiring their lordships to consider the nature and cause of the danger, and the remedies which ought to be applied.

To perform this duty, it would be necessary for their lordships to take a large and comprehensive view of the situation of the country, in order that they might be enabled to make up their minds to the whole extent of the mischief, and to the means of cure; and, in particular to ascertain whether they had nothing more to do than to pass the bills which the noble secretary of state had recommended for their adoption, and then to return tranquilly to their duties or amusements in the country. The variety of considerations that offered themselves, and the difficulty of making out particular cases, were the chief reasons which induced him to bring the subject in the shape he proposed before their lordships. He was confident that it would be a great mistake, were their lordships to content themselves with taking a partial view of the situation of the country. To look merely at partial danger would tend only to mislead, and produce a false conclusion. This kind of error would be inevitable, if they founded their opinion on any single circumstance or transaction, without connecting it with the whole situation of the country, and bringing under their review not only the events which had taken place, but the causes of those events. No man could look at the events which had recently occurred, but must feel that violence was to be repressed by violence, and that sedition of every kind was to be put down by the law. But when the violence was repressed, and the sedition subdued, was not the evil which had led to that state of things to be explored? Were their lordships to stop at this point, and forget that it was their duty to look farther, and to consider how the causes of the evil could be removed? Their lordships must not be satisfied with finding a case made out with respect to the circulation of seditious publications; but must inquire into the cause which produced them, and obtained for them readers. It was not sufficient for them to know, that itinerant demagogues had travelled over the country, addressing seditious harangues to multitudes of people; they were bound to make themselves acquainted with the causes which had produced these extraordinary effects, and to ascertain why so many tongues were thus employed, and why they found so many ears disposed to listen to them. It would be in vain to attempt to discover these causes by any partial view or examination, as it would be absurd to account for them by their effects. From all that their lordships had seen, it appeared that there existed among the people a strong desire that something should be done to ameliorate their situation. Whatever desire there was of change, it appeared to be founded merely in a feeling of uneasiness, and exhibited a wish to embrace any scheme whatever, which might appear calculated to give them relief. Looking, then, at all the circumstances which had come to their lordships' knowledge, it appeared that one principal cause of this feeling, and one which unfortunately was founded in truth, was distress. He did not mean to say that there were not other causes which were calculated to excite great jealousy among the people—a jealousy even justified by the acts of that and the other House of Parliament; but it was evident that the spirit which, under the name of radicalism, had prevailed in different parts of the country, had always taken a deeper root, and more vigorously flourished, in proportion to the extent of the distress of those to whom that fallacious and destructive doctrine was recommended. This would be evident, if their lordships took the trouble to compare the state of the agricultural and the manufacturing districts. The agricultural labourers, though not in that happy situation in which they had formerly stood, were much better off than the labourers or manufacturers. Accordingly, it would be found, that it was in the manufacturing districts only that the mischief which their lordships were called upon to correct had any existence. If he went farther, and inquired among what descriptions of manufacturers the poison was most widely diffused, he was again compelled to point to those who were suffering under the greatest degree of distress. Among the cotton-manufacturers, whose situation was worse than that of any other class, the spirit of radicalism had been carried to the greatest extent. It was important that their lordships should feel the truth of this view of the subject, in order that their attention might be fully directed to the state of the manufacturing districts, which formerly employed so great a part of the population of the country. From statements which he had before him on the table, he could prove to their lordships, that in all the great stations of the cotton-manufacture, such as Manchester in England, and Glasgow and Paisley in Scotland, the earnings of the manufacturers had, at an average, fallen more than one half. Even adding all that could be obtained by working additional hours, the average rate of payment did not exceed 5s. a week in the principal manufacturing districts. There were, however, other places where, from local circumstances, the master manufacturers could not afford to give even so much as 5s. a week. This was the case at Maybole, in Scotland, and some other parts, where, from the smallness of the capital of the master manufacturers, they had been compelled to reduce the rate of wages to half-a-crown per week. There were other places where the price varied to 4s. and 5s., and where some addition was supplied to the labourer from other sources.

He would not trouble their lordships by entering farther into the details which the papers before them afforded; these details were all of the same description, and proved to demonstration, that it was this lamentable distress which afforded employment to the agents of sedition. It was the material on which they worked. It became their lordships to turn their attention to this distress, and to investigate its causes. Those causes appeared to be of no recent date, and their operation might be traced, through the last twenty years, to measures of political economy, connected with the political events of the times. It was one effect of great civilization to produce a great quantity of fixed capital; and the greater that capital was, the greater became the difficulty when any derangement of its usual course of employment took place, of throwing it into new and productive channels. That very division of labour, too, which was another consequence of social improvement and high civilization, formed on such occasions an additional evil; for the workman became a part of the same fixed capital, inasmuch as the talent and ingenuity he had acquired in his particular art or manufacture could not be otherwise employed. It was in every sense of the word, in his hands a fixed capital, which he could not remove to any other productive source of employment. When a great proportion of the population of a country was employed in manufactures, of which a diminished demand suddenly took place, the distress produced must be great. The master-manufacturers lowered the rate of wages: this reduction induced the labourers to work a greater number of hours; and thus more goods were produced, which served only to add to the evil. During the late war it happened (for it was the effect of every war to throw capital into new channels), that various profitable branches of commerce were carried to a great extent. In the course of a contest which had continued longer than any other in which the country had been engaged, and which was connected with a monopoly of the carrying trade, the commercial advantages which presented themselves were necessarily great. The effect of the profitable employment of capital was, to raise up a vast population, supported by means which, from their very nature, could not be permanent. Intimately connected with this circumstance was the disproportion which naturally followed between the agricultural and manufacturing part of the population, the latter being to the former in the proportion of 900,000 families to 700,000. The evil was greatly aggravated by some other circumstances in our domestic policy, by the state of the finances, the Poor-laws, and our paper currency.

Without troubling their lordships with all the details into which he might enter, to prove the pernicious influence resulting from such a state of things, it would be sufficient for him to remind them, that the poor laws, by making up to the labourer the deficiency of wages, had served as a bounty for an artificial speculation in manufactures. The paper currency also afforded another means of artificial speculation. Capital and labour having, in the manner he had described, been thrown into new channels, a great charge was imposed upon the public, when the cause which produced the impulse was withdrawn. The population which had been raised by commercial speculations during the war, was thrown back upon the country, in a very different situation from that in which the population stood at the commencement of hostilities. They required aid, when the means which the country had of affording it was greatly diminished. This could not surprise their lordships, when they considered the effect of a revenue increased from sixteen to between fifty and sixty millions, and the burthen which such an increase necessarily imposed; when they considered that every individual in the country was subject to burthens equal to triple the amount of what had been paid before the war; and that, compared with the principal manufacturing countries of Europe, our charges were double, and considerably more than the double of those countries. These circumstances could not be left out of any view which their lordships were called upon to take of the internal situation of the country. When they reflected on the effects which must naturally result from such a state of things, could their lordships be surprised, that many among the unfortunate part of the population he had described, were disposed to listen to projects which might be suggested for bettering their condition, without examining the nature of those projects with sufficient discrimination? Having exhausted all their means in a struggle between life and misery, was it surprising if nothing was done to remove the cause, that they should proceed from poverty to crime, till society, grown weary of the load, wished to shake off the incumbrance? It was however, satisfactory, to their lordships to know, that, notwithstanding the industry of the agents of sedition in working on this distress, the poison had not extended to all the population of districts in which the misery prevailed; and that by far the greater portion was acknowledged to continue firm in their allegiance. Even at Manchester, where that unfortunate event had occurred of which he should speak more at large by and by, it appeared that there was no ground for supposing the majority of the distressed population disaffected. If their lordships referred to the papers on the table, they would find that Mr. Hay considered only a part of the mob that composed the meeting to be what he called reformers. Of whom, then, did the other part of the meeting consist? Certainly not of persons whose minds had been poisoned by seditious publications, or by the harangues of itinerant demagogues. Besides, what proof had ministers afforded of the dangerous spirit having spread beyond the distressed districts, or of any thing which could stamp the character of treason or disaffection on the population in general? Policy, as well as humanity, called upon their lordships to devote all their minds to the present situation of the country. If by any apparent want of attention, an opinion should prevail among the middling classes of society, that their interests were either not duly consulted, or sacrificed to other interests, it was impossible to calculate what might be the consequences of such an impression. Then vain would be levies of soldiers, and all enactments of severe laws. Then would the arm of the constitution be withered, and those institutions which had been the pride of the country, and the safeguards of liberty, and which depended entirely on the confidence of the people, would be annihilated. He thought the situation of the country in this respect truly alarming; for if the middling classes were to become disaffected to the institutions of their ancestors, it was impossible to say where the danger which their lordships were called upon to avert would end.

Having said thus much, with the view of impressing on their lordships the necessity of diligently investigating the causes of the existing discontents, he should now proceed to consider what means of cure might be in the power of the legislature—first, with reference to the causes of the distress; and secondly with reference to the execution of the existing laws; for with regard to the latter part of the subject, if any cloud was hanging over the conduct of those who had to put in motion the laws of the country, it was fit it should be removed, or the circumstances which gave rise to it explained. Among the means of relief which had occasionally been suggested, was a parliamentary grant for the assistance of those who were suffering by the decay of trade and manufactures. This mode, however, involved a very objectionable principle, and was a mode of relief which, he confessed, he could not accede to without great consideration and caution; for evil was always to be expected when any considerable amount of capital was suddenly removed from one quarter to another. If, indeed, he could bring himself to the opinion that the evil was temporary, that it depended in a great measure on the distress of other countries, and that the means suggested would give effectual relief to the distressed population, then he might be induced to depart from those principles of political economy which, under other circumstances, he should be disposed to hold sacred. If he could be persuaded that a parliamentary grant would carry the people of the distressed districts over their difficulty, he would not hesitate to give it his concurrence. There were, however, other means which, in his opinion, might be resorted to for the purpose of diminishing the burthens which pressed so heavily on the people in general, and palsied every branch of industry. He would for the present suppose that it should be found impossible to carry the reduction of the public expenditure farther than had been done; still, when their lordships considered the manner in which the revenue had been raised for many years past, when they recollected that it had been the object of every minister to look merely at the resources of the present moment, without sufficiently calculating the effect which his measures might have on the future state of the revenue, he believed they would not think it unreasonable to expect some relief from an improved distribution of the public burthens. It was also probable that there were particular duties, the removal of which would afford an important relief without affecting the general amount of the revenue. For instance the article of tea was one the consumption of which, in consequence of the high duty, was, he understood, considerably diminished, particularly in the districts to which he had so frequently alluded. If the duty on tea were lowered it was to be expected that the consumption would be resumed and carried to a greater extent; especially as from long habit, it might be regarded rather as a necessary than a luxury. In considering this subject, it ought not to be overlooked, that the smuggling of tea was carried on to a great extent. It had been estimated that America re-exported tea to the extent of a million and a half; and if this calculation was correct, there was no doubt that a very great portion of this tea was introduced by smugglers into the British dominions. It must then be obvious, that a reduction of the duty would, by taking away the temptation to this contraband trade, increase the revenue. At the same time, a careful revision of our commercial system ought to be undertaken.

It had happened most unfortunately, that the present administration had not succeeded, under the most favourable circumstances in which they could possibly have been placed, to conclude at the close of the war a commercial treaty which might have proved beneficial to the country; but even without any such treaty, much might be done to encourage trade and facilitate the exportation of our manufactures. He would again, merely for illustration, state an instance in which this desirable end might to a certain degree be easily accomplished. The trade with Norway had been sacrificed with the view of encouraging the importation of timber from Canada. The result of this arrangement was, that we had been deprived of the advantage we derived from the opportunity of procuring an article of great value in building, while our export trade was, by the same exclusive system, diminished. It could not be questioned, but that if the prohibition against the importation of timber from Norway were removed, an opening would be made for the exportation of some of our manufactures. There were other regulations which might be made, all tending to open additional markets for our manufactures, and above all, there was South America, where a great mart might be opened for our manufactures, as was evident by what had been done through the appointment of a consul, and the opening a communication with the government of Buenos Ayres. But he should not dwell longer on this part of the subject, being confident that, if he prevailed on their lordships to go into the inquiry, he should propose to institute, either with respect to relief from the weight of taxation, or the improvement of our commercial relations, no practical means would be omitted which might appear calculated to lighten the burthens of the country generally or tend to improve the situation of the manufacturing districts.

Besides the hope of finding the means of removing distress, there was another great object which he thought ought to make an important part of the investigation of any select committee appointed to inquire into the state of the country. That part of the subject embraced the consideration of public meetings and seditious publications; and when their lordships' attention was directed to these objects, he must think them bound to inquire how far the administration of the laws had been fair and uniform; he used the word "uniform," because certainly nothing could produce a more unfavourable impression on the public mind, than affording ground to suppose that the laws were capriciously executed. Now, with respect to seditious publications, it ought to be explained how it happened that the law of libel had been, for two or three years, so laxly and ineffectually enforced, as to permit the most extraordinary multiplication of works of that description. Their lordships should be informed of the reasons which had induced the law officers of the Crown to allow sedition to stalk abroad without any attempt to check it, as if it had been intended by permitting its increase to lay a foundation for measures restrictive of the press. Upon what other ground could libels, which no twelve men in the city of London or any where else could hesitate for a moment to condemn, be allowed to circulate in the metropolis and all over the country, until it seemed that a connected system, having for its object to pervert the public mind, and which he was afraid might in some instances have proved but too efficacious, had been acted upon? For the purpose of calling their lordships attention to this part of the subject, and showing to what a degree the duty of checking seditious publications had been omitted, he would select from a mass of other libels which had been permitted to circulate, two: one, an attack on the rights of property, and a provocation to subvert the existing order of society; the other, a libel on the person at the head of the government, and a provocation to assassination. Nearly a year ago the latter libel had been put in circulation, and yet no step had been taken to check it, or punish its publication. Among other observations the writer of this libel proceeded to state, that if the Prince Regent persevered in paying no attention to the sufferings of the people, there would be but one course for the people to pursue: they would recollect what their ancestors had done in the case of Charles; and the house of Brunswick would, like the Stuarts, be banished from the throne. The other libel to which he had alluded was in the following terms:— "We must look into the coffers of the descendants of our forefathers' oppressors for plundered wealth; we must look at the land-leviathan's hoards, extorted by excessive rentals charged upon their sweating industrious tenantry; we must examine title-deeds; we must know by what right, social, natural, or divine, they became possessed of one or other part of the property they hold; and should they rend the air with their wailings after any unjustly accumulated store, still at a breaking up of an accursed system of exclusion and privilege, justice must be the order of the day. It is said, an infinite God is no respecter of persons; then how presumptuous in man to be so? Truth will make its way; sooner or later it will come to this; for they have pawned all, they are bankrupts, and living upon the spoils, the mercy and forbearance of their creditors the people, whom they and their fathers have for ages defrauded; and when the commission opens, should they not render a true and faithful account, they must even suffer the fate of felons, and depend on the mercy of the offended majesty of the people. They may cry aloud to the property-mongers, the Mammon worshippers of the land, and the town and country gentry, that cling around the falling system, as the miser hugs, in the agonies of death, the precious darling gold to his breast, and thinks that the only source of happiness; but it will not all do; if these show any disposition to join the unhallowed band, to "fight for their property," as a rich man (a mistaken patriot) once said they would, they must even share the fate of their companions." This article had appeared in the course of last spring; the other atrocious libel, as he had already stated, was published about a year ago. He would not suppose that it would be maintained, in answer to this observation, that a British jury would have overlooked the offence, and refused to give a verdict against the offender. Let it not be understood that he was demanding a severe administration of the laws with respect to libel, when he appeared urgent for such prosecutions. He thought that a libel which occurred from inadvertence, or at an unguarded moment, was a proper subject for leniency, and ought, in many cases, to be entirely overlooked; but when libelling assumed the form of a system, and was directed against the order of society, and the most sacred institutions of the country, he thought that the law officers of the Crown did not perform their duty, if they did not endeavour to repress it by all the penalties of the law. These officers might be able to account for their late inactivity, but he could not see the grounds on which they could plead their justification of neglecting to execute the existing laws, which might have been sufficient; while they demanded laws of greater severity, which might be unnecessary. At any rate the efficiency of the existing laws ought to be inquired into before any change was made; and it ought to be known, whether their intrinsic insufficiency, or the neglect of those who were required to watch over their execution, had allowed the evil to grow to such a height as to require the application of the measures proposed yesterday by the noble secretary of state. He recollected a time when prosecutions were instituted for much less offensive libels than those which he had read; when the editor of a newspaper was obliged to defend himself before a jury for saying that his majesty's successor would have a glorious opportunity of being popular. No conviction was obtained in this case, but the acquittal did not prove that a jury would have returned the same verdict in cases of an atrocious description. So in another instance, where it was said that lord Castlereagh had bribed Mr. Canning, or Mr. Canning lord Castlereagh (he forgot which), a jury might fairly be in doubt as to the importance of the charge. At any rate the offence was venial when compared with that contained in the passages he had read. In those passages the throne of the king was held up as an object of attack, and the property of the rich pointed out for plunder and spoliation. That a British jury would have refused to convict the author of such a libel, had he been prosecuted, could scarcely be believed.

Another topic of great importance, on which he would beg leave to trouble their lordships with a few observations, was, the execution of the law regarding public meetings. Had the conduct of the magistrates and the execution of the law, been uniform over the country in respect to those meetings? He was not disposed to deny that public meetings were differently conducted in different places, and that they might on that account be treated differently. But in many parts where they were left unmolested, those who attended them marched to the spot with banners and music in martial array, and under regular leaders; whereas these circumstances, in one case, had been declared the symbols of rebellion, and were pleaded as a justification of a forcible dispersion. Now, he would ask, were the same flags, music, inscriptions, and parade, legal in one part of the country, and illegal in another? What instructions had the noble secretary of state for the home department given to the magistrates to guide them in the execution of their duty regarding these meetings? The noble secretary had not before been slow to issue his circulars, when there was not such a necessity for his advice. How was the present abstinence to be reconciled with the former assiduity of the noble viscount in issuing his Circular to instruct the magistrates as to the course to be pursued by them with regard to the circulation of libels? Neither the noble viscount nor the magistrates could say, they were taken by surprise; they knew, long before, the nature of the meeting that was to take place at Manchester. They had seen similar meetings all over the manufacturing districts, and knew the doctrines which were inculcated by their leaders; and they ought to have determined beforehand on the course which it was proper to pursue regarding them. If ever "coming events cast their shadows before," the seditious publications to which he adverted were the natural prognostics of those meetings. Looking, therefore, at their character, and anticipating their consequences, government ought to have taken the best advice, and followed a course of conduct which would have prevented the unfortunate occurrences at Manchester. There were three important circumstances to which the attention of the noble viscount and the magistrates ought to have been directed: 1st. It was of great consequence, that if any violence was to take place, it should commence on the part of the populace, and not on the part of the constituted authorities. 2ndly. It was of the utmost importance, if violence was to be employed, that notice of such intention should have been given beforehand, that the people might have been aware of their danger. And 3rdly, It was of the utmost consequence, that if violence was to be employed, and punishment inflicted, that punishment should have fallen on the leaders of the meeting, and not on those who were aware of no offence, and who perhaps attended out of curiosity, and from no participation in the views or objects of those leaders. Without meaning to impugn the conduct of the magistrates or of the yeomanry on that unfortunate occasion, he was compelled to ask their lordships, and beg their lordships to ask themselves, why Mr. Hunt was arrested when on the hustings, surrounded by such a multitude? why he was not arrested when on his way to the meeting—a circumstance which might have prevented it? or why he was not arrested after the meeting had dispersed, which there was every probability, it would have done peaceably? He would ask still farther, why, if the meeting was considered illegal, no precautions were taken to apprise the people of the intent to disperse it, by posting up placards over the town? If such a step was advisable in any place, it was in Manchester, where a caution of the magistrates, warning the inhabitants not to attend the meeting of the 9th, had been attended with complete success. He made these observations, not for the purpose of passing sentence on the magistrates, but as laying the foundation for inquiry; and with them he would dismiss for the present, the consideration of the affair of Manchester.

When he called for inquiry on this subject, it was no sufficient answer, that such inquiry would affect the character of individuals in highly respectable situations. Such an objection was not allowed any weight in 1717, when a riot happened at Oxford from some persons of Jacobite principles, which the troops were sent to quell. The affair was merely local, but the lords went into a committee of the whole house to inquire into the circumstances. Not many years afterwards a similar proceeding was adopted regarding the riots that took place in Edinburgh, when captain Porteous was put to death. Lord Carteret then came down to the House, and proposed a committee of inquiry. A motion was made to call to the bar the magistrates who exercised authority on the occasion. In opposing this motion, several of the Scotch peers then in the House contended, that it would, if agreed to, cast a slur on the lord president of the court of session, the lord provost of Edinburgh, and the other official persons whose conduct was the subject of inquiry. On this representation the debate was adjourned to the following day, when the duke of Newcastle came down to the House, and consented to their being examined at the bar. Now, he would ask, were the magistrates of Manchester above that inquiry which was instituted in the cases of the riots of Oxford and Edinburgh? or did the state of the country then less manifestly and imperiously demand of the House to show an anxiety to watch over and enforce a pure and impartial administration of the laws? If their lordships should entertain the proposed inquiry into the administration of the existing laws, into the distresses of the country, into the cause of those distresses, and the means of removing them, they might, with the best grace, if found necessary, pass the measures of coercion before the House. If, after inquiry, such measures should be thought indispensable, they would, though harsh and severe, be received with acquiescence, and submitted to without murmur; but if inquiry were refused, the proposed laws, though good in themselves, would fail in producing the desired effect. The noble viscount last night strongly expressed himself against concession. If, by saying he would not concede, the noble viscount meant that he would not yield to vague claims, insolent demands, or irritated feelings, he would concur with the noble viscount, and declare likewise against concession. But he was willing to concede what could not be withheld without injustice—he was willing to concede the important benefits and privileges of the British constitution. One of these was, a parliament prepared to hear the complaints of the people, and inclined to redress them; disposed to inquire into their grievances, to listen to their petitions, and to satisfy them, that if restraints were imposed, they were only imposed on the ground of necessity. It had been said from the throne, that their lordships had great duties to discharge. Their lordships would best discharge some of those great duties by endeavouring, by measures of conciliation, to remove any distrust that might exist between the people and the legislature, and by endeavouring to gain the attachment of those whose rights they were bound to protect. The noble marquis concluded with moving, "That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the state of the country, and more particularly into the distresses and discontents prevalent in the manufacturing districts, and the execution of the laws with respect to the numerous meetings which have taken place."

The Marquis of Wellesley expressed his full sense of the praise that was due, and the importance that must attach, to the able and statesman-like speech of the noble marquis who had just sat down—a speech distinguished by those comprehensive views, and embellished from those sources of literature with which his mind was adorned, and which rendered his eloquence and opinions entitled, upon all occasions, to the attention and respect of the national council. After, however, following the noble marquis as closely as he could through his eloquent address, he thought it amounted to no more than this—that in all the complicated and varied perils of a state, the causes of those perils must be of a complicated and various nature, and the remedies must likewise be complicated and various. But this was not the question now to be solved. The question, in all cases of threatened danger to the institutions of a country, would be with all able statesmen, and all great and wise states, what was the paramount duty of the hour? The noble marquis had said, with an eloquence and manliness characteristic of his accomplished mind, that violence must be subdued by force, and sedition repressed by law; but that their lordships ought to inquire into the cause of that violence which must be so subdued, and of that sedition which must be so repressed. In every word of this he entirely agreed with the noble marquis; but the question to-night was, whether, though much violence had been done, worse violence was not intended—whether sedition was not in existence which had not yet been put down by law—whether we had not arrived at that state of constitutional danger which called for exclusive consideration—whether we had not before us that case of violence which must be coerced, and of sedition which must be encountered and extinguished by law? This was the real point at issue, and to have it settled, he had only to appeal to a few facts. Why was parliament now assembled, if peril and sedition did not exist? Parliament was now called together for its own preservation—not in the narrow, limited, selfish, meaning of the term, as it had self-interested privileges to maintain with which the people had no concern, but in the general and important sense of preservation which was implied when the constitution of parliament as an essential part of the constitution of the country was menaced. It met to exercise the first of all the duties and all the rights of a state—that of maintaining the public security from violation and ruin. The noble marquis, in a part of his speech, had entered into a consideration of the perils which now surrounded us, and, in the course of his remarks, stated, as their cause, that great distress existed, and that a general desire of a change was felt, without being accompanied, however, with any fixed object, or regular plan. Here he was at issue with the noble marquis. He would contend, that the object was evident, that the plan was definite, well arranged, and perseveringly pursued, which pointed to a parliamentary change, the effect of which must be the overthrow of society, the destruction of the rights of property, and the demolition of the whole frame of government. The noble marquis had said, that all their lordships admitted the danger. It was their duty, therefore, to examine it, to look it fairly in the face, to see what was its character, and what were its powers, and to meet it with proper firmness. He believed that it was as extensive in its diffusion, as it was alarming in its character, and he begged their lordships to consider in what it consisted. It was of no vague description. It was a fixed and unalterable purpose, a regular and settled project, announced in all the publications of the disaffected, embodied in all the resolutions of their public meetings, and perseveringly pursued with all their energies, to effect such an alteration in the constitution of parliament as would establish universal suffrage, annual elections, and voting by ballot. Were those points on which there could be any doubt—were those doctrines which they had denied, disguised, or renounced? No. Some years ago, their plan was more indefinite; there was a dissension among the supporters of reform, and several of them did not go the length of the tenets which he had stated. Now, they were all agreed: they maintained to a man, that universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and voting by ballot, would redress their grievances; and that unless those concessions were made, their expectations would not be satisfied, nor their grievances redressed. All parts of their plan adhered together, and if carried into execution, would be the destruction of all regular government, the destruction of all religion, and the destruction of all private property. The next circumstance in the danger was the mode in which the plan was to be carried into effect. Their publications and speakers at public meetings announced a settled design to carry their objects by physical force, but recommended, in the first place, to observe order and peace. If their projects could be carried peaceably, their adherents were told it was well; but if not peaceably, at any rate they must be carried. "We come," said they, "with our minds prepared and armed for the conquest of our rights; we would wish to obtain them mildly if we can; if not, we must resort to physical force, and our success is secured." If any man could place reliance on their professions of peace, and surrender his alarms on hearing their exhortations to order, that man must have firmer nerves than he had. No one regretted more than he did the unfortunate occurrences at Manchester. The noble marquis had said, that if the meeting had not been disturbed by the interference of the magistrates, it would have gone off in perfect tranquillity. Perhaps that might have been the case; but why? in the contemplation of times to come. With the most quieting declarations of loyalty and respect to the laws, the disaffected proceeded meekly and peaceably in their projects, boasting of their physical force without using it, waiting for the happy day and the halcyon hour when they might accomplish loyally and unresistedly their schemes of plunder and anarchy. Their peaceable and quiet demeanor, instead of lessening the danger, in his opinion ought to aggravate the alarm. He might say of them Ipsa silentia terrent. They became more dangerous from entertaining such disorganizing doctrines in settled tranquillity. He would put a case:—Suppose they had agreed at one of their assemblies to repeal the Act of Settlement, to depose the king, or to abolish the monarchy, would the alarm of their lordships be reduced, or the guilt of the conspirators lessened, by assurances that they meant to proceed peaceably in the execution of their projects, and that the meetings in which they measured their strength, and confirmed their purpose, passed off with the utmost quietness? In his mind, such quietness, with such designs, appeared like malice prepense, which, though concealed for a time, was more dangerous than temporary passion; and the very circumstance of their tranquillity aggravated their guilt. There was another circumstance which had been stated regarding them, as lessening the alarm with which they ought to be viewed, but which, in his mind, increased it. It was said their projects were so wild, absurd, and extravagant, that they could make no progress towards their execution, and therefore they could not be accompanied with danger. He need not tell those who had either attended to the principles of the human mind, or studied the pages of history, how much mischief had arisen to the world from practical attempts to accomplish impracticable schemes, and realize absurd theories. There was in virtue, in science, and in art, a certain point of excellence which was unattainable, but towards which the admirers of each never ceased to aspire, and in approaching which every step was fraught with improvement—every step added to the dignity of human nature. So with the arts of confusion and anarchy. They might not succeed, but they had an invincible tendency towards realization. In those wild and destructive theories which had for their object the subversion of society, although there was a point of ruin which might not be achievable, every step in the progress towards it had its evil. Universal suffrage might not be attainable; but in the pursuit universal confusion might take place, and every step towards the accomplishment of so absurd and chimerical a scheme would be but a step towards creating new mischiefs. He might apply this also to another subject—he meant, to those attempts which were made to subvert the religion of the nation. Attempts so wild and fantastical as these would scarcely enter into the imagination of any man. So frantic an opinion could scarcely enter the head of any man, as to suppose that in this enlightened country, where knowledge was so advanced, and where the purest religion was established, the monstrous doctrine of unmitigated atheism could be disseminated with any success. But in attempting to realize this object, although the pursuit was not likely to be attended with success, yet the very effort which was made, would tend to dissolve the purity of religion, to undermine faith, to destroy morality, and to dissolve all those bonds which bound man to man: and would it in such a state of things be any satisfaction to be told that the establishment of atheism was impracticable, and could never be accomplished? Why, then, he would ask, were such attempts to be treated with indifference? He was willing to believe that these projects were confined to a few visionary individuals; he did not believe that the whole people of England were tainted with such principles; nevertheless, he submitted that they demanded the powerful and vigorous efforts of the legislature to suppress them. His noble friend had told them, that it was very proper to inquire into the state of distress throughout the whole country. He was not disposed to deny the policy of such a proceeding at a proper time, and the expediency of applying every measure which might be calculated to remedy that distress; but was that inquiry to take precedence of those steps which the imminent danger in which the country was placed so imperiously demanded? Would it be proper to appoint a committee, the investigations of which must necessarily engage the attention of all the ability and all the integrity of the House, from hour to hour, and from day to day, at a moment when the absolute safety of the country was at stake? The noble marquis had also stated, that part of his plan was to consider the administration of justice, with respect to the enforcement of the law of libel, and whether, in their lordship's judgment, the proper means had been taken of carrying into effect the provisions of that law. This certainly was a very fit subject for their lordships' attention; but was that a reason for appointing a committee before they proceeded to take into consideration the specific measures that were addressed to the immediate evils known to exist? The noble marquis surely did not mean that the bills, which had been so properly submitted to the notice of the House, were to be deferred in order to make way for his inquiry; if not, he would ask, how was it possible, if the committee were appointed, for any of their lordships who usually took part in such subjects to pay that attention to those bills which their importance demanded? He repeated, that to examination at a proper season he had no objection; but when the nature of the danger to which the country was exposed came under their view, he apprehended all other topics ought to give way to the adoption of measures for meeting that danger in the most effective and decisive manner. The noble marquis had also alluded to a subject connected with this question to which he felt himself called upon to advert—he meant the necessity of conciliating the people of England, by making some alterations in the constitution of the Commons House of Parliament.

The Marquis of Lansdowne disclaimed having spoken of any such necessity.

The Marquis Wellesley, in continuation, said, that the noble marquis might not perhaps mean to express himself to that extent; but that it was evident nothingless would satisfy the discontented. He had seen petitions forced upon the House of Commons, signed by a number of persons resident in Manchester, in which it was stated, in the true language of the radicals, that the constitution of that House, as it stood, was so great a grievance that it was thought to be the source of all other grievances; that it was for the purpose of declaring this that the meeting was convened at Manchester; and for the purpose of calling upon that House, the purity of which they questioned, to appoint a public inquiry into the causes of their distress. This was, in fact, neither more nor less than saying, "We declare the constitution to be a nuisance, which we are determined to abate; and while you are sitting in deliberation, we will continue to take those steps which we conceive necessary for its abatement." He would ask their lordships if it was at all probable that those very persons who called for inquiry would rest quiet while that inquiry was going forward? Would they not, in pursuit of their main object, the attainment of universal suffrage, continue to pursue their plans of demolition? Was it a safe course for parliament to take, to furnish them with an opportunity of effecting their purpose? Would it be safe, while these persons were engaged in enterprises for deabolishing the constitution, deliberately to enter into an investigation of the causes of their dissatisfaction? The best, the wisest, and the most prudent course to pursue, would be, as the noble earl had so properly expressed it, "By law to put sedition, and by force to subdue violence." But was this the disposition of the people of England at large? Of this he had the strongest doubts, and he believed that the distresses of the manufacturing districts had been greatly exaggerated; but, supposing distress to exist to a considerable degree, was it because the people were so distressed that their lives were to be unprotected? Was it because the distresses of the people exposed them to the artifices of designing demagogues, who would lead them to the commission of every violence, that therefore laws were not to be created to prevent their mischievous purposes? It was true, that the distresses of the people were not to be disregarded, and no man more deeply lamented the existence of those distresses than himself; but he thought a more urgent consideration presented itself to the House, and that was, the importance of adopting measures calculated to repress that spirit of violence by which the peaceable and respectable part of the community was at present threatened. It would, indeed, exhibit an inexcusable absence of that vigilance which the trust reposed in them demanded, if they were to shut their eyes against those scenes which were daily exhibited in the most populous districts of the kingdom. He did not mean to contend, that the bills which had been submitted to the House by his majesty's ministers were of necessity to be adopted; nor did he mean to contend that they did not require due deliberation; on the contrary, he thought it was fit they should be viewed with every prudent caution, and that the talents and the experience of the noble lords by whom he was surrounded should be applied to their improvement, if improvement were necessary, or to their alteration, if alteration were conceived expedient; but he apprehended, that the true course of wisdom would be, to suffer them to take precedence of all other measures, so that an effectual check might be given to those mischiefs, from which there was at present so much reason to anticipate consequences of the most afflicting character. Among other causes of alarm, and not the least prominent, were the meetings which were unfortunately so prevalent. He did not think that these meetings could be called the meetings of the people of England. He had too much respect for the people of England as a body, to suppose that they were actuated by similar motives to those which distinguished the generality of these assemblies. He considered them altogether as a wretched Babel, as a set of vagabonds, who met, not to deliberate and to examine into supposed grievances, not to discuss the question of reform, but for the purpose of ascertaining what force they could apply to that atrocious object which they had in view—the subversion of the constitution, and the substitution of those wild and fantastical theories, by the detail of which that House had been so repeatedly disgusted. It would, indeed, be the prostitution of language to characterise such wretches as the people of England—a people who had justly excited the wonder, the admiration, and the envy of the world. To call them the people of England was but a trick—a decoy, for the purpose of alienating the affections of those who were suffering under a temporary distress, from their sovereign, for the purpose of promoting a system of wickedness, fraught with the most terrific consequences to society, and for the purpose of destroying all that happiness which the people of this country were capable of enjoying under the blessings of their glorious constitution. This was the character of the meetings which he had been attempting to describe—meetings which, he would repeat, were calculated, unless suppressed by parliament, to sap the spirit of loyalty, of morality, and of religion, and altogether to subvert our laws and our liberties. Such meetings had justly been described by lord Holt, not as an assault upon parliament, not as an assault upon the state, but as an assault upon the people themselves. Could the liberties of England be said to be supported or promoted by the vagrant licentiousness of such men? Their conduct was, indeed, a libel upon the character of British liberty. The liberty of the subject was most opposite to that which these persons were ambitious to enjoy. He was a warm advocate for the liberty of the subject; but by this what did he mean? He meant the liberty of those who were subject to the laws of their country; of those who were subject to the religion of their country; of those who were subject to moral restraint; of those who were subject to the constitution of the state; of those who were subject to all those principles upon which British liberty, as distinguished from that which, existed in every other part of the world had been pillared and founded; and which if maintained in its purity, must bid defiance to every attack, however violent, but if not, and the radicals were once allowed to lift their heads, radice in tartara tendit. He thought it their lordships duty to proceed with as much despatch as possible to the consideration of the measures which had been proposed by his majesty's ministers; and with great respect to his noble friend he must therefore declare his conviction that the subjects proposed by his noble friend's motion ought not to precede that consideration.

Lord Erskine said;—My lords, I have listened with great attention to the very eloquent speech of the noble marquis who has just sat down; and if I could at all agree with him in the facts which he assumes, I should not be disposed to differ from him, either as to the dangers which surround us, or the duty imposed upon the House for the public safety; neither should I differ from lord Holt as to the powers of the magistracy, when the state is in imminent peril, or the peace dangerously broken. My opinion is, that they are amply sufficient, as they have been found for ages; and that if they are defective they ought to be amended. But the difference between us is upon the facts, and not upon the law; supposing however the proposed bills to be necessary, and necessary without delay, surely the proposal of my noble friend would not at all delay that consideration. The bills might be considered in their ordinary progress, without at all clashing with the important objects to be considered by a select committee which you are called upon by the motion to embrace, and which, on the very first day of the session, ought in another shape to have been our earliest duty.

My lords, I am now an old man, and have been nearly forty years in parliament, yet I declare solemnly that I never felt more unqualified regret for any proceeding in it, than at the rejection of the amendment proposed by my noble friend, and so eloquently pressed upon our attention on the first day of the session. If your lordships had fortunately adopted it, you could have had nothing farther to consider on this painful subject, and would have escaped the double error of rejecting the proposition of the noble marquis to-night, which I cannot but painfully foresee. You would then have had an unanimous parliament, pledged by the address, and not at all touched, but on the contrary confirmed and strengthened by the wise addition proposed to it; you would have had this unanimous parliament, reprobating all seditious combinations, calling upon both magistrates and people, by the combined authorities of the state, to support the constitution and to maintain public order and tranquillity. In all this, the amendment concurred with the address, and asked nothing more than that the people should not be condemned unheard, and that whatever might have been the extent of individual indiscretions or offences, or of a disposition to disturb the government, the offenders might have been withdrawn from dangerous and impracticable courses, by our showing them, that whilst we were bound in duty and firmly resolved to enforce obedience to the laws, even by military force, when necessity demanded the painful resort to it; yet that we were equally bound, to suffer no excess or abuse of it, equally determined to protect the people, and, sympathising with their sufferings, to exert the whole authority of the state to arrive at the real truth of the blood shed at Manchester, so as to see that the ends of justice should be accomplished. I am convinced, my lords, that if you had pursued this course which my noble friend recommended, you would have done more to tranquillize the country, and to bring back the affections of the disaffected, than all the laws you can pass, and all the prosecutions by which you can carry them into execution. I have had many more opportunities of knowing the sentiments and feelings of those who are classed as seditious subjects, than most of your lordships can have had; and it is my unalterable conviction and belief, that a system of alarm, supported by mysterious green bags, and the array of special commissions, followed as they have been, and will be, by convictions not sufficiently numerous to inspire terror, only exasperate evils, the unfortunate existence of which I lament as much as any of your lordships. He must surely be a total stranger to the long-proved characteristic of the British people, to their loyalty, in more recent and perilous times, and, above all to the fortitude and patience with which they are bearing at this moment, unexampled privations, not to be convinced, that even if your inquiry were sure only to confirm the opinions you act upon, and would publicly condemn those you have condemned without hearing, it would exalt your authority, and bring back those who from error only had opposed it. My lords, a systematic indulgence at this moment would place our government as upon a rock, and sedition against it would be trampled under foot. Take my word for it, there is no other course by which affection can be cultivated, and contented obedience secured—tranquillity may be enforced by severity, and turbulence be made silent, but it would be a dangerous silence.

Nevertheless, my lords, I do not wish to go beside the question before the House, nor to deny, that we might have had a very different duty to perform, if we had materials before us to establish that a widely extended conspiracy existed to overthrow the government, that overt acts of rebellion or of dangerous sedition had been committed, and that the proceedings at Manchester, which we have sought as yet in vain to investigate, was a manifest branch of that treasonable combination; but what materials have we to pronounce this judgment? Certainly none at all. That multitudes led by evil minded, but more probably by ignorant persons, have clamoured for unfit, impracticable changes in the constitution I readily admit, and that they have held meetings so absurdly numerous as to render disorder probable and dangerous, and I admit that the meeting at Manchester was one of them, but does the papers laid upon the table which I now hold in my hand bear us out (or any thing like it) in more than I have described; does it warrant us in believing that a treasonable conspiracy was then on foot. His majesty's ministers may have farther information which they may think right at this moment to conceal, and which on their own responsibility, they may give credit to; but your lordships can only act upon the materials before us; and it appears to me very strange how the noble marquis who spoke last can have collected from them the desperate state of the country as he has described it. The Manchester magistrates, even at so late a period before the 16th of August as the 1st of July, tell the secretary of state, "that they cannot state any specific facts on which legal responsibility would attach to any individual," but they add, "that though they cannot sufficiently applaud the hitherto peaceable demeanor of the lower orders, yet they do not calculate on their remaining unmoved." Are these facts to proceed upon as portending a revolution, more especially as the magistrates immediately afterwards expose the fallacy of their own apprehensions, since the Birmingham meeting went off to their "perfect satisfaction," as they themselves express it, "breaking up before 7 o'clock without any breach of the peace;" and they say, that "women and children were a great proportion of the crowd." The meeting at Hunslet moor was also equally quiet; and when the one advertised for the 9th of August, which afterwards took place on the 16th, was declared to be illegal by the magistrates, they gave it up, and it did not take place. These are all the public meetings, or other acts that are mentioned in the papers on the table, showing undoubtedly tumultuous assemblies which ought to be suppressed, but reflecting great blame on the magistrates for not using the powers already vested in them by law, for their safer and earlier dispersion. On the part of the multitude there appeared no disposition to a forcible resistance. On the contrary, as I have just observed, when they were informed by the magistrates, that the meeting projected to be held on the 9th of August would be illegal, it was abandoned. This was known to the Manchester magistrates, who had also full knowledge of the meetings held at Birmingham and other places, and who had themselves prohibited the meeting on the 9th of August with effect. Why then, I ask, did they not take the same steps, or stronger ones if necessary, to prevent the one in question from taking place, though they saw it publicly advertised; and having failed in that salutary precaution, why did they not, when they saw numerous and concentrating masses of people advancing from different quarters to form a junction on the margin of so populous a city as Manchester, why did they not station a numerous body of peace officers and constables, supported by the yeomanry or other troops at their command, at the mouths of the different avenues through which this junction was to be formed, before an assemblage could take place which they considered to be so dangerous to the public peace? What possible excuse can be made for this omission? They cannot say, that they thought the powers vested in them by law were insufficient for that useful purpose. Their subsequent conduct, on the very same day, when they authorised all the violences which were committed, sufficiently prove that they had no idea of any such defect in their authority, when without necessity they so notoriously overstepped it, yet now contend that they did not. Surely the Riot act itself was a sufficient authority safely to have effected the dispersion of an assembly which their own negligence had swelled to such an amount.

I distinctly admit, that when overt acts of felony or destructive mischief are committed, every man is a magistrate, and may repel force by force; but no overt act of felony or mischief had been committed or threatened when the yeomanry were directed to rush upon this defenceless multitude, with women and children in their path. But even supposing that so much danger was apprehended by their not dispersing within the period appointed by the statute, why, as has happened in many instances in London—why did they not advance upon the people firmly but slowly, and push them back? What colour or excuse for sabring right and left this unarmed multitude? Is this the law, my lords? [Here lord Erskine quoted a passage from lord Holt.]—The statute only declared them felons, if an hour had elapsed; and they were then only subject to indictments, but not to be cut down as in rebellion or battle, unless such acts were committed as to take the case out of the Riot act, and out of all other laws and statutes, when property and even life are to be defended and secured. But no such case appears from the papers before us, whilst the agitation of the public mind upon a transaction so visible and public, made known to us by petitions from so many quarters, affords a strong presumption of an invasion of public liberty, which it is the duty of parliament to resist and to punish. Your lordships must forgive me for not immediately taking for granted the truth of every thing collected together and laid upon the table of this House. In the year 1794, your lordships prepared and published a report which declared, that a conspiracy of a far different and more perilous description, was on foot;—no less than the formation of a traitorous convention to overthrow the government; and the same proceeding took place in the House of Commons also. I make no question that parliament gave full credit to the facts which it so reported and made public. It is not my practice to impute to others what I should be ashamed to do myself. Yet, what was the result when the prisoners accused of all this, were arraigned and brought to trial? Nothing more than that many seditious libels had been written and circulated, and many misdemeanors had been committed by people for the most part strangers to one another; but no traitorous conspiracy was found to have been either formed or contemplated.

Compare, however, my lords, the evidence so collected and reported by the two Houses of Parliament with the papers now before the House. The last, my lords, could not be gravely opened at the Old Bailey to convict any individual for more than perhaps having been present at an assembly, arguable to be illegal.—What evidence have we here to support the charge of a traitorous conspiracy—or, properly speaking, of any act whatsoever? Only the affidavits of A. B. C. and others their companions. I have not been accustomed to deal with those alphabetical witnesses, though I am obliged to confess that when I came to O. P. I thought that there must have been a riot. But to speak gravely, I do not find fault that names do not in general appear to these informations—the reason for which is fair and obvious, and I have no doubt that they are the declarations or oaths of individuals who, for any thing I know to the contrary, may be worthy of credit; but I have no way of cross-examining the letters in a spelling-book; I must see witnesses face to face before I can pronounce upon any facts that they depose; and that appears to be an additional ground for granting an inquiry into the whole matter which may be made the foundation hereafter of important changes in the laws. But, taking the papers as they are, without any such objections, what do they contain beyond the very imprudent and improper collections for any purpose however legal, so manifestly dangerous to the public peace. Mr. Taylor and Mr. Nadin, whose names are subscribed to their depositions, inform us, that when they came to examine those formidable trainers as to the objects they had in view, they answered that they were practising so as to be able to march with the band at the Manchester meeting, and upon the whole evidence this appears to have been the truth. Was it a crime, then, to appear to have an ear for music, and to keep the step?

It is true that numbers—greatly increasing as the public burthens have accumulated, have maintained and still contend for universal suffrage, as a vested right which I hold to be absurdly preposterous; but what then? It is no kind of evidence that they are traitors, or rogues, or vagabonds. Was the duke of Richmond a traitor, who may be said to have been the author and the strenuous advocate for this system? Was Mr. Pitt a traitor, who so nobly distinguished himself in that cause? [lord Sidmouth said across the House, that Mr. Pitt had never supported universal suffrage] Lord E. said, I dare say not; my noble friend must better know it; but he acted with and was supported by those who then were friends to the most extended representation.—Was Mr. Sheridan also a traitor; Mr. Sheridan the invaluable supporter of government in the most awfully trying times?—Is it fair in short to consider every tumultuous meeting in support of any kind of reform as proof of a traitorous disposition? It is to overt acts, and not to opinions we must look, when criminal charges are to be made. There were no such overt acts upon the 16th of August, and nothing can be more affecting than the sufferings of many who, from mere curiosity, were present; yet no regret for this was to be found in the speech from the throne.—I am aware that your lordships sitting here in parliament can only consider the Prince Regent in his public capacity, and I may perhaps therefore be out of order in expressing feelings which regard him as a private man; but, having been in his Royal Highness's service from the beginning of my public life, and under many personal obligations, I cannot but be much affected by any thing which personally concerns his honour and reputation. Why then, my lords, did not his majesty's ministers, even supposing them to have been justified, which I deny, in sanctioning the acts of the Manchester magistrates in the Prince Regent's name, why did not they in the speech to be delivered from the throne, introduce the strongest expressions of sorrow for the melancholy sufferings which unquestionably had taken place, from whatever cause they proceeded.—The higher orders undoubtedly well know, who are acquainted with the forms of parliament, that the Prince Regent's speech no more proceeds from himself than from the porter at Carlton-house; but the lower orders do not know this, and it is notorious that many injurious remarks have proceeded from this omission, and that his Royal Highness may thereby have appeared to the multitude as dead to those humane and good natured feelings which have been his Royal Highness's characteristic when occasions have called them forth.

To conclude, my lords, I lament that new laws are to be enacted, when, if all the facts were before your lordships, it would appear that not only the existing ones are sufficient, but that their authorities have been wantonly exceeded and abused, whilst, at the same moment, they are unaccountably suffered to sleep when they most ought to be exerted.—I have seen within a few days, not only in the shops of booksellers, but in others of all descriptions, a placard announcing for sale the Mock Trial of Mr. Carlisle, and in large letters, "Infamous Conduct of the Judge," whose lenity was carried throughout the trial to the utmost limits of indulgence.—Surely, my lords, libels of this description should not pass unpunished; yet they are suffered to corrupt the public mind with impunity, whilst you are about to pass new statutes, instead of carrying those you have into execution. It is this negligence which is the parent of offences. Execute the existing laws with promptitude and vigour, and it will be quite unnecessary to enact transportation for a libel—a punishment unknown to the constitution.

The impolicy of imposing new restrictions on public liberty we shall very shortly, I fear, have but too many opportunities to consider, and I shall therefore pass it by for the present. I shall content myself with only saying, that they never can restore confidence, nor willing obedience to government—confide yourselves in the people, and all murmurs and discontent will be at an end. For my own part, whilst I have life and strength, to raise my voice, I will continue to protest against them here, and every where; I will not repeat with the same oath what I said in the House of Commons when similar restrictions were in agitation, but I will say firmly, that I was born a freeman and will not die a slave.

My Lords;—The admission with which my noble friend who opened the present question ; commenced his temperate and able speech, relieves those who may follow him in this debate from all necessity of expatiating on the painful circumstances of our present danger. He sees and acknowledges its existence ; he is deeply sensible both of its magnitude and its urgency ; and the glowing colours in which he has represented our present situation, must have made the strongest impression on the minds of all your lordships. For myself, unquestionably, need not say what is my own conviction on this subject. Often has it been my painful duty to express, in this House, the continued and increasing anxiety with which I have regarded the attacks unceasingly directed against the whole frame and fabric of our government. Often have I laboured and laboured ineffectually, to impress these feelings on the minds of others. My apprehensions have been considered as visionary, originating much more in a fond and solicitous attachment to the interests which I conceived to be endangered, than in any just view of the actual condition, or future prospects, of my country. And would to Heaven that it were so ! Joyful indeed would this hour have been to me, if I could now rise and confess my error ; if I could say to those from whom it has been my misfortune to differ on these questions, " My apprehensions were vain ; your security was well grounded."

The reverse unhappily is true. During a large portion of a long public life, now closed, I have watched the destructive tendency of these revolutionary projects. — I have marked their unremitted activity, — their growing confidence, — their extended influence, — their fast advancing progress. But the evil has outrun my apprehensions. Never, at any former period, has it presented so fierce and menacing an aspect ; never yet has it so imperiously required, from the wisdom and firmness of my country, the most immediate, vigorous. and determined resistance.

It is this persuasion which alone induces me ; it is this which irresistibly compels me, contrary to all my expectations and all my wishes, once more to solicit your indulgence in the discharge of duties which I thought had been for ever closed.

Let me, then, in the outset of these deliberations, entreat your lordships continually to bear in mind that the mischief against which we are now called upon to defend our country, is not merely of the present day ; no, nor of the present year. Its true origin must be traced much farther back, — its real causes must be sought much deeper, — its remedies must be applied with a foresight and policy extending far beyond that pressure of temporary distress to which alone my noble friend is willing to ascribe it. Even in the course of this debate, your recollection has been called to those measures which, in the year 1795, now nearly five-and-twenty years ago, it had already become necessary to adopt for the defence of our laws and government. And it was then that Mr. Burke declared, and he has consigned the sentiment to posterity in his immortal writings, that the grounds of that necessity did not originate among us even with the French Revolution, although that terrible convulsion of the world did, undoubtedly call them forth, increase them, and give fresh vigour to their operation.

In what manner your security was then provided for, and how it was maintained during the long and arduous contest which ensued, I will not now detain you by examining. We all remember, that from the happy restoration of peace increased confidence was felt, increased assurance drawn by many, for the permanent and undisturbed continuance of our domestic tranquillity. From that very date the mischief has on the contrary been constantly increasing. Every successive period, down even to the moment in which I now address you, has brought us only fresh menace, augmented violence, more open and more ostentatious defiance of the public authority in all its branches. And I now call with earnestness on all who hear me, to reflect, how rarely the history of any country has exhibited so rapid a progress of such a danger within so short a time !

Unquestionably, when such designs are entertained, and such projects are pursued, the distress of any part of our population must always give great opportunity and advantage to the promoters of sedition. It is the most powerful engine by which they can operate ; the stimulant, by which they inflame the passions of the ignorant, and drive their deluded victims on to acts of desperation, which, instead of alleviating, can serve only to aggravate, and to prolong their difficulties. But occurrences like these are the instruments, not the causes of the mischief. Much of this evil exists where these distresses have had comparatively little operation. Many are most forward in the sedition whom the pressure has least affected; while those on whom it has most severely borne, have, in many cases, conducted themselves with exemplary patience and resolution, untainted by this pernicious contagion, obedient to the laws, and inviolably attached to those institutions which have so long been the glory and happiness of Englishmen.

If then it were possible, by any measures within the reach of human legislation, to alleviate their difficulties; if, by any operation of law or government, we could hope to mitigate the present distresses of our manufacturing population, most readily would I enter on the discussion of any such proposal, and most earnestly, I am sure, would it be pursued by parliament. We all deplore, in common, these melancholy effects of causes which we cannot control; we deeply sympathize in the afflictions of our fellow-subjects; and not our interests and policy alone, but every higher feeling which animates the heart of man, would lead us to embrace with joy, and to follow up with perseverance, the remotest expectation of contributing to their relief. Even those general principles of legislation to which we are most bound to adhere, because by them the permanent prosperity of the whole community is best promoted; even these, I would consent, on such an occasion, to disregard for a time; could I be persuaded, that in that course an effective and adequate remedy could be found against the present pressure.

But my noble friend, in the very act of proposing such an inquiry, has but too well enabled us to judge how little real benefit we can derive from its result. He felt too justly what belongs to his high rank, and still higher station, in this country; he followed too closely the dictates of his own exalted and honourable mind, to countenance those vague and groundless insinuations, which, not indeed within these walls, but in popular assemblies, and in seditious publications, have been profusely poured out against the British legislature. He condescends not so to delude the multitude. He imputes not to parliament the blame of events which are beyond the control of man; nor does he charge upon his political opponents the neglect of a duty, which he well knows that no government, and no legislature, could possibly perform. He has stated, on the contrary, in the language, and with the science, of a statesman, the true causes in which he considers the pressure to have originated; causes far removed from affording the smallest grounds for any such imputation. And he has, with no less candour than ability, distinctly enumerated the only measures to which, in his judgment, this House could even now resort, with any hope of rendering our interposition honourable to ourselves, and beneficial to our country.

Through these details I will endeavour shortly to follow him. The interest of the subject will apologize for what may be tedious in the discussion.

With respect, then, to the origin of the present distress, we must, no doubt, in some degree, ascribe it to temporary causes of depression, to which so complicated a system of commerce and manufacture must always be liable. The products of our industry cannot be so exactly calculated as never to exceed the demand for them; nor do the markets themselves remain unaltered. Fashions vary, other productions enter into successful competition with ours, and the occasional distresses of foreign nations lessen their powers of purchase and consumption. It is then that the necessity of transferring capital and labour to more profitable employment becomes urgent and difficult. Hazardous and groundless speculations are made; and even the most skilful commercial enterprises are affected by disappointments and embarrassments, to the production of which they have in no degree contributed.

But in any more permanent view of our present situation, nearly all, I think, that my noble friend has stated, and certainly all that I should venture to press upon your attention, may be referred to the operation of one general and leading principle of political economy. In peace, and under the happy influence of domestic tranquillity, the capital of every civilized community, especially if permitted to find for itself its most profitable employment, tends naturally to increase in a more rapid proportion than the population; and the effect of this its augmented and growing preponderance, is felt in the correspondent increase of all which constitutes national prosperity. But it operates most immediately, and visibly, to the benefit of the lower classes of society. It is by the application of capital alone that any employment is ever found for their industry; by augmented capital, additional employment is provided; and hence again arises a new and growing demand for labour, and a continually progressive improvement in the reward and the condition of the labourer.

The tendency of war is, in all respects, opposite to this; especially of such a war as that which this country, in common with every other European state, has recently and unavoidably been compelled to sustain. In war, large amounts of capital are continually and utterly destroyed. Much is also diverted to channels of employment, wholly or comparatively, unproductive; from whence, on the return of peace, it cannot again be transferred into its natural course, without much difficulty, delay, and loss.

It is therefore, to a long continuance of this great calamity, that we must ascribe our present distress, and that of so many other nations, who unhappily share it with us. The implacable hostility, the inordinate and insatiable ambition of the successive revolutionary governments of France, are the true causes which have extended this, with so many other incalculable evils, to every quarter of the globe. Hence arose the call for exertions unexampled in duration and extent; the sacrifices required indispensably for national independence; and the necessity of those united efforts, by the unparalleled magnitude of which, alone the contest could have been successfully, or safely terminated. Who can doubt how much all these causes, aided also in this, and in other countries, by the unhappy error of an excessive and forced paper currency, must, in a long course of more than twenty years, have contributed to arrest the natural increase of capital, and perhaps, in some of the last of those years, to effect an actual diminution of it? But the population of our own country, instead of experiencing any correspondent diminution, has, on the contrary, during this whole period, been continually and greatly augmented. The result, probably, not only of our insular situation, and comparative exemption from the direct calamities of war, but also of the artificial and improvident system of our poor laws, established more than two centuries ago!

But whatever be the cause, the fact is certain. The proportion which before existed, between our capital and our population, has been essentially varied. And the conclusion follows irresistibly. No art, no wisdom, no power of man, can make our diminished capital equally productive as before of employment and subsistence for our augmented numbers.

Where, then, shall we look for the remedy? There only, where it is placed by Providence, in the admirable disposition of moral as well as of natural causes. To the flow of the same tide which has already ceased to ebb; to those altered circumstances which now again operate in a favourable direction; to that returning and rapid accumulation of capital, which reason and experience teach us again to expect; when the science, and enterprise, and industry of a great and enlightened nation are protected in peace, and secured in domestic tranquillity.

In addition, however, to this firm and sure hope of progressive improvement, there are three measures, or rather subjects of inquiry, which my noble friend suggests for the examination of a select committee of this House, with a view to more immediate and present relief. As brought forward by him, they are entitled to our respectful attention; they would animate all our exertions if they held out any just expectation of promoting the purpose for which he proposes them.

But the first of them he does not himself recommend to your adoption, unless you entertained a hope, which neither he feels, nor can you venture to encourage. If you believed that this pressure was the effect only of some sudden and transient calamity, and likely, therefore, to be very speedily removed, you might, he thinks, be inclined to discuss the question of giving temporary aid to the sufferers, by grants drawn from the national credit, or national finance. And, undoubtedly, there have been cases of that description, where our feelings, prevailing perhaps over our better judgment, or at least overruling our general principles of legislation, have induced us so to act. But to those examples, our actual condition bears no resemblance, either in the nature or in the causes of the pressure, in its present extent, or in its probable duration. Nor must we forget what has been, even in those less objectionable cases, the true operation of such interference. Arrangements of this description, however plausible and popular, make no real addition to the wealth of the nation; they furnish, therefore, no new means of employment for its industry. Capital is not created by them, but transferred. It is for the most part diverted from that channel, in which it furnishes profitable employment to one portion of our people, and forced into another course, in which the labour which it sets in motion, is avowedly less productive to its employer, and consequently less beneficial to the community.

Touching, therefore, but lightly on this suggestion, on which he himself manifestly places no reliance, my noble friend passed to his two other more general subjects of investigation; both of them, undoubtedly, well entitled to the fullest consideration of parliament, but both, as it seems to me, extending very far beyond those bounds, which could be embraced by the labours of a select committee.

The first of these includes the whole wide circle of our finance. He would examine, whether the means could not be found of levying a revenue equal to that by which we now provide for the public faith and public safety, but collecting this amount in some mode of less unpopular or less burthensome taxation. An inquiry of almost infinite detail! To be entered upon, not in the gross, but with a careful and scrutinizing survey of each particular change which may be recommended: and even in this course, the only one in which it can be usefully pursued, leading us almost immediately to the most intricate and complicated combinations! In the present state of a revenue, composed of so many various branches, mutually bearing upon each other in almost innumerable relations, what questions of greater difficulty, of wider compass, and more hazardous decision, can be proposed to any statesman? There might, for example, taking the very instance which my noble friend alleges; there might be reason to believe, that by a diminution of duty, and a consequent increase of consumption, foreign wines might be made to yield their present amount of revenue at a lower rate of taxation. I think it probably would be so. But, for practical purposes, the inquiry must not stop here. Before this measure could safely be adopted, its operation must be deeply considered with reference to the other weighty considerations which it involves, both of commerce and of revenue. We must ascertain, if indeed it be possible to ascertain before-hand, in what manner, and to what degree, the increased use of foreign wines which we should thus promote, would affect the production and sale of the many other articles of analogous consumption, which are so important to our trade and to our agriculture, and from every one of which so large a revenue is derived.

It is far from my purpose to discourage the due examination of any such projects. The attention both of government and of parliament would be well directed to them; and never would I dissuade you from the task. But it is necessary, on this occasion, and with reference to the motion which we are now considering, to remind you of its great extent and difficulty; of the impossibility of pursuing it usefully through the inquiries of a select committee; and above all, of the utter hopelessness of looking to it for any present or sensible effect in relieving distress, or appeasing discontent.

The same remarks apply, but still more forcibly, to a similar examination with which it is proposed that this select committee should be charged, as to the whole system of our commercial legislation, susceptible, undoubtedly, of great improvement. On that subject my noble friend and I are, as I believe, fully agreed in principle. We both consider that policy as erroneous, which purports to encourage domestic industry by the prohibition of foreign commodities. We both believe that such devices, instead of promoting, have obstructed our commercial prosperity, exactly in proportion as they limit the free, and therefore most profitable, employment of capital. We are both persuaded that, besides this general mischief, these regulations directly counteract their own purpose, by narrowing the only means which the foreign merchant has both of purchase and of return; and by thus closing the market of the world against those very manufactures, whose prosperity we are labouring to advance. I will add, that in the particular case which he instanced, that of the discouragements now opposed to the import of timber from the Baltic, I am myself as much satisfied of their impolicy as it is possible to be without minute and detailed inquiry. Other errors of a similar description might, I fear, very easily be pointed out. But every session offers the opportunity of bringing these, distinctly and separately, under the view of parliament; and they would be thus much more safely, because much more deliberately, corrected, than by any general inquiries instituted in the form now proposed, and with reference to the urgency of present distress.

For in truth there can scarcely be any subject on which deliberation is more necessary, or where greater dangers would result from inconsiderate haste. Our prohibitory code in this respect closely resembles the system of our poor laws. Both are, as it is now generally acknowledged, prejudicial to the public welfare, though the latter no doubt is by far the most injurious to our labouring population. But both are of very long standing in our Statute book; closely interwoven with all our interests, deeply grafted into our system, both of commerce and of agriculture, and in our actual condition inseparably connected even with the subsistence of a very great proportion of our people. They are both therefore to be approached only with the utmost solicitude and caution; to be touched only with the most delicate and tender hand. The same enlightened policy which now condemns their principle, the same juster views of benevolence and patriotism which have taught us to regret their establishment, teach us also that in a state of our society which they have mainly contributed to make what it now is, there can be no safety in their removal, otherwise than by a long succession of temperate and well-considered measures, uniformly, but slowly, directed to the ultimate object of a better legislation.

It is obvious, therefore, that from this source nothing is to be drawn by which present distress can be alleviated. Gradual improvement may be made, and future benefit derived. But sudden and extensive changes in our commercial code would always be dangerous, and might in the present moment lead us to destruction. They would infallibly increase the existing pressure, they might possibly aggravate it almost beyond endurance.

And let me farther remind your lordships with respect to both these proposed investigations, that their inconvenience and hazard arise not merely from the extent which they embrace, or the results to which they might possibly lead, but also from the very nature of the subjects which they propose for discussion. I am far from agreeing in the opinion which has been stated to us, that these inquiries, even if unproductive of any practical good, would still produce conciliatory and tranquillizing impressions. From such a disappointment of hopes so raised, I should fear a directly contrary effect. I know of no policy more injurious, none more dangerous to the public peace, than that of exciting, in moments of pressure, expectations which we cannot realize.

But much more is such an experiment to be deprecated, when the very questions which it involves are such as cannot even be proposed, without exciting to mutual opposition and contest many and powerful conflicting interests. We are arrived, I trust, at the end of the painful duty of taxation. If its burthen can be alleviated without affecting its produce, happy will those be to whose lot it may fall to confer so great a benefit upon their country. But without the certainty of this result let us not tamper with the revenue, nor trifle with the feelings of those who contribute to it. Unless the advantage of change be indisputable, the very proposal of change is in itself injurious.

As to our commerce, we have now the opportunity of considering, under the happy auspices of peace, how it may be most certainly, and most beneficially, extended. The removal of prohibitions, and the reduction of prohibitory duties, on foreign produce and manufactures, are pointed out by my noble friend as the best measures for that purpose. They unquestionably are so, and they are the fittest to be gradually adopted. But let us not forget that they are also, however unjustly, the most repugnant to the prejudices of every people; and the most likely to irritate and to inflame, instead of appeasing, the discontents of those classes of our own population whose present sufferings we lament, and whose feelings we are solicitous to sooth and to conciliate, by every practicable measure by which real kindness can best be manifested.

I pass then to the second part of my noble friend's motion, that which more directly relates to the internal situation of our country, and to the threatened interruption of its domestic tranquillity. On many parts of this subject, we are all agreed. If, by whatever means, either of previous preparation, or present distress, evil-minded men are endeavouring to plunge us into the unmeasurable calamities of civil discord, our duties cannot be doubtful. To our sovereign, and to our country, to the British nation, and to the whole civilised world, we are answerable for the preservation and maintenance of our religion and morals, of our laws and government. To our peaceable and loyal fellow-subjects, we owe the defence and security of their rights, properties and lives. To the deluded victims of these machinations, we have also a duty to discharge; a duty of protection and kindness. We owe it to them, and it is the greatest of all benefits which can be conferred upon them, to rescue them, if it be still possible, from the seduction and treachery by which they are beset; and to remove from their paths and dwellings, the snares unceasingly laid for their destruction. This is the office of their true friends; their bitterest enemies are those who are labouring to inflame their sufferings into disaffection and treason.

To the execution of these great and awful trusts, let us then apply ourselves with diligence and resolution: neither disguising from ourselves the real extent of the evil, nor shrinking from the remedies, unpleasing as they may be, which it must unavoidably require. Our danger is no longer to be searched for in hidden consultations or secret conspiracies. It courts our notice, it obtrudes itself on our attention. We are daily assailed with undisguised menace, and are little removed from the immediate expectation of open violence. Let us, then, attentively review the steps which have brought us to this situation. Observe their beginnings, consider well their rapidly accelerated progress. You will find them in near conformity to all that led to the subversion and misery of France. A close and striking resemblance, a servile, yet ostentatious imitation, which it is of the utmost importance that we should forcibly impress upon our minds! If such a parallel were found, even in the remotest history, yet, of the remotest history what better use could we make, than to draw from it whatever conclusions it affords of policy or wisdom, applicable to our own condition? Shall we, on the contrary, now in the hour of our own peril, strive to banish from our thoughts and counsels all memory of this recent and forcible example! We, the nearest spectators of that dreadful convulsion, our minds still shuddering at its crimes, our hearts still bleeding at its miseries, shall we turn aside from the painful but instructive lesson, and in wilful blindness close our eyes against the prophetic mirror which exhibits to ourselves, in the progress of the same machinations, the fearful advance of the same destruction? No, my lords, let not the warning voice have been heard in vain! We have shared deeply in that widely extended calamity; the bitter draught which France prepared for herself, has overflowed into our cup. Let us at least derive from it the benefits of an experience so dearly purchased! Observe what were the beginnings of that great catastrophe; follow up its progress; mark by what course it reached its terrible consummation; trace it through subversion and ruin, through plunder and confiscation, through slaughter and massacre, till all was swallowed up in military despotism!

What first occurred? The whole nation was inundated with inflammatory and poisonous publications. Its very soil was deluged with sedition and blasphemy. No effort was omitted of base and disgusting mockery, of sordid and unblushing calumny, which could vilify and degrade whatever that people had been most accustomed to love and venerate. No artifice, no incitement, was left untried, which could stimulate the deluded multitude to the most savage acts of insult and outrage, of violence and fury, against the ministers of their religion, and the dispensers of their government and law; against all who were eminent for birth or rank, for talent or for virtue, and against those most especially who had been most distinguished as their kindest friends, protectors, and benefactors!

Who is there that is not struck with the resemblance of this picture? Who can be ignorant how closely this detestable and malignant wickedness has been imitated in our own country, how long it has been pursued, and to what a height it has now attained? You heard the papers read to you this night by my noble friend, and you shuddered at the recital. Exhortations to murder and treason, from which the heart recoils, and the blood turns back to its fountain! If these were only a few and extraordinary instances, exceptions to the general character of the publications daily obtruded on all the lower classes of your community, yet against these, no doubt, you would call down the vengeance of the law, against these the arm of justice would be directed with universal concurrence and approbation. But it is from a torrent and deluge of such mischief that you are now called upon to protect your country. The poison has been profusely scattered throughout the land: it has pervaded not only your towns and manufactories, but your peaceful villages and farms. Its malignity is hourly increasing, and fresh activity is employed in its diffusion. This, my lords, is the true root and source of all your danger; against this, no social institutions can possibly maintain themselves; it is incompatible with all peace, all security, all public, and all private happiness. It is of power, and it openly boasts itself to be of power, to overthrow all that is now standing in this country; and to level in the dust all your prosperity, and all your glory, involved in one common ruin with the magnificent and splendid fabric of the noblest government which has ever yet provided for the welfare of any society.

In this unbounded licentiousness of an inflammatory press, pointing continually the poisoned weapons of sedition and blasphemy against all that constitutes human happiness in present possession, or in future hope, shall we content ourselves with asking, as my noble friend has done, why the voice of the law has been silent, and the terrors of its arm unnerved? We must now, indeed, all regret the too sparing exercise of powers, which our ancestors had, with more provident wisdom, interwoven into our constitution; we must lament the too reluctant discharge of duties, of which no discouragement could ever justify the dereliction. But we must also confess, that this forbearance is of no recent date. Indulgent as your laws have been, in all that affects this subject, their execution has, for a long time back, been yet more tolerant, even of acknowledged wrong. And happy is that condition of society, in which the mildest laws may, without injury to the public interests, be still more mildly administered! This had been our fortunate situation; and this, in consequence, had been our practice. May both speedily return to us! Soon may we again be enabled to boast, as Englishmen, not only of the unexampled freedom of our press, but also of its comparative exemption from those enormous evils to which such freedom great as are its benefits, does, in its abuse, open so wide a field. But such, unhappily, is not our present state. We feel, too sensibly, its altered character. I speak it with the deepest affliction; lamenting the change which I have witnessed, and deploring the necessity to which it leads. But we must not forget, that it is to the actual condition and exigencies of every society, that its legislation must conform itself, and that when new evil arises, it must be met by new remedies.

When this current of mischief, uncontrolled, and bearing down before it every barrier of public authority or law, had thus far succeeded to sap the foundations of civil society, what next ensued? The next step has been the same here as in the French Revolution. The formation of local societies, clubs and unions, of various description, sedulously contrived and organized, for the diffusion of these impious and destructive doctrines, by frequent and familiar intercourse, and for the establishment of an extensive concert and co-operation in the prosecution of the only practical results to which such principles can lead.

And when at last, by the unremitted effect of all this seduction, considerable portions of the multitude had been deeply tainted, their minds prepared for acts of desperation, and familiarized with the thought of crimes, at the bare mention of which they would before have revolted, then it was that they were encouraged to collect together in large and tumultuous bodies;—then it was that they were invited to feel their own strength; to estimate and to display their numerical force; and to manifest, in the face of day, their inveterate hostility to all the institutions of their country, and their open defiance of all its authorities.

The question therefore on which we are now compelled to deliberate is nothing less than this, whether parliament shall continue to disregard this fast accumulating panger, conscious of its progress, and certain of its inevitable tendency; or shall oppose to it a vigorous and effectual resistance, before it reaches the gates of the sanctuary, and shakes the pillars of the commonwealth?

If, indeed, this resistance be not now made, one other period only of resistance can remain; that in which the evil shall have reached its last stage, shall have assumed its last hideous form of open insurrection and declared rebellion. Then, indeed, it will be resisted, and I have no doubt effectually. The British nation is not of a character to suffer its government to be overwhelmed by a tumultuous populace, by whatever artifices excited against it. The great and enlightened body of the inhabitants of this country, the people of England, truly so called, will never submit themselves to see, by the effect of such machinations, their laws subverted, their property confiscated, and their lives made the sport and prey of some ferocious and sanguinary demagogue. But to meet and to subdue the danger, if once suffered to assume this shape, force must be opposed to force. Recourse must unavoidably be had to those means of repression and defence at the thought of which every British heart bleeds. I will not dwell upon them; the task would be too painful. Sure I am that the bare imagination of such a contest, aye, and the very circumstances with which success itself must be attended, will be the strongest of all inducements to urge and to compel your lordships, by provident and timely interposition, to avert that dreadful, but otherwise inevitable necessity.

The resistance which you may now make is of a very different character; resistance by law; by the authority of the legislature; by the intervention of the civil government. Can it be doubtful which we should prefer?—But the crisis is arrived in which this option must finally be made; the decision must now be taken and must now be acted upon. If it be still postponed, the choice may probably no longer rest with ourselves. And yet, placed as we are in such circumstances as these, deliberating on the exigencies of such a moment, in what manner is it that we are advised to commence our measures for the repression of those enormities which threaten to involve us in civil bloodshed? By suspicion and distrust, directed not against the authors of the mischief, but against those by whom it has been hitherto successfully, though imperfectly counteracted: by inquiries into the conduct of our magistrates, and of those who have supported them in the discharge of their painful duties. Shall we accede to this proposal? Do we wish to debilitate all our efforts; to cast away from us our readiest and surest resources; to undermine the best bulwarks of our defence; and to shake to its foundations all hope of mutual confidence, and united exertion? If such were our desire, most powerfully would this course contribute to its accomplishment. My noble friend, I am certain, has no such wish: far, very far, is it from his intention to produce so great an evil. I am well assured of it. But I am not the less convinced that such would be the unfailing consequence of your adopting this suggestion.

For I entreat your lordships to ask yourselves, what has been the real character, and what the immediate object of these tumultuary assemblies, to which the present motion refers, and against which your magistrates have finally been compelled to exert the full extent of their constitutional authority. Examine them in all their circumstances; mark their previous preparation, and their actual conduct; the emblems displayed, the language held, the resolutions adopted: and let it then be explained, if any such explanation can be given, for what other purpose such proceedings were intended, but for menace and intimidation,—the most powerful of all revolutionary engines, the very instruments by which in France all religion, law, and government, were levelled to the earth! To strike terror into the peaceable and well-affected; to deter them from supporting the public authorities in the hour of danger; to alarm and to dispirit those authorities themselves, and to drive them, if it were possible, to a desertion of their highest duties:—Such, and such alone, were the consequences naturally to be expected by those with whom these projects originated; and such, we are informed by the papers on our table, are the effects which have already, in some degree, been actually produced.

Hence it is, that we cannot hesitate to pronounce, as far as our present information of these facts extends, that, not only the meeting which was dispersed at Manchester, but many other similar meetings, held both before and after that event, have been decidedly illegal. Doctrines, new to my ears, have indeed been recently promulgated on this subject. The notion, wild as it is, seems actually to have prevailed in some quarters, that no assembly of any part of the people of this realm can be deemed illegal, be they armed or unarmed, arrayed or unarrayed, from whatever quarters collected, in whatever numbers, or under whatever previous or attendant circumstances; unless the fact of present violence, or, at least, the intention of present violence, can be proved against them. I have no pretensions to deep skill in the science of our law; but directly opposite is this doctrine to all which I either learnt in my youth, or have at any time since collected, either from books, or from living authorities; utterly repugnant to any lights which our own experience or history afford, and in manifest contradiction to the plainest principles, by which all civil societies are connected and upheld. I have been taught that, independently of actual or meditated violence, every sort of menace, intimidation, and array of force, are in themselves abundantly sufficient to stamp on such proceedings the plainest characters of illegality. Every assembly held in terrorem populi, the English law, as I have always been instructed, does in express terms declare to be unlawful. No such menace, no such intimidation, no such array, have ever yet been tolerated under the British government. And it is among the first elements of all political science, that men combine in civil society, to obtain for themselves and for their families, not only the safe enjoyment of life, and property, and peaceful occupation, but also the full and undisturbed confidence and assurance of that safety. Banish this principle from the British constitution, establish the contrary doctrine, if any one can now be found to maintain it, and your government must thenceforth, in self-defence, assume an attitude purely military, armed in never-ceasing preparation to meet a danger perpetually arrayed against it; while your people must for the same cause, revert to the condition of savages, relying for personal security, not on the warranty of law, and the protection of a common government, but on the exertions of individual strength, or on the separate support of partial associations.

If then so many of these meetings must thus, in reason and in law, be regarded as illegal, my noble friend asks, and it is one of the first objects of his proposed inquiry, whence it arose that one alone amongst them all has been dispersed by public authority? The law he thinks should have been more equally, more uniformly, administered. On fuller consideration, he will perhaps himself be sensible, that an exact similarity and correspondence of practice on this subject is neither necessary, nor easily attainable. The interference of the magistrate with any such assembly, must always be in some degree discretionary. No two of these cases can be exactly similar; and were they so, the mere differences of place and time would still essentially distinguish them. Much, therefore, must unavoidably be left to the judgment of those who are intrusted with the public peace. And we must all feel, were it only from what we have heard this night, how painful is the responsibility which these cases sometimes impose upon them. The question is to be determined respecting each particular assembly, whether there be just cause of apprehension to men of firm and constant minds, that the public tranquillity will be disturbed, or the safety of the king's peaceful subject's endangered: a question in some of these cases abundantly clear, in others perhaps of nicer and more difficult decision. It admits of no fixed line of demarcation, no rule, no definition previously laid down. The principle is the same as in the case of an individual, who claims the protection of the law, against apprehended or threatened violence. The magistrate has there no book which he can take down from his shelf, to draw from it an unerring rule of conduct. He cannot say to the complainant, here is the precise boundary of the law: if these words were used, I can interpose in your defence; but if the same meaning was differently expressed, I have no such power. If your adversary raised his arm thus high, it was a menace, but if one inch lower, it was none: if a dagger was pointed at your breast, the law will protect you; but if it was only a clasp-knife, you must defend yourself. Our law deals in no such subtleties. The general and broad principle is unequivocally laid down: actual safety and full assurance of safety, are alike the right of all; the right of the individual, and the right of the public. It is for magistrates, and courts, and juries, to apply this universal rule to the infinitely-varying circumstances of each particular occasion.

Where such a discretion was to be exercised by so many different persons, and in so many various instances, we cannot be surprised to find some seeming contrariety both of opinion and of conduct; the result, sometimes perhaps of real differences between cases apparently similar, and sometimes of the opposite judgments formed on the same circumstances, even by the most enlightened men. The mere want of uniformity affords therefore no ground for censure, nor any presumption of misconduct. But I will not disguise my own impressions on the subject. The facts themselves are not fully known to us: we cannot therefore, speak decisively of the conduct to which they led. It does, however, appear to me that the indulgence of the magistrate has, in almost all these instances been carried to the very utmost extent, which was consistent with the public safety; and on more than one occasion, I think it has been pushed to an extreme, productive of considerable evil. It is no light matter, to have witnessed these repeated and ostentatious defiances of law and government, even where they have not as yet been followed by actual violence. It is no pleasing recollection, that our greatest manufacturing towns, and this metropolis itself, the capital and seat of our empire, have, even for the shortest time, been placed, as it were, in a state of siege: their business interrupted, their industry suspended; waiting in fearful expectation of impending tumult, or looking for protection to troops collected with difficulty, and harassed with preparations and marches, as in the presence of an enemy.

The wisdom of this forbearance may well be questioned, though I am sure we all sympathise in the kind and benevolent feelings in which it originated. But it would be a strange perversion of reasoning to maintain, that because it had been pushed thus far, it was in future to have no limit; that because so much had been tolerated, all was thenceforth to be permitted. We have neglected the outworks, must we therefore surrender the citadel? We have disregarded the approaches of the storm, must we take no measures of security when it rages with redoubled violence? Where danger was less imminent, your magistrates had been content to overlook it. Does it therefore follow, that no menace, no defiance, no hostility, no nearer and more urgent peril, could justify their final resolution to interpose for the safety of a great commercial town, and for the tranquillity of a populous and wealthy district? If such be your opinion, the whole foundations of our government are already broken up! Let it then be openly avowed! Let us not deceive our country with the semblance of authorities which are no longer to exist. Let it be declared and known that the king's commission of the peace is henceforth to be unattended with any power, or any duty, to give protection to his faithful and loyal subjects!

Far different is the light in which these gentlemen have considered their office, and discharged its obligations. They have proceeded on the long-established principles by which it has always hitherto been governed; they have acted in conformity, I trust, and in obedience, to the laws which they undertook to administer. And is it for this conduct that you will visit them with parliamentary inquiry?

On the first night of this session, I expressed by my vote, and on such grounds of knowledge as I then possessed, my decided disapprobation of our adopting any such proceeding. Since that time I have been strongly confirmed in the same opinion. Much more has been stated to the public of these transactions: many most important and satisfactory circumstances have been brought forward, resting, as it should seem, on indisputable authority. As the facts now stand before the world, on the assertions of those best qualified to explain them, the conduct of the magistrates, who sat at Manchester on the 16th of August last, appears to me not only free from blame, but highly meritorious. And should the case be ultimately established, such as it now appears to be, I am confident they will deserve, and I trust they will receive, a complete and authoritative approbation of that conduct.

I say a complete and authoritative approbation, because I cannot at all consider in that light the letter of the noble secretary of state, of which so much has been said. Neither can I see any resemblance between that communication and the resolutions promulgated on this subject, by the meetings, held, first, I believe, in this metropolis, and afterwards in various counties throughout the kingdom. Those proceedings are, in my judgment, most deeply to be regretted. While the courts of justice were completely open to all complaints respecting these transactions: while criminal proceedings upon them had already been instituted, and were, in some cases, still actually depending, before the regular tribunals appointed for that purpose by our laws and constitution, what could be more unfortunate than the popular and extra-judicial agitation of such questions? Little real knowledge could be obtained by such meetings, even from report, of the facts most essential to the case; and great misapprehensions were likely to prevail there, as to the legal conclusions to which such facts would lead. The citizens of London, the freeholders, or the inhabitants of a distant county, could have no authority to pronounce on such occurrences; no cognizance of the crimes reciprocally imputed; no means of proof; no power either of condemnation or acquittal. Was it for them to hold public deliberations on the guilt or innocence of their fellow-subjects? Do we wish that a habit should thus be established of anticipating, by the excitation of popular feeling, the trial and decision of accusations which our constitution has reserved for judicial cognizance? No greater calamity could possibly befall us. No other course could certainly tend to erase, not only from our practice, but even from our recollection, the sacred principles of criminal justice, and those inviolable provisions for its temperate and impartial administration, which have hitherto been the peculiar glory and blessing of our country.

Far different was the situation of the king's ministers: they had a regular and constitutional duty to perform. It would in them, have been, not only an unworthy and base abandonment of all honourable feeling, but a positive dereliction of official trust, if they had withheld from the magistrates their judgment upon the conduct pursued in circumstances so critical. That judgment they were bound to form, and they were bound to act upon it; they were responsible for it to parliament and to the laws; and it was their duty to communicate it to those whom the constitution has placed under their direction. If your lordships could doubt this principle, I would entreat you to consider the reverse of the proposition. Imagine, then, for a moment, that, instead of a reluctant interposition for the maintenance of the public peace, against a tumultuary and menacing array, there had been the most open and wanton violation of unquestionable right: that the magistrates, for instance, had dispersed by force the freeholders of their county, peaceably and regularly assembled, under the authority of the sheriff, and in obedience to the king's writ, for the choice of their representatives in parliament. Would your lordships endure to be told that, in such a case the king's secretary of state had remained silent? Would you not require it to be proved to you, that not a moment had been lost by the servants of the Crown, both in condemning and in repressing this outrageous infraction of the constitution? And if it be the duty of persons placed in such stations to convey censure where censure is due, who will be found to argue that the more pleasing duty of expressing merited approbation is alone to be withheld from them?

And in this view of the case, my lords, let me now beseech you to turn your attention for a moment from its general principles, such as I have hitherto endeavoured to establish them, to the actual situation, and real conduct, of the individuals most concerned in it: of those gentlemen who have received from the ministers of their sovereign this testimony of public gratitude, but whom it is now proposed to your lordships to hold out to the world as the first objects of your suspicion and jealousy.

If there be one among the many noble institutions of this country, which can with more confidence than any other be exhibited to foreign nations as a matter of exclusive triumph to the British name, it is the manner in which local justice is administered, especially in our counties, by the persons who gratuitously undertake that task, under the king's commission of the peace. I need not describe, and no words could magnify, the labour, the self-devotion, the pure benevolence, the unspotted integrity, with which this duty is discharged. The fact is universally admitted; all men of liberal and enlightened minds repose the fullest confidence in the proceedings of this upright and truly honourable magistracy. The law itself establishes in their behalf, from long experience of their conduct, a presumption of pure intention, and even a favourable construction of error, such as may occasionally, though it rarely does, arise from unprofessional education, or from human infirmity.

But the merit of the individuals, whom this motion would place almost in a state of accusation, does not rest merely on this general ground of habitual and honourable service. It was explained to us in our last debate, but it is of the utmost importance to be repeated, that this duty was undertaken and performed by them in no common manner. During the course of last summer the two great counties of Lancashire and Cheshire were exposed to imminent danger of tumult and violence from the effect of those seditious and traitorous machinations of which I have already spoken. In such a situation, their security, and most especially the security of the town and neighbourhood of Manchester, required a more than usual degree of vigilance, a constant and unremitting superintendence. And for this special service, a committee was formed out of the whole body of the truly respectable magistracy of those counties. It must be remembered that the danger, though more urgent in a few particular places, was not confined to them, but was extensively and widely diffused. In such circumstances, therefore, these gentlemen, in the same manner as all the other peaceable and loyal inhabitants of this whole district, had the deepest interest in watching, each of them over the tranquillity and safety of their own immediate neighbourhood. In a season of so much alarm, the care of their own properties, the protection of their own houses, families, and dependants, would naturally demand their constant presence, and personal exertions. But these considerations they disregarded; their houses and their families they left to the protection of their country; they assembled at Manchester; and there they continued to hold their sittings, because there was the chief root of the evil—there the scene of greatest peril—there the utmost certainty of benefitting the public by their patriotic and voluntary labours. With such feelings, and such conduct, your lordships may well believe that personal danger was the subject which least occupied their thoughts. But they also knew that there were other perils to be encountered; they could not but feel the heavy responsibility to which they would thus be subjected; they could not be ignorant, that if the painful necessity should arise of employing force for the maintenance of the public peace, no industry would be spared, no artifice, no calumny untried, which could excite the prejudices, or inflame the feelings of a humane and generous people. They were sure that their motives would be misrepresented, their actions vilified, their characters defamed. But they suffered no such apprehensions to deter them from rendering to their country what they justly deemed a most important and necessary service. They relied, first, on the uprightness of their own intentions, and on the consciousness of that pure and public spirit, by which alone they were actuated; they thought perhaps that they might securely trust to the dispassionate and impartial judgment of their fellow-subjects; they certainly looked with confidence to the honourable feelings of your lordships, and to the well-earned favour and protection of the British parliament.

In the execution of this service, the time at length arrived when forbearance could no longer be maintained. To have neglected to interpose against the dangers justly apprehended from the meeting of the 16th of August, would, in their view of honour and duty, have been a manifest violation of both, and a total abandonment of the awful trust which they had undertaken under circumstances of such peculiar obligation. They were well apprised of the nature and extent of the previous preparations made for that assembly; they were eye-witnesses of its menacing array; no doubt was left on their own minds of its real character and tendency; their apprehensions of its too probable result were confirmed and strengthened by those of the peaceable inhabitants of Manchester; their protection was demanded, and it could not legally be refused: And, had they hesitated on that day to assert and to enforce the law, he must, indeed, be a bold man who will venture to affirm that the consequences of such an error could ever have been retrieved.

The tumultuous and insurrectionary spirit which produced that meeting, was not, however, extinguished by its dispersion. There was no hope that it could be so. The mischief continued to extend itself, and the dangers in which so large and so important a district of this kingdom was thus involved, have made it ultimately necessary that parliament should be assembled to provide effectually for our common security.

In this situation we are now met. The eyes of all are upon us. There is no state in Europe which does not feel its own security involved in that of the British government. There is no individual, capable of appreciating the real interests of society,—no friend of order,—no lover of virtue,—but looks with anxious solicitude to the conduct of parliament in this great conjuncture. What, then, would be the impressions of mankind;—what would be the appearance which we should exhibit to this country, and to the world, if our first step for the security of lawful government should be to discredit and to degrade our upright and honourable magistracy? What would be thought of our wisdom,—what of our justice,—should we turn aside our eyes from the violators of the public peace, and fix them with jealous suspicion on its champions and assertors; exerting the great powers, with which we are invested for the public safety, not against the savage depredators of the fold, but against its faithful and intrepid guardians? I have heard of many instances of public ingratitude: History is full of unrequited merit,—of services repaid by oppression and injury. But, I trust, we shall suffer no such example to stain our own records,—no such stigma to be fixed on the proceedings of this day. No, my lords! Respect the feelings of honourable men, who have well discharged an arduous and painful duty! Treat with affection and kindness those branches of the public defence, to which you are already so much indebted! Inspire them with fresh confidence in themselves, and with fresh attachment to the constitution and legislature of their country! On them is our firmest reliance; in their zeal,—in their exertions,—is our best hope of security against every difficulty which now surrounds us, and against every danger which we may still be destined to encounter.

Nor let it be said that, by refusing this inquiry, you preclude the regular and legal investigation of any error which the most zealous and adverse scrutiny can possibly discover in these proceedings. If any intemperance of zeal, in the execution even of the most justifiable and necessary directions,—if any heat, excited by tumult and contest,—if any other feelings, be they what they may, have betrayed even a single individual into a conduct unworthy of his cause, the courts are open,—the laws will do justice to all! Not twenty-four hours have elapsed since we have seen how readily such complaints were received and inquired into, and I am happy to add, how satisfactorily they were answered. By rejecting this motion you can do no injury, nothing is prejudged; nothing closed against any complainant.

Need I say, what would be the effect of its adoption? You would teach the whole magistracy of your country, that, when in the hour of peril they have discharged their public duties with intrepidity and firmness, yet if unjust prejudice—if groundless clamour,—be raised against them, they must look to no protection from the government or the legislature. After all their exertions, and all their sacrifices, they must prepare themselves to meet unfounded suspicion, and harassing inquiry, to appear, perhaps, as culprits in this place, defending themselves against the vindictive malice of those very criminals, whose guilt they may have exposed and punished. Thus discredited, thus degraded, what would be their resource? They might appeal, perhaps, to yourselves against your own decision. They might remind us that the discretion which they exercise, and the duties which they perform, are committed and enjoined to them by law; by that law of which they are the ministers, your lordships the high and hereditary guardians. And they might confidently claim, from your justice, that you should suffer them to enjoy, unmolested, its full protection for their own conduct and character, while they are engaged in uprightly administering it to others. But, whatever were the result of such proceedings, never, I trust, would they be induced for any cause to deprive their country of the inestimable advantage of services which they alone can render to it. Under whatever circumstances they can be placed, in grief, in depression, in dismay, their characters assailed, their feelings wounded, their authority impaired, may there always be found a spirit in the magistracy of Great Britain resolutely to persevere in the discharge of their duties! Should that hope fail us, should it ever happen that the landed gentry of this kingdom were driven, by whatever discouragement, to relinquish their high trust, and to leave to other hands the faithful administration of our laws, and the vigilant defence of the religion and government of their forefathers, our condition would, indeed, be desperate.

Look also to another class of voluntary exertions; not less honourable, scarcely less useful. Do you wish to shake the confidence which the armed yeomanry of Great Britain now repose in the justice and gratitude of parliament? You know what efforts have been made, what calumnies employed, to inflame the passions of the people against that portion of this force which was employed at Manchester; you have seen what industry has been exerted to intimidate those individuals from persevering in their honourable service, and to deter all others from venturing to associate for the same loyal and constitutional purposes. Nor can you be surprised that it should be so. Could these objects be accomplished—could this establishment be discountenanced, this force disbanded, much, indeed, would have been done for the cause of disaffection. But still more complete, much more unexpected, and un hoped for, would be the triumph of that cause, should the conduct of this House be found to have contributed to it. Far be it from us! I trust we shall accede to no proposal that can have such a tendency. If there be sufficient ground to impute to any man, charged with the execution of a painful duty, even a single act of wanton and needless violence, I repeat it, the law is open to all. Let the facts be legally examined, let them be judicially determined. The previous interposition of this House, in such a case, if any such there were, could operate only to the prejudice of impartial justice; but it would have the farther mischief of sanctioning those indiscriminate calumnies which have for their true object, not the conduct of any individuals, but the character of the institution itself. To that institution the fullest protection, the warmest encouragement, is due from parliament. I acknowledge that on this point I speak with strong personal feeling. I had much share in the original formation of that establishment; I earnestly promoted it both by counsel and by personal exertion; and I look back to it with unqualified satisfaction, as to one of the most useful services of a public life now brought to its conclusion. Great advantage, I say it with full experience and knowledge of the fact, did then arise from the exertions of those meritorious and patriotic bodies; and still greater we shall, I trust, derive from them in the present exigency. Nor let these benefits be considered as merely occasional, calculated only to meet the pressure of some momentary danger. A much more solid and permanent good, and of far wider influence on the highest interests of our society, has already resulted, and will I am confident, continue to result from this institution. It has habituated the middle classes of our community, under the authority of the sovereign, and with the guidance and co-operation of the magistracy and gentry of their neighbourhood, to take an active share in defending our free and happy government against all its foreign and all its domestic enemies. What can be in principle more constitutional, in practice more beneficial? It was in its origin, and it will ever be, both in its impression and effect, a pledge of mutual confidence between these different orders of the state; most honourable on both sides to those who have offered it, and on both sides most gratifying to those by whom it has been received. It has been and may it long continue to be, a strong, I trust an indissoluble link and bond of union between them, in the support of that cause which is common to us all!

And shall this be called arming our fellow-subjects against each other? No; we are arming them in their own defence against lawless violence; we are arming them for the protection of their peaceful dwellings against plunder and devastation; we are arming the people of England itself against designs, which, if they could be realised, would leave not a trace behind of all that has made the British name respected, admired, and honoured, among the nations of the earth.

On whom then does the imputation justly rest of arming our fellow subjects against each other? Is it not on those who, in the midst of peace, have lighted up among us the torch of discord? Who have deluded the ignorant, and inflamed the discontented; who have drawn aside their unhappy followers from habits of tranquil industry, to designs and practices ruinous to themselves, and destructive of the public safety; who have animated them against the very persons from whose skill and enterprise their subsistence was derived; and by instigations, incessantly repeated, inciting them to the foulest crimes, have at length, in the very centre and heart of our greatest commercial establishments, impaired the security of property, and the security of life itself!

And this, my lords, brings us back to that consideration of present and local distress with which my noble friend commenced this discussion. Whatever be the remoter origin of that distress, we all acknowledge for its immediate causes the diminution of commerce, the suspension of manufacture; the cessation of employment. And what, let me ask your lordships, what could tend more effectually than the present disordered and fearful state of your great manufacturing districts, to subject them, and through them to subject every part of the kingdom, to the continued operation of these calamities? Already you are told what is the condition of Manchester. Individuals are retiring, capitals are withdrawn, and establishments about to be transferred from that scene of disturbance and alarm. It could not be otherwise. It is of the nature of commerce to flourish only under the shelter and protection of law; its blossoms will not expand themselves, much less will it mature its fruits, except in secure and undisturbed tranquillity. It shrinks from the rude blast of power; it is instantly withered by the tempestuous hurricanes of popular commotion. Let us not deceive ourselves. Never can our commercial prosperity maintain itself under the lawless dominion of self-constituted and tumultuary assemblies. Never can it endure the rapacious and vindictive despotism of mutually conflicting demagogues. To other shores, to more peaceful countries, to better-ordered communities, the trade and manufactures of Great Britain would, in such circumstances, speedily remove themselves. They were first attracted to this happy country by that security which our institutions alone could then afford to them; greatly have they flourished under a government, which has defended them alike from the unjust aggression of power, and from the capricious tyranny of the multitude; they would vanish like a dream at the first aspect of revolutionary terror; they would fly far away from tumult and violence, from plunder and confiscation, from massacres, and from judicial murders!

They would vanish! and what would then be the condition of your manufacturing population? What means would then remain of alleviating their present distress, what hope of terminating their future misery?

If, therefore, on no other ground; if, from no larger and deeper views of policy and justice, such as may best become the legislators of a mighty empire; yet, for the single purpose of preventing these unhappy men from aggravating and perpetuating their own distress, let me implore your lordships to step between them and their betrayers. Interpose your high authority to rescue them from this destruction. Take speedy, take effectual measures to give peace and security to those disturbed and agitated districts of your country. On peace and security depends the prosperity of all; there is no other prospect of reviving commerce to the manufacturer, no other hope of renewed employment to the artisan.

In every view which can be taken of our situation, there is but one course which you can now pursue. Do you think that present distress is the sole cause of all this evil? What, then, must be the first steps towards its removal? The discontinuance of alarm; the punishment of sedition; the vigorous and instant suppression of all that produces, and all that threatens, disturbance. Do you look to the permanent protection of your constitution and government? Then, also, must the same determination be adopted. You must give energy and vigour to the laws; you must uphold and strengthen the authority of magistrates and courts of justice; you must protect the well-affected, encourage the loyal, and animate the whole body of the British nation, by the best of all exhortations—the example of your own resolution and constancy.

And, with this opinion, thus decidedly entertained, thus unreservedly expressed, let me finish what I had to submit to your lordships on the present occasion. I little expected to have troubled you so much at length. But I have obeyed the impulse of an irresistible duty; the last, perhaps, that I may ever be called upon to discharge within these walls. Whether it will be so I know not; for, who can now anticipate the events which are impending over us? But how can I, under any circumstances, better close my long service in this place, than by an effort, earnest, however weak, to uphold the laws, and to preserve the tranquillity, of my country? With what sentiment nearer to my heart can I conclude these labours than by finally conjuring your lordships to guard, as you have hitherto done, with unremitted vigilance, with unshaken firmness, the sacred deposit of the British constitution? It has been the work of ages; formed on no preconceived plan of human policy; resting on no delusive principles of imagined right; the happy result of a long series of unforeseen and uncontrollable events; the produce of many jarring and contending elements, combined and harmonized by the tried experience, by the unwearied diligence, and by the traditional, yet cautious wisdom of a legislature better adapted than any other yet known in the history of mankind, to promote the happiness of the community, whose interests it administers. Such is our government; the boast of Englishmen,—the admiration and envy of the world! Such may it long continue! And wise, indeed, should that man be, who hopes to improve it by the preconceived theories, and baseless speculations, of his own imagination.

Earl Grey expressed his sincere regret at the difference of opinion which now existed between himself and his noble friend, to whom he had been peculiarly attached, not only by the ties of political connexion, but by the more endearing bonds of personal friendship—a regret which he felt the more keenly from his having been accustomed to look up to that noble lord with sentiments of deep delight as his guide and oldest instructor. His regret was scarcely less when he saw the noble marquis also differing from him, recollecting, as he did, the powerful eloquence which the noble marquis on every occasion had displayed, and that in the year 1817, under circumstances not very dissimilar, that noble marquis had brought to his side of the question, in the struggle then made for the constitution, all the brilliancy of his eloquence, all the strength of his argument. He felt these to be serious disadvantages ; but, notwithstanding them all—notwithstanding the infirm state of his health, he felt it his duty to rise, perhaps for the last time, to fight once more for the liberties of his country. It was a duty which he would execute at any risk—which no fear of misrepresentation, no weight of obloquy, should induce him to forego. No apprehension that his opinions might be represented as calculated to endanger rather than to secure the peace of the country, of which he would hold himself forth to be as zealous a defender as any noble lord in that House, should make him hesitate in his endeavour to discharge what he conceived to be a paramount duty, by supporting the motion for inquiry made by his noble friend.

It had been objected, that the proposed inquiry comprehended too wide and extensive a field : the field was indeed wide and extensive so also were the difficulties which were to be inquired into ; and to the understanding of which no close or confined investigation could be adequate. His noble friend, in his statesman-like speech, had stated his objects so distinctly and conclusively, that he should only weaken the subject by attempting to add to it. He therefore would not go into that part of his argument which related to the financial condition of the country, because, much as inquiry was there necessary, yet another subject pressed so much more immediately, and occupied so much more intensely the public mind, that he should now confine himself to a consideration of that branch of the question—the internal situation of the country. On a former occasion which had been more than once referred to, he had certainly acknowledged the difficulties and dangers of the country to be very great. All seemed to be agreed upon this point ; and it was with reference to the causes of them that the main difference of opinion existed. His noble friend who last spoke had maintained, that distress was not a sufficient cause of the existing evil. He differed from his noble friend entirely. The cause of the distress itself might be doubtful ; but that that distress was the main and operative cause of the disturbed state of the public mind, was proved by evidence which the senses could not reject—was proved even by those scanty papers—[Hear, from 'marquis Wellesley.]—he must repeat that epithet, though it seemed to give offence to his noble friend—was proved even by those scanty papers which had been laid upon the table with so much parade. What was the language of those papers ? The very first of them, dated so far back as the 1st of last July, and which it should be remembered was received by ministers before parliament was prorogued, and which, though stating the existence of danger, and its cause, ministers had not thought of sufficient importance to lay before parliament, or to propose for consideration any preventive measure, said “ Of the deep distresses of the manufacturing classes of this extensive population, your lordship is fully apprised ; and the disaffected and ill-disposed lose no opportunity of instilling the worst principles into the unhappy sufferers in these times ; attributing their calamities, not to any event which cannot be controlled, but to the general measures of government and of parliament ; and when the people are oppressed with hunger, we do not wonder at their giving ear to any doctrines which they are told will redress their grievances.” Such was the language of the magistrates at Manchester ; and if their lordships would look at the representations made from Yorkshire, Cheshire, or any other part of the country, they would see that they completely proved that it was the opinion of every one of the writers, that distress was the real cause of the danger. His noble friends, indeed, had allowed, and had expressed themselves with great complacency—a complacency natural to so consoling a topic—that the people were not generally disaffected. How was this to be explained ? Why, in those districts where distress did not prevail, as for instance, in the agricultural districts, there the evil did not exist in the same degree, and in some of them not at all. Was it, therefore, too much to conclude, both from the papers on the table, and even from the admissions of his noble friends, that it was distress which had disposed men's minds to listen to designing and wicked demagogues? Was it, therefore, inconsistent with humanity and justice to say, that when the circumstances of this dangerous influence on the public mind were under consideration, their lordships should in the first instance look to the cause, and endeavour to check the evil in its source? Was it not their duty, while deprecating the designs of evil men,—and no one could deprecate them more than he did—to draw a distinction between those who misled, and those who were misled? He was grieved, therefore, to hear that Latin quotation of the noble marquis, which implied that the whole people were filled with fury and detestable malice against the government, and all indiscriminately combined against the institutions of their country. On the contrary, he from his heart believed, that those who really entertained mischievous intentions against the constitution were few in number, less in consequence, and would be as nothing in effect, unless a perseverance in the impolitic system of government, by his majesty's ministers, should increase that evil of which he believed it to be the cause.

His noble friend who had last spoken had taken credit to himself for having marked the growth of the evil from and even before the French Revolution; and had asserted, that it had now come to that height of unparalleled danger, of which not only the history of this, but of no other country could furnish an example. But while his noble friend thus congratulated himself on having foreseen, and on having carefully watched the progress of the mischief, he must beg to recall to his recollection what he had prophesied as to the efficacy of the remedies on which he had formerly insisted as able utterly to extirpate that mischief. What were those remedies? A war with France, and a domestic system of force and coercion. The war did indeed suspend, and to a certain degree extinguish, the progress of internal disquiet; but at the conclusion of the war that disquiet revived: and why? Was it not to be found in the conduct of parliament on that occasion? Did his noble friend believe that the country, looking as it did, with the utmost anxiety to the proceedings of parliament, was not acutely alive to any supposed betrayal of trust in that quarter? And would not such betrayal produce disaffection? At the end of the war, parliament had new duties to perform; and the people, who without a murmur had made the greatest exertions, and submitted to the greatest sacrifices, had a right to look to parliament for an active protection of their interests. His noble friend had at that time certainly acted from this impression; and with that constitutional spirit which he believed always animated him, had urged the reduction of the army to such a degree that even he (earl Grey), anxious as he was to reduce the military power of the Crown, from a conviction that the best defence of the sovereign was the affection of his people, even he had been induced to pause before he could give his entire concurrence to the proposition. His noble friend, however, had expressed in the most energetic language his apprehension of a design to establish a military rule, and had urged with the greatest force, and had shown with the most laborious accuracy, why and to what extent the army should and could be reduced. Parliament, however, did not reduce the army, did not do what even his noble friend conceived to be its duty; and was it unreasonable to suppose that this was a cause of public discontent—of discontent which he was sure would not exist without materials to work upon? He had himself been frequently misrepresented, as being the cause of results which he had never intended. He would not, however, though he had a fair opportunity, retort on his noble friend, and say that his conduct had been the cause of breeding discontent and an ill opinion of parliament.

His noble friend had desired them to mark the march and progress of the evil; he (earl Grey) would call upon them to mark the march and progress of that system which ministers had adopted to check the evil. He would call to their attention the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, the restraints on the liberty of meeting, the restraints on the press,—restraints now so increased, that he believed they would lead in a short time to the complete extinction of that right; in short, a general code of coercion and force, to which parliament had too readily assented, on the ground that even urgent distress was not to be reasoned with, but to be silenced. And what was the consequence? Why, according to his noble friends, the danger was so immediately threatening, that parliament must proceed without a moment's delay, to remove the fences of that liberty which they were professing to defend. There was an old and homely proverb, "look before you leap," but it was full of wisdom; their lordships would do well to pause and consider before they took their desperate leaps beyond the limits of the constitution. But his noble friend had dilated on the horrors of the French revolution, that pregnant source of alarm. He (earl Grey) had hoped that he had survived that disagreeable topic. He thought to have heard no more of it after the happy restoration of legitimacy. His noble friend, however, thought differently, and had maintained that the same system, with the same objects, and with the same means, was in progress here, as had overthrown the French government. And what was his remedy? Coercion and restraint. "You must," said he, "restrain the press; you must put a stop to public meetings—you must take away from an Englishman his oldest privilege, the possession of arms for his defence." But would all this operate as a security? Why, this was a mere joke, compared with the power possessed and exercised at the beginning of the French revolution: yet there the evil was not checked, nor would it be here, by such means: for in such a system there was no stopping till it came to the power of the sword, and that, when public opinion was once excited against it, would produce the very evil it was intended to prevent. There was, indeed, no real defence in any country, especially in a country under such a constitution as that of England, but a system of liberty which should conciliate the affection and esteem of the people. All other devices were absolutely futile.

He now came to another part of the speech of his noble friend, which he confessed he heard with astonishment, and with a degree of pain amounting almost to horror. His noble friend was not only against inquiry, not only approved the Letter of the noble secretary of state, but had gone so far as to express his opinion that the magistracy of Manchester had deserved what he had called "authoritative approbation." He sincerely believed that his noble friend was the only man in that House—nay, in the whole country, who had even approached to such an opinion. Who could for a moment conceive that the conduct of the magistrates had been not only free from blame, but highly meritorious; and who could venture to say, that the only question for consideration was, whether they had not been too forbearing? But he would leave this part of the subject, which he could not touch upon without the greatest regret, and proceed to examine a little the speech of the noble marquis—a speech which he owned seemed to him to be more remarkable for brilliancy of expression than for solidity of argument. The noble marquis had said that the meeting was obviously illegal—that there could be no question as to the right of putting it down. The noble marquis had professed himself to be greatly alarmed, not indeed at any acts of violence committed by that assembly, but at its silence—ipsa silentia terrent. A riot, no doubt, was bad enough; but that a meeting should disperse without any riot at all, was enough to fill the whole nation with terror. This was certainly a notable discovery, the credit of which entirely belonged to his lordship; but the noble marquis had another argument—he had inferred that the meeting was illegal, because its object was illegal; and its object was illegal, because it was universal suffrage and annual parliaments. And the noble lord had illustrated his argument by asking, whether it would not be illegal to discuss the propriety of assassination, or of establishing atheism. To this he would answer, no; there was no analogy in the cases, because assassination and atheism were in direct contravention to the known laws of the land; but he had yet to learn what law was infringed by discussing the propriety of universal suffrage. He would appeal from the speech of the noble marquis that night to his speech in the year 1817, when, with powerful eloquence and irresistible argument, he had recommended not to put down radical reformers, however absurd, by force and violence, but by reason and conciliation—when, in short, he had reprobated that system of coercion in support of which he was now so stoutly engaged, and had called upon parliament, in the words of the wisest of men, to "take away the matter of sedition." His noble friend had on that occasion referred to the conduct of the duke of Richmond, and it was conduct worthy of being again referred to. What! was it to be charged as a crime on "the deluded people of England," as it was the fashion to call them, that they entertained a question which they had been taught to consider a proper one, from so illustrious an example? When they recollected that a bill, with that very reprobated object of universal suffrage and annual election, had been brought into the House, and read a first time, at a season of the greatest public danger, when parliament was threatened and besieged by an outrageous mob? When, too, they had the means of reading that strong recommendation of this now called illegal purpose, in a letter written by the duke to colonel Shirman? What! should that which was entertained as a question in parliament, be charged as a crime on the people of England? He would go so far as to say, that the people had a great practical grievance to complain of, in the disregard of parliament to their just and reasonable wishes—wishes, which were expressed not now for the first time, and which, if they were criminal, had been encouraged by the example of great names. He had himself, though certainly with but humble powers, contributed to create the delusion. In his early years, Mr. Pitt himself had been a reformer; for in the House of Commons he declared that no ministry could be honestly entrusted with public affairs unless there was a reform. But not only Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, sir George Savile, the illustrious lord Chatham, and many other distinguished characters were guilty, if guilt were imputable. But there was no guilt; for who would endure that such men as he had referred to should be branded as rebels and traitors, who were looking only for the subversion of the constitution? Connected with this part of the subject was the case of sir Manasseh Lopez, who had been made a baronet for no conceivable reason except his parliamentary influence. He defied any noble lord to point out one ground of character or service for which sir Manasseh Lopez would have received that reward, unless on the score of the influence to which he had alluded. But what followed? He was detected in some comparatively trifling act of bribery, and an election committee sent him to trial; and the result was, the severe, though certainly just punishment, of a fine of 10,000*l.* and three years imprisonment; just, it must certainly appear to all those numerous gentlemen who were conscious that they had never been guilty of any thing bordering on such an offence. But what occurred on the occasion of passing the sentence? The learned judge, for whose merits he would refer to the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, and indeed to all who had ever an opportunity of seeing or hearing of his conduct, had expressed himself, in the most decided terms, on the enormity of the offence of which the defendant was convicted. He said, “the crime was one of the greatest magnitude, and he confessed his own poverty of language to express the abhorrence in which such a crime ought to be held by every man in the country. It was of the highest importance to the public that the purity of election should be preserved. There should be no inroad into the House of Commons by corrupt means; for how could the country have any confidence in that House, if its doors were open to corruption; or could the public be induced to believe, that persons who obtained seats by such means would themselves be free from being corrupted in that place?” With the conclusion of the learned judge’s observation, reasonable as it appeared, he did not entirely agree; for he certainly had known persons who paid for a seat without any expectation of deriving profit from it. Still, the principles there laid down by the learned judge were sound and just; and was it to be wondered at that the people of England should cry out with impatience against an abuse which the judges of the land had denounced with indignation, and punished with the utmost severity?

His noble friend who spoke last had advanced another reason for the illegality of the Manchester meeting. He had said that an assembly in terrorem populi was illegal. He did not deny the principle, and was glad that his noble friend had so worded it, because he thought the noble and learned lord on the woolsack had stated a similar proposition too broadly. For himself, he certainly thought that numbers alone did not constitute illegality. Every large assembly, to a certain degree, was calculated to produce intimidation; but, however great the numbers, unless there was such reasonable ground of fear as a firm and constant man might entertain, no magistrate could be justified in a violent and forcible interference. Taking this, then, as an established point, he begged to ask, did any of the other circumstances render the meeting illegal? Could their marching in military array be called illegal? Could their marching with flags be called illegal? Could their wearing caps of liberty, or their being accompanied by music be said to be illegal? None of these singly, nor all collectively, were in his opinion illegal, unless it could be shown that the assembly meditated some outrageous or seditious proceeding. He saw no reason to allow that the meeting in question was illegal. Looking at the documents upon the table—looking at the evidence furnished by the magistrates themselves—he could not bring himself to believe, that men without arms, and accompanied with women and children, unless they were fit for Bedlam, could have contemplated any acts of violence, much less any regular conflict with the armed authorities. While, however he expressed his opinion, he did not mean positively to affirm that the meeting was legal. He did not either assert or deny the illegality of the meeting, he was ignorant on the subject; he wished to have the facts fairly before their lordships; he wished the country to be fully informed on the subject, and therefore it was, that inquiry was imperatively necessary. But did it stop here?—Admitting the illegality of the Manchester meeting; what then? Did that illegality authorise the magistrates to send in the military among them—to charge them—to cut them right and left in all directions? He was sure that his noble friend would not attempt to maintain such a proposition. If, then, there was a reasonable ground of presumption, that the meeting had been illegally dispersed, why refuse to satisfy parliament and the country by instituting an inquiry? He agreed with his noble friend, that nothing was more necessary than to uphold the magistracy; and he was glad to have an opportunity again to bear his feeble testimony to the merits of a body who sacrificed their ease, and sometimes incurred the greatest risks; in the gratuitous performance of their high and important office. To uphold such a body, was the duty of every public man: but how was that duty best performed? Was it by an indiscriminate approbation of all their acts in all times, and under all circumstances, or by a prompt support of them when right, and a firm remonstrance with them when wrong, and by an investigation of their conduct, when any reasonable objection existed against them? His noble friend, indeed, had argued, as if the government was bound at once in all cases to approve or disapprove; but there was a middle case which his noble friend had forgot to mention, where doubt, or even strong presumption of misconduct existed; where therefore either blame or praise would be in the first instance unjust; and that was precisely the case now before the House. His noble friend had asked, if, when it had been proved that magistrates had acted improperly, ministers were not bound to censure them, and then he took the converse of the proposition, and assuming that the magistrates had acted right, contended that ministers were bound to thank them. This he would fully admit, provided the facts were equally clear in both cases. But here the case was not clear; on the contrary there was strong presumption against what had been assumed as true. Here had been a meeting assembled for the purpose of discussing parliamentary reform. Of what occurred at that meeting, or in the attempts to disperse it, the House knew nothing, save what appeared in the letter of Mr. Hay. It was a remarkable circumstance, that there was no other evidence but that of one of those magistrates, who were, in fact, to be indemnified by the measures of ministers. Now, what was Mr. Hay's statement?" "The special committee have been in constant attendance for the last three days, and contented themselves till they saw what the complexion of the meeting might be, or what circumstances might arise, with coming to this determination only, which they adopted in concurrence with some of the most intelligent gentlemen of the town, not to stop the numerous columns which were from various roads expected to pour in, but to allow them to reach the place of their destination." Now it was a remarkable fact, that the magistrates had evidence of the extent to which training was carried in their district—that they knew of parties of men marching in military array—that they knew of their carrying flags, caps of liberty, and music—it was an established fact they knew of all these circumstances which are said to have rendered the meeting illegal, and yet they took not a single step to prevent the meeting from being held. Now he would ask whether the magistrates being of opinion that these circumstances rendered the meeting illegal, were not in duty bound to keep the people from assembling, and thereby prevent the havoc and bloodshed which took place on the charge of the cavalry? Was not this in itself a strong presumption of misconduct in the magistrates? Mr.

Hay said in his letter, that "a body of constables took their ground, about 200 in number, close to the hustings; from them there was a line of communication to the house where we were." Now it was in evidence upon oath, that this line of communication remained unbroken up to the time that the cavalry reached the hustings. This was proved by the evidence of Entwistle and Nadin, who were called before the coroner's jury by Mr. Ashworth. Nadin, obnoxious as he was to the people, had walked up and down this space uninterrupted: and even Mr. Norris one of the magistrates, passed repeatedly in and out through it. He would ask their lordships, whether with these facilities of communicating with the meeting, the magistrates could not, if they thought the assembly illegal, have read the Riot act? He would ask whether they had not an opportunity of informing the poor deluded people that they were committing a serious crime, and of guarding them against its consequences? But no such thing was done. Was not this, then, a strong presumption that those magistrates had misconducted themselves. He would go further: Mr. Hay said, "There was no appearance of arms or pikes, but great plenty of sticks and staves, and every column marched in files of three or four deep, attended with conductors, music, &c. The most powerful accession was in the last instance, when Hunt and his party came in." But it seemed the magistrates were determined to leave themselves without excuse for not having prevented the meeting from taking place. Mr. Hay went on to state; "but long before this" (the assembling of the meeting) "the magistrates had felt a decided conviction that the whole bore the appearance of insurrection; that the array was such as to terrify all the king's subjects, and was such as no legitimate purpose could justify. Now he appealed to their lordships whether, if such was the impression of the magistrates before the meeting had fully assembled, whether they were not bound in duty to prevent its taking place, when they could have done so without danger? He asked, whether their not having done so was not a neglect of that duty? Did the noble lord mean to call this forbearance on the part of the magistrates? The manner in which the people had been allowed to assemble, appeared to him more like the manœuvre of a skilful general, who wished to draw the enemy into a situation from which they could not retreat, and where they must be in his power. But when the people were placed in this situation, what was done? It was in evidence, that the people committed no act of violence before the soldiers reached the hustings. The magistrates, having allowed them to meet, ought, in common humanity to have suffered them to remain until the last extremity before they interfered. But no; the cavalry were ordered to advance at a gallop into the crowd, for the purpose of arresting a man who could have been taken on the previous day, or on the day after. This would not do; the cavalry must act, and the consequence was, according to the noble viscount's statement, the loss of three lives; but according to his (earl Grey's) information, of seven lives, besides the wounding of near four hundred persons.

He maintained, that this conduct of the magistrates furnished prima facie grounds for inquiry.—In justice to the magistrates—in justice to the country—in justice to parliament, this inquiry ought to be instituted. He begged their lordships to attend to the flippant manner in which Mr. Hay mentioned the reading of the Riot act—"In the mean time the Riot act was read." Indeed, from all which had transpired upon this subject it appeared that the Riot act was not read. None of the witnesses examined before the coroner had heard of its having been read, though some were close to the house in which the magistrates were stationed; even Nadin and Entwistle, and a man named Hall, said they had never heard of its having been read, or of any warning having been given to the people to disperse, or of the meeting being illegal. He asked, then, was not this again presumptive proof that the magistrates had misconducted themselves? The magistrates asserted, however, that the Riot act was read, but if they acted upon it they ought to abide by its provisions; yet the meeting was dispersed immediately after the period when it was stated to have been read.

But it was urged that there had been much misrepresentation on this subject. He admitted it; there had been a good deal of misrepresentation on both sides. Was it possible that all the misrepresentation could be on one side? Was it possible that the magistrates, who had the making out of their own case, had not allowed a little prejudice to infuse itself in that account? Was it not possible that some misrepresentation had crept into that account? It had been sworn by most creditable witnesses, that no resistance was offered to the cavalry before they got to the hustings. Here he would make his stand and call for inquiry. Was it to be tolerated, that without any opposition being offered—without any attempt at violence by the people, these men were to inflict wounds, and put to death several of his majesty's subjects? He said, without fear of contradiction, that there never was a case where the most prompt and minute inquiry was called for. There never was a period when the House ought more seriously to pause before they decided against inquiry. There existed much discontent in the country. The evidence laid before the House could not be relied upon. He was asked, would he give way to popular clamour? His answer was, "No, but I will use my utmost endeavours to obtain justice for the people." This justice was demanded at a time of great public distress; it was demanded too for what was considered an invasion of the people's privileges.—Let inquiry be granted—let the magistrates be acquitted, if innocent; let them be punished, if their conduct was proved to have been culpable;—let the inquiry be instituted, and in either case their lordships would take a considerable step towards calming the public mind. There were cases of palpable misrepresentation respecting the yeomanry, which he wished to mention. The first was that of a yeomanry man named Hulme, who had been knocked off his horse. It was urged by the magistrate that this person had been struck before he used his sword, whereas it was sworn that he had cut at several persons, and that he was striking at a man when he was struck with a brick-bat. The next case was that of a person named Campbell who was acquitted of a charge of having fired at a man from his window, on its having been proved that he was in the habit of firing pistols from his windows. He did not urge that any of these statements were true, but he said that they called for inquiry. The circumstance of the swords of the yeomanry cavalry having been sharpened, was also a subject on which there existed much difference of opinion. It was, no doubt, right that the arms of soldiers should at all times be prepared for duty; but here it had been proved before the coroner, by the person who had been employed to sharpen them, that 60 swords were sharpened in the week ending on the 17th of July, and others a short time before the meeting at Manchester. These were facts that had been proved, and that could not be doubted or denied. Their lordships had been asked if they would protect the disturbers of the public peace? He asked, who were the disturbers of the public peace? There was strong ground of presumption that the magistrates were the disturbers: he asked for inquiry to establish or disprove the fact. "But, then," said the noble lords, "inquiry will prejudice the question in courts of law." He should like to know how the magistrates were to be brought before a court of law. They ordered the yeomanry to act, in the exercise of the discretion vested in them, and he would ask what power there was to bring this conduct under legal discussion? This was an inquiry which parliament, and parliament only, could institute. Their lordships were called upon to enact laws restricting the rights of the subject; was the evidence on the table sufficient to induce them to do so? The noble lord said that all the facts were proved. By whom were they proved? The statements were almost all anonymous. Were the statements of A. B. and C. D. to be implicitly credited; and were the liberties of the people to be invaded on such authority? A. B. says he went to a blacksmith's shop and bought a pike-head—that he went to the public-house and had certain conversations with this blacksmith, from which he learned certain treasonable matters. Was all this to be implicitly believed by parliament, who knew nothing of A. B. or C. D.? It reminded him of a curious device, practised in a book written by lord Orford, which he had read some time since. In that book, the names of the different personages were left out in the print, but afterwards supplied in manuscript. But the statements of these anonymous individuals were ridiculous. On one occasion, a search for arms was made—and what was found? One pike-head, two pistol-stocks, concealed on a shelf, and a box containing some unfinished balls! In another instance, the socket of a pike-head, with a small pistol, and a paper containing the pattern of a pike were discovered! This was if possible more ridiculous than the stocking full of ammunition which was to be used in seizing the Tower, and taking possession of London.

It was said that the people were at present providing themselves with arms for the purpose of carrying their revolutionary plans into execution: but it should be remembered that the same was said in 1817. What followed on that occasion? The Habeas Corpus act was suspended, but none of the arms which were said to have been provided were ever discovered, although the most diligent search was made for them! The present case, however, was a great deal stronger than that of 1817, for here parliament were called upon to make new laws, without even the authority of a committee to sanction the credibility of A, B, and C, whose testimony, supposing it to be confirmed, was incomplete in many points. He had made some extracts from the report of the committee appointed in 1817, in which it was said that pikes had been manufactured, and other arms provided, in different parts of the country; but the fact was known that none of these pikes or other arms had ever been found. Again, on the subject of Mr. Horsfall's atrocious murder, these were the words in the report of the committee—"When he fell, the people surrounded him, and reviled him, instead of offering him assistance; and no attempts were made to secure the assassins." Thus the people were charged with the brutal cruelty of reviling the unfortunate sufferer, instead of offering him any assistance. But what was the fact? The murderers were afterwards secured, tried, and convicted; and, on the trial it was proved, that the people, instead of reviling the wounded man, had assisted him to the nearest house. Here anonymous evidence had been satisfactorily contradicted on the trial; and yet, on similar testimony, parliament was at present abridging the liberties of the people. If this was not a fit case for parliamentary inquiry, he could not see when such a case could occur; and that being his opinion, he thought it his duty to support the motion of his noble friend. He observed with astonishment that there was nothing from the lord-lieutenant of the county of Lancashire on the subject of these proceedings. It was to him an unaccountable matter, that his majesty's ministers, as far as appeared from the documents on the table, had not applied to the lord lieutenant, the highest authority in the county, but had received all their information from magistrates in inferior situations. From the lord-lieutenant it was that ministers ought to have sought for information, instead of passing him over and applying to the magistrates, who were parties in the case. In saying this he meant no personal disrespect to the magistrates.

He felt it unpleasant to speak of himself, but he appealed to the House whether he could have any other motive in advocating inquiry than a conscientious wish to perform his duty to his country. Could he be suspected of any attachment to the principles of the radical reformers? Was he not aware that those persons called radical reformers were decided enemies to the Whigs—that he himself was pointed out by name as their greatest, if not their principal enemy? He knew that if those persons were to succeed in obtaining that which they sought for, he would be their first victim; but, notwithstanding this, when he found an attempt made through these people to aim a vital blow at the constitution of the country, he was determined, as far as in his power, to interpose his shield and prevent it. In doing so, he could have no ambitious purpose in view; for he was not so weak as to suppose that at his age, and with his state of health, he could, in the event of any popular commotion, "Ride on the whirlwind, and direct the storm." His only object at his time of life was and ought to be peace and tranquillity, but above all, he was anxious for the peace and prosperity of the country. He was anxious to see that blessed constitution which had been the work of our ancestors preserved pure and inviolate. If that were attained, he should sink to his grave with peace and satisfaction. For the reasons which he had endeavoured to submit to their lordships he must give his most cordial support to the motion of his noble friend.

The Earl of Liverpool apologised to the House for addressing them at that late hour, after all he could say had been anticipated by the noble marquis, and also by the noble baron who had that night delivered one of the ablest and most eloquent speeches that had ever been heard in that House. He could not, however, in justice to the cause which his noble friends had taken up, in justice to himself, or in justice to the administration with whom he acted, suffer this question to go to the vote, without delivering his opinions upon it. How injurious soever he supposed that the views of the noble mover would prove, if adopted by parliament, he was ready to render him that justice which the noble marquis, he knew would on his part, give him for purity of intention. In addressing himself to this subject, he could not help observing the very different views which were entertained by the noble marquis and by the noble earl who had just sat down. In the opinion of the noble marquis, the motion embraced every thing; but the noble earl restricted it to an inquiry into the proceedings at Manchester. The noble earl said, on the first night of the session, that he objected to the whole proceedings of ministers, as injurious to the interests of the country: from the noble marquis they had heard a different opinion, for he had said he did not doubt that some of the measures proposed by his majesty's ministers would be beneficial to the country.

The subject of the motion before their lordships might be considered in two points of view—either that they should go into an inquiry with reference to the whole state of the country, as the noble marquis proposed; or, as the noble earl proposed, that they should institute an inquiry on the question of the proceedings at Manchester alone. The noble marquis had attributed the present troubles to the distress which prevailed in some districts of the country; and the noble baron had said, that these troubles were owing to a plan that had been regularly formed long ago to subvert the constitution. He would not, at that late hour, enter into the examination of these two different opinions, because they all admitted that, whether the evil proceeded from distress or not, distress did exist, and that every endeavour should be made to relieve it. If the noble marquis had said, that this distress proceeded from the measures of parliament, that would have been a fit ground for a parliamentary inquiry; or had he even said that it could be relieved by parliament, that would have been a fit ground for inquiry. But the noble mover had not said any thing from which it could be inferred that he entertained either of these opinions. As to the first of the remedies that had been suggested, the issuing of exchequer bills in aid of the commercial interest, he did not think it necessary to enter into any argument to prove its inefficacy, especially as the noble marquis himself had great doubts of the propriety of such a measure.

With respect to the second remedy, even if the smuggling alluded to was really practised, he was sure the noble marquis had too enlarged a view of the subject, to suppose that any material good could result from the plan proposed. It was evident that great delusion had been practised on the public mind respecting the causes of the present distress, for every one who looked at the papers on the table must know that it was connected with circumstances over which neither the executive government nor parliament had any control. It arose from the state of an internal trade, affected by foreign commerce; and he maintained that, whatever might be the circumstances of this distress, it was not connected with political causes. It was impossible it should not have happened that a war of more than twenty years, a war in which not only this country, but all Europe had been involved, should be followed by great distress in this country, as well as in all other countries in Europe. If, however, the noble marquis would inform himself on the subject, he would find that this distress existed to as great an extent in the United States of America as in this country—a circumstance which he regretted, both on account of America itself, and on account of the effect it had on this country. If their lordships considered the situation of America, they would find there those principles of reform which had spread through this country. The Americans had no king—no nobles—no established church—no tithes. They had too—what was called equal representation—and we were told they had no taxes; yet that country was more distressed than this, in which all those establishments existed. He did not urge this as a matter of blame against the American government—it arose from a cause simple, plain, and intelligible.

For fifteen or twenty years that country had remained neutral, had carried on an extensive commerce, and during that time had made great progress in prosperity; and when the circumstances which had given rise to its prosperity were changed, it was impossible that a country so situated should not go backwards. Its present situation, he hoped for our own sakes, would not be of long duration; but he had stated these circumstances to show that the causes of distress were not to be attributed to the government of a country.

In inquiring into the circumstances which had given rise to the distresses of this country, it was material to consider how rapidly the population had increased within the last 60 years. What was the consequence? To meet the great demand for manufactures, machinery was introduced, which had a tendency in the end to produce something like a glut in the market; and this, combined with the increase of our population, might easily account for some portion of the distresses that existed. He stated these circumstances, because he thought, generally, that they were most material for consideration, and also because they were most important with reference to the formation and adoption of any measures for the amelioration of the state of the country. Every man must look with an anxious desire towards any measure that was calculated to afford relief to the lower classes of people in this country, and more particularly to the manufacturing population. But the legislature must proceed with great caution. Measures of that kind could not be viewed as matters of indifference. If they did not effect good, it was probable that they might do much harm; and he believed that, for one instance in which benefit was produced by legislative interference in matters of trade and commerce, ten cases could be pointed out in which injury was the consequence. This was a doctrine that ought to be impressed on the minds of the people of this country. They ought to be taught, that evils, inseparable from the state of things, should not be charged upon any government; and, on inquiry, it would be found that by far the greater part of the miseries of which human nature complained, were, in all times and in all countries, beyond the control of human legislature:

"How small, of all the ills that men endure,
"The part which kings or states can cause or cure!"

Whatever the cause of the present distress might be, it could not, he would maintain, be ascribed, in any degree or in any way, to the government or legislature of this country. The observation of the noble baron who spoke last but one was worthy of the deepest attention. If there were any suggestions to be made worthy of notice, either to alleviate the distress that prevailed, or to contract its duration, let them be brought forward at the proper time; and they would always receive full consideration from the parliament and government of the country. But these points did not, in his judgment, form any ground for proceeding with such an inquiry as was now called for.

The noble marquis had, however, declared, that an inquiry ought to be instituted, not with a view to apply relief to any distress which existed, but because he conceived that there was some defect in the formation of the other House of Parliament, and that the people looked to some reform in that House, where they conceived they were not sufficiently represented. This was a severe charge to advance against the House of Commons, and, in his opinion, an unfounded one. He knew not on what ground it could be defended. The noble marquis, in support of his argument, had referred to the conduct of the noble baron and of the noble marquis some years ago, with respect to the military establishment of the country. He would not now enter into a discussion of the reasons which induced them to suppose that the establishment then in existence was not more than sufficient; but the noble marquis had entirely forgotten the reduction that took place in preceding years—a reduction, he believed, that went to the full extent of any wish or expectation that was ever stated by those who opposed a very large force. The result of that reduction was, that though the question of the amount of the army and ordnance establishment had been in every preceding session a great subject of conflict and discussion in both Houses of Parliament, yet it would be found, on referring to those sources which were open to all their lordships, that in the last year the army was so far reduced that the vote passed the other House of Parliament with little observation, and except what had been offered by a noble earl opposite, without objection in that House. It was, therefore, most unfair, considering the evil that must arise from it, to endeavour to excite distrust in the minds of the people, by making an accusation against parliament in general, or the House of Commons in particular, unless the noble marquis could adduce a more grave and well-supported ground of censure than he had offered: but did the noble marquis believe that the spirit of reform—that spirit which produced those numerous meetings—had, in reality, any connexion with the distress that existed?

The noble marquis had asserted that meetings convened for the purpose of procuring annual parliaments, were not illegal. That opinion he conceived to be erroneous. By the same rule, the people might meet to alter the succession to the Crown. If the noble lord's argument were carried to its extreme, he could see nothing more illegal in their assembling to alter the line of succession, than in meeting to demand annual parliaments and universal suffrage. If the doctrine laid down by the noble lord were true, the people might meet to petition parliament to do any act that was within its power, and no person could argue that the power of altering the succession to the throne did not belong to it. In the first place, the noble lord had stated that numbers alone did not constitute illegality. He would not take on himself (for he did not profess to have sufficient confidence in his knowledge of the law) to decide whether numbers alone rendered a meeting illegal, but he would maintain, that the appearance of great numbers established a fact, from which the nature of a meeting might in some degree be inferred; and if with numbers they combined the circumstances stated in the papers laid before the House, the whole taken together constituted an illegal meeting. What could be the object of previous training—of military array—of coming armed, even with sticks and staves—of answering to the orders of commanders, as the people at those meetings did, except for the purpose of carrying their designs by terror? Could any person examine the evidence, and say that there was not a design on the part of many individuals by terror or force to shake the constitution of the country? But the noble lord observed, that there was nothing to be feared, for there were no persons of rank or property amongst the discontented. If the noble lord examined the proceedings at former periods in this country, he would see the dreadful mischief that was occasioned even by such men as Wat Tyler and Jack Straw. He would find a vast quantity of property destroyed and confiscated; he would perceive that many lives were lost, by popular commotions, unaided by men of property. He would learn that the country might be visited by destruction, without the interference of people of rank and consequence. But the noble lord said, he did not believe the great mass of the people to be of the description stated by his noble friend (marquis Wellesley) in the course of his speech. His noble friend did not assert that the whole or even the greater part of the people were of that description, but that there were many dangerous characters amongst them. If the noble lord would look to the history of any revolution that ever took place, he would find, that, on those occasions, the active leaders were few. When the government of this country was overturned, those who first entertained the project were very much restricted in numbers. In every instance, it was the desperate conduct of the few, and the fears of the many, that produced revolution. He would not say, because he did not believe, that the great body of the French people were at first implicated in the revolution which formerly ravaged that country. If any person had told them, a few years before, that they would soon assist in overturning the monarchy of France, he believed they would have shuddered at the bare idea, but they soon became familiarised to scenes of devastation. The noble lord, to prove that the meeting was peaceable, stated that it was attended by women and children. He (the earl of Liverpool) never saw a mob in his life without women and children. He had witnessed some of the most active scenes in the French revolution: he was present at the capture of the Bastille; and he could assure the noble lord that he saw many women busily employed on that occasion.

He had heard, with the highest satisfaction, the noble baron's speech. He had heard it with the highest satisfaction, both because it took the view which, in his opinion, appeared to be the just view of the transactions in question, and because he knew that what had fallen from such high authority, must have an excellent effect throughout the country. But the noble marquis whose motion was before their lordships, declared, that the facts disclosed afforded a sufficient ground for inquiry. Now, he had no difficulty in stating, that if all the noble lord advanced had been true—if he could make out his case to the utmost extent, and show that there was a fair ground of suspicion, with respect to the conduct of the magistrates of Manchester—still he should think, that it was not a proper subject for inquiry in that House, but one that should be investigated in the courts below, before which a part of the case had already come. He would not, however, let the statement of the noble lord go forth, without expressing his concurrence in the opinion of the noble baron, that no reason, no ground for inquiry existed, because the conduct of the magistrates was not only legal and justifiable, but highly laudable and judicious. It was not, however, necessary for his purpose that he should go that length; because he had no difficulty in saying, that if they were actuated by an honest desire to do their duty, if they were uninfluenced by passion or partiality, and had applied their minds fairly to the circumstances of the case as they occurred at the time, he should not have thought them liable to blame, because he or others had formed a different conclusion with reference to those circumstances. It would be exceedingly unjust if they were censured, not for a wilful abandonment of their duty, but for a mere error of judgment. The noble lord said, the magistrates had a previous intimation of the views of those who intended to meet on the 16th of August, and their first object ought to have been to prevent the people from assembling, by stopping the different columns as they approached. That consideration did occupy the serious attention of the magistrates for some time, and they at length determined not to adopt such a course. Their motive for not preventing the meeting appeared to him to be a sound one. They could not do it without causing such a diversion of the military force, in and near the town, as must have endangered its safety more than the meeting of the people could do. This was the deliberate view they took of the subject, and he conceived it was a correct one. They, however, caused placards to be posted round the town, calling on the heads of families to keep their children and servants within doors, and warning them that if they attended the meeting it must be at their peril. Thus it appeared, that they did employ the best means in their power to render the assemblage as little numerous as possible. The question then was, whether the meeting was of such an illegal character as would justify the magistrates in dispersing it by force? Their lordships were aware of the previous drilling—of the appearance of military array—and of the people to the number of at least 30,000 marching to the ground, under regular commanders. Few persons had raised a doubt, looking to all the facts, that the circumstances and character of the meeting were altogether illegal. But, independently of their own observation, the magistrates had the depositions of 50 persons in the town and neighbourhood of Manchester, in which they stated that they believed the town to be in imminent danger, by the accumulation of a vast body of people there: and when all the shops were shut up, when business was suspended on a labouring day, was there not, he asked, a reasonable ground for fear? The magistrates did consider the meeting to be illegal, and they felt they were justified in signing a warrant for the arrest of the principal persons who convened it. The noble lord had observed, that there was a line of constables from the house where the magistrates were assembled, to the hustings; but he forgot to state, that the hustings were several times removed, in order that the parties who called the meeting might have the assistance of a compact body of men, who were linked together by the arms, round the hustings, and could effectually prevent the approach of any persons towards them. The noble lord said, the warrant might have been executed by means of these constables, without the intervention of military. What was the fact? Nadin and Andrews, who were intrusted with the execution of the warrant, declared to the magistrates that they could not serve it without the assistance of the military; and, under these circumstances, it was the duty of the magistrates to grant the aid required. The noble lord next asserted, that the military charged into the midst of the mob, before any resistance was offered. What was the nature of that charge? The yeomanry proceeded in single files, and the slowness of their pace might be ascertained from this fact, that Mr. Nadin and Mr. Andrews were able to keep up with them all the while, until they arrived at the hustings.

He now came to the question of reading the Riot act; and he had learned from authority which he could not doubt, that it was completely read once, and partly read a second time, but the magistrate who undertook the duty was thrown down. On this part of the case, however, he did not lay any stress, because the magistrates were legally empowered to disperse such a meeting, without reading the Riot act at all. He believed it was the original intention of the magistrates to disperse the assembly an hour after the Riot act was read, but, when the officers went to arrest the accused person, the yeomanry were assailed. They were fired at with pistols, and sticks and stones were hurled at them. He spoke on the authority of the officers, Nadin and Andrews, who both declared that they considered the yeomen to have been overpowered. At this moment an individual exclaimed, "For God's sake save the yeomen!" and, in consequence, the 15th Dragoons were ordered to charge the mob, who were almost immediately dispersed. The whole period between the advance of the cavalry and the dispersion of the meeting was not more than ten minutes. He believed the yeomen (he spoke of them as a body, and did not mean to answer for any individual) did not remain longer on the ground than was necessary to complete the business, or do any act that was not absolutely necessary. He stated these circumstances for their lordships' consideration, and he defied any man to point out any part of the conduct of the magistrates in this case to which blame could be fairly attached. He protested that, if he had been in their situation, he did not know one point in the whole of the proceeding where he thought he could have acted better himself. But if there were objectionable points—points on which more prudence might have been displayed, still, when they recollected the danger which threatened them at the moment, no impartial man would say that an error occasioned by inadvertence should be visited with censure. This again brought him to the question of inquiry, and he felt, as he had stated before, that this was not the place for such a proceeding. In fact, the case had in some degree proceeded to inquiry already, because the finding of bills against Hunt and others was, as far as it went, a species of inquiry, through the medium of which the legality of the meeting would be decided. He would say farther, that when certain parties preferred bills against five of these yeomen, which bills were rejected, it was an ex parte justification of their conduct. The noble lord said, it was not in the power of the persons injured to obtain redress. This was not correct: they could proceed by criminal prosecution or civil action. Was it then fair, when a judicial investigation might be had, to set aside all the ordinary course of justice and to demand an inquiry in parliament? The noble lord alluded to the case of Porteus, in Scotland, which underwent an investigation in parliament. But then the fact was, that the magistrates had not done their duty, and parliament was the only place in which a remedy could be obtained. Where cases of that kind arose, it was certainly proper to apply to parliament; but a simultaneous proceeding in parliament and in the courts below could not be admitted without violating every principle of justice.

The noble lord had said it would be improper to pass such measures as were now in contemplation, without due consideration. This was very true; but ministers would rest their justification on the papers laid before the House, combined with the notoriety of the facts narrated in them, which were well known to every person in the country. The noble lord might take objection to insulated parts of an affidavit, but he believed a more complete body of evidence, taking the whole of it together, was never laid before parliament. Here was information, derived not merely from the Manchester magistrates (for the papers were not laid on the table for their justification) but from individuals of the highest respectability. They had the authority of the grand jury of the county of Lancaster, which was as respectably composed as any in the kingdom. It comprised individuals not only of high property and consideration in that county, but who entertained political opinions extremely different from each other. They had also the statement of the respectable individual who filled the situation of lord-lieutenant of the county. He could speak of that individual's conduct from experience when he held the situation of secretary of state for the home department, and he never knew a person who discharged the arduous duty of a lord-lieutenant in a more exemplary or abler manner. For many years it had been found of the greatest benefit to the county of Lancaster, that it possessed so excellent a lord-lieutenant as the earl of Derby; a nobleman whose services could not be too highly appreciated, and who, although a zealous opponent of his majesty's ministers, had conducted himself in such a manner as to induce them, at any critical period, to congratulate themselves that such a man was at the head of a remote district. In addition to the authorities he had quoted, they had also the statement of the grand jury of Chester, and of the lord-lieutenant of that county; and having thus briefly adverted to them, he would ask whether there ever was so complete a mass of evidence laid before a secret committee of that House. From the conviction which ministers felt that this evidence was correct, they thought that laying it on the table would be sufficient to prove, that a state of things existed in the country which called for the interference of the legislature. The noble lord, on that and former occasions, had made a charge against the government for not having prosecuted a sufficient number of those infamous libels with which the country at present teemed. He would venture to say, that prosecutions, inopportune taken up, were always productive of more evil than good. This was a subject, however, which for months past had most anxiously occupied the attention of government. Their lordships were aware that several prosecutions were instituted in Michaelmas term last year, particularly with respect to Sherwin's Register. If the noble lord thought they were dropped through neglect, he was mistaken. It was not from the supineness of government, but from the deficiency of the law as it now existed, and which their lordships had it in their power to remedy, that the proceedings were slow or unsuccessful. He could state that up to the present day, it was not in the power of the law-officers of the Crown to bring one of those libels home to Sherwin himself. It was, however, true, that fifty prosecutions had been instituted, some of them several months ago, not against himself, but against other persons, for publishing his register; and he believed that a prosecution was commenced against Carlile, for a letter on the subject of assassination, so long back as Christmas, 1818, but the forms of the law as it at present stood prevented it from being brought forward till Michaelmas term last, when it was further postponed, at the request of the defendant. They would have another time to go into this subject; but he wished now to put it to their lordships, whether it was fit that such a state of law should exist in this country, as enabled individuals to circulate libellous publications for nine or twelve months before they were subjected to legal punishment. Their lordships had on their table a most important measure connected with this subject. It was an alteration of the existing law respecting traverses which he deemed indispensable. He did not, however, mean to say that it would answer the intended purpose, unless it was combined with other meaasures. This subject was under the serious consideration of the Prince Regent's government, who were as convinced, as he was, that the alteration was indispensably necessary for the administration of justice. Those who consider the increase of the population must feel with him, that the legal machinery, which 200 years ago might have answered every purpose, could not prima facie be calculated for the present state of things. He again repeated, that with the exception of one measure authorizing the search for arms, which was of a temporary and local nature, all the others which had been introduced by his noble friend last night, were consistent with the existing laws and principles of the British constitution. Those measures, were, indeed, proposed in furtherance of the principles of the constitution, and for the purpose of protecting the people of this country against a series of evils, which, if not checked, must subvert their rights and liberties. If they looked to this question in a proper point of view, they would see that whatever they might have gained by commercial exertions, whatever benefit they might have derived from the persecutions which had driven individuals from other countries, it was possible that they might be deprived of them all, if they did not guard against the persecutions of a mob. The fear of the mob invariably led to arbitrary government; and the best friends of liberty were therefore those who put down popular commotion, and secured the inhabitants of a country in the peaceable enjoyment of their rights.

The Earl of Darnley said, he should support the motion, and contended, that this was a subject on which the minds of the people required to be satisfied, and on which an inquiry was absolutely necessary.

The Marquis of Lansdowne replied. He was perfectly ready to admit that he was favourably disposed to the principle of some of the measures about to be adopted; but to others of them he was decidedly adverse. Whatever opinion might be entertained of them could not affect the propriety of the inquiry he proposed; which would be honourable to the House, satisfactory to the country, and would give to the magistrates an opportunity of vindicating their conduct.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, he was extremely unwilling to occupy the attention of the House by any thing that respected himself personally, and he felt that, on the preceding evening, he had put an entire end to a misrepresentation that had taken place with reference to what he had said a few days ago. He had since been charged with saying, that at some meeting in the West Riding of Yorkshire, resolutions had been passed on the part of the Radical Reformers, in which the property of earl Fitzwilliam had been pointed at for partition. He explained to the House yesterday, that he never said that such resolutions had been passed; but that, in the course of a meeting held within the West Riding of the county of York, the property of the noble earl was directly pointed at for partition. There was a material difference between the two statements; because, if the Reformers had come to resolutions of such a nature, the persons concurring in them would have been implicated in their adoption, as much as the persons by whom they were proposed. What he originally said was, if gentlemen wished to know the object of the Reformers, let them look to the resolutions agreed to at Leeds; and he added, that at a meeting held somewhere in the West Riding, the property of earl Fitzwilliam was "pointed at" for partition. He did not say that resolutions were passed having that object in view; but that, in the course of the meeting, the property was so pointed at. He was unwilling to believe that there was any intention to misrepresent the words made use of by the members of that House, but these were critical times, and if any accusation were thrown out against any party, it was most material that it should be precisely stated, and that words should not be placed in the mouths of gentlemen which they had not made use of. He would leave the matter here, being unwilling to press it farther. As in all those vehicles by which parliamentary intelligence was conveyed to the public, he appeared to have been equally misrepresented on this occasion, he could only attribute the circumstance either to the terms in which he delivered his explanation not being sufficiently clear, or else to some defect in the hearing of those who noticed it. He was most anxious, and he earnestly hoped, that the misrepresentation which had taken place would now be effectually done away.

MANCHESTER MEETING — PETITION FROM READING.] Mr. Fysche Palmer presented a petition from the inhabitants of the town of Reading. It was numerous and respectably signed, he said, and related chiefly to the affair of Manchester on the 16th of August last. In consequence of information obtained by the petitioners, of the particulars of that day's transactions, not only furnished by the newspapers, but also by several respectable men in their neighbourhood, who had subsequently visited the scene, the petitioners were led to believe that the meeting was perfectly legal and constitutional, and that the conduct of the persons assembled was exemplary for good order and propriety; that an indiscriminate attack was made on this legal and orderly meeting, whereby not only the leaders and audience part of the meeting, but those who had been attracted by mere curiosity, suffered extreme cruelty and outrage. The petitioners were convinced that this attack was a violent infraction of the right of meeting, to discuss and petition for redress of public grievances, which right was fully warranted, and the exercise of it protected by the constitution. The petitioners thought that those who advised the Prince Regent to thank the magistrates and yeomanry for their conduct on that occasion were guilty of great harshness and injustice, and showed a disposition to stifle inquiry into the most calamitous events which could befall a free people.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow did not rise to oppose the bringing up of the petition; but the declaration of the petitioners, that the Manchester meeting was perfectly legal and constitutional, was one which he felt it to be his duty to protest against. The pretence of exercising the right of petitioning, could not, in his opinion warrant the military parade and banners used on that occasion. He thought, indeed, that the meeting was directly illegal, seditious, and dangerous to the public peace. The demand for "annual parliaments, universal suffrage, and vote by ballot," inscribed on one of the flags, was utterly unconstitutional. "Liberty or Death," on another of the flags, proved the intention entertained of maintaining the first-mentioned claim at the hazard of life. This was riotous and treasonable; it was nonsense to confound such proceedings with the legal right of petitioning.

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

MANCHESTER MEETING—PETITION OF SAMUEL BAMFORD]. Mr. Bennet said, he held in his hand a petition from a person of the name of Samuel Bamford, of Middleton, in the county palatine of Lancaster. It was drawn up in a manner extremely decorous in every point of view, and furnished one of the most singular specimens of the talents and good sense which were to be found among persons in the petitioner's rank of society. The petitioner set forth that he was one of those who conducted a large body of individuals to the meeting at Manchester of the 16th of August. He stated that he was intimately acquainted with the motives which induced individuals to attend that meeting, that he was perfectly cognizant of the propriety of the means which they intended to use to accomplish their objects, and that he was most solicitous to appear at the bar of that House to be examined: As he (Mr. Bennet) had had two long conversations with the petitioner, he had no hesitation in saying that the information which it was in his power to give was of the highest importance, and he should like nothing better than to have the petitioner examined at the bar in order to demonstrate what he thought the petitioner capable of demonstrating, that many of the accusations brought forward against the people were very highly coloured, if not altogether unfounded. As the petition would be read, it was not his intention to enter into any detail of its contents. The petitioner, as far as he had been able to learn, bore the reputation of being an honest, moral, well-meaning man. As to his political opinions, they certainly were dissimilar from those which he held; but he was yet to learn that there was any thing treasonable or seditious in his entertaining sentiments which had, at different times, been upheld and avowed by the great and powerful in this country, and, amongst others, by the duke of Richmond. Under these circumstances, he begged leave to offer his petition to the consideration of the House and he sincerely hoped the House would grant the prayer of the petitioner, and hear what he had to say on the different points which the petition embraced.

The petition was then read, setting forth,

"That the petitioner having read the papers relative to the internal state of the country, presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of the Prince Regent, and printed at the London Gazette Office, and which papers, the petitioner is informed, have been delivered to the members of the House as the foundation of certain legislative measures, tending to alter the laws and constitution of this realm, and abridge the rights and liberties of the people, and knowing that many of the allegations contained in those papers are untrue, and many of the circumstances described as facts are grossly misrepresented, while the proceedings and intentions of the people are unfairly discoloured and distorted in many of the documents contained in the said papers: the petitioner humbly requests, that, for the purpose of disproving the allegations and representations contained in the said papers, he may be examined at the bar of the House, and confronted in person, or, by evidence, with the persons who have thus traduced a large body of his majesty's loyal subjects, whose sole design, as must be well known to the petitioner, was to address his Royal Highness, humbly to represent their various grievances, and petition for such reforms as might have a tendency to remove them; that the petitioner, from an honest conviction that the greater part of the grievances under which the people labour might be removed by such a reform as would restore to the people their right of suffrage, and diminish the amount of taxation, by lessening the expenses of the state, and conceiving that he was amply protected by the laws in exercising all those rights of a freeman which the constitution has conferred upon him, has never hesitated to unite with his neighbours in furthering every measure which tended in a legal manner to bring about the said reforms, and nothing further has ever been in the contemplation of the petitioner, nor, he believes, in that of his neighbours, although the petitioner freely acknowledges that he has been a willing and active participator, from a sense of public duty, in most of the measures which are so grossly misconstrued and perverted, in the papers which have been so presented to the House; that, in regard to the system of pretended training for military purposes, to the preparation of flags, to the marching in a body from Middleton to Manchester, and to all the legitimate and justifiable objects of such measures the petitioner is prepared to speak at large, and to demonstrate by his own, and various evidence, that, so far from their involving any design to break the public peace, they were instituted for the very purpose of its preservation, and of giving that unity of action and feeling to every individual as should most effectually secure the harmony and good order of the great meeting of the friends of reform then meditated at Manchester; all which explanations of the petitioner would, if made at the bar of the House, fully satisfy its members, and the nation at large, that the friends of reform in Lancashire have been basely traduced and calumniated in the papers so presented as aforesaid: that the petitioner humbly trespasses further on the time of the House, to state, that he attended, with great numbers of his fellow townsmen and inhabitants of the adjacent villages, at the meeting held at Manchester on the 16th of August, for the sole and lawful purpose of giving their personal vote and countenance to an address to the Prince Regent for redress of grievances, and for certain reforms tending thereto; that the petitioner, and his neighbours as aforesaid, walked in procession to the said meeting, after the manner in which the procession of benefit clubs and other associations take place in Lancashire and other parts of England, and, to enable the said parties to move with due decorum, a couple of flags were provided, in accordance with the manners and customs of the people of England from time immemorial for purposes of the like nature, whether for elections or any other peaceable and lawful object, which flags were provided with such inscriptions or mottoes as, in the humble judgment of the persons who directed their construction, were suitable, and as are to be found in the works of the best moral and political writers; a band of music being also provided to aid in the purposes of the flags, and to confer cheerfulness and hilarity on the people; all which appurtenances usually characterise similar processions for every variety of peaceable or social design in that country; and are in like manner believed by the petitioner to be characteristic of the peaceable manners and customs of the entire population of these realms; which several circumstances have been unfairly and unjustly described in the papers alluded to as aforesaid; that the petitioner and his neighbours arrived at the proposed place of general meeting at Manchester, for the purpose aforesaid, in the greatest hilarity and good order, intending mischief to none, and suspecting none towards themselves, therefore wholly unprepared with means of offence or defence, and many of them affording an indubitable pledge of their sincerity and sense of security, by taking in their company their wives and female relatives; and that after they had been on the ground half an hour, and within ten minutes after the chairman had taken his station on the hustings, without any previous notice, riot, tumult, or disturbance, the assembly, consisting as is supposed of above a hundred thousand men, women, and children, who, as the petitioner believes, had been collected under similar circumstances, with similar views, to those which directed the petitioner and his neighbours, found themselves suddenly assaulted by a charge of the Manchester yeomanry cavalry, who sabred, rode down, and trampled upon every individual who could not escape them; by which, as the petitioner be-lives, several hundred unoffending persons were severely wounded, and some killed on the spot, while, owing to the endeavour of so many thousand persons to escape from this continued, persevering, and unrelenting outrage, they were driven one upon another, so as, in some cases, to press each other to death, break the limbs of others, and occasion many to be trampled upon, thereby producing a scene of complicated horrors, of which no powers of language possessed by the petitioner can convey to the House an adequate notion; that the petitioner beheld the whole of this frightful scene with feelings which can never be erased from his mind, and the impression of which would render it highly criminal if he forbore to do his duty to the unhappy sufferers, to his country, to the cause of justice, and to the House, by thus solemnly impeaching the veracity of the various statements made by parties implicated, and criminal in those unparalleled atrocities; that the petitioner, for the reasons above stated, and that the House may not be taken by surprise, by ex parte statements, and may not be led to adopt measures derogatory of its honour and dignity, but may, on the other hand, be induced to institute such rigorous and solemn inquiries as may, through the means of its power, bring the criminal authors who appear to be above the reach of the ordinary tribunals, and above the humble means of the sufferers, to condign punishment, humbly prays, that he may be permitted to prove all and every of the allegations contained herein at the bar of the House."

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

CAMELFORD ELECTION.] The Resolution of the 7th of July last [see vol. 40, p. 1537] being read,

Mr. D. W. Harvey said, the House had, in the last session, agreed to two resolutions relative to the borough of Camelford. One of these was, that the House would, shortly after its meeting, take into consideration the two reports which had been drawn up relative to the last election for Camelford; the other was, that the warrant of the Speaker should not be issued, for a new writ, for members to serve for that borough, until ten days after parliament had met. He wished that the period for issuing the warrant should be farther postponed till the 6th of January next; and also, that the House should enter into a committee to consider of these reports. He should therefore move, "That Mr. Speaker do not issue his warrant to make out a new writ for the electing of two burgesses to serve in this present parliament for the borough of Camelford, in the room of John Stewart, esq., and Lewis Allsop, esq., whose election has been determined to be void, before 6th January next." The resolution was agreed to; after which Mr. Harvey gave notice, that he would on Wednesday se'nnight move, "That the House do resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the two reports of the committee on the Camelford election."

BANK OF ENGLAND.] Mr. Grenfell wished to know from the right hon. gentleman opposite, whether any and what arrangements had been made for paying to the Bank of England part of the sum of 5,000,000*l.*, which, under the recommendation of the parliamentary committee that sat in the last session on the affairs of the Bank, was to be put in an immediate train of payment. According to his recollection, the arrangement agreed to on that occasion was, that a sum amounting to 5,000,000*l.* should be paid between the months of July last and April; but as some misunderstanding had taken place on this subject, he should be obliged to the right hon. gentleman if he would favour him with correct information.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the House would do him the justice to recollect, that, when the discussion of the affairs of the Bank took place, he stated, that the necessary arrangement for raising a sum of money for the service of the year rendered it unlikely that any very early payment could be made to the Bank, unless that body chose to afford the usual accommodation with respect to the loan, by which they would be enabled to repay themselves a very large sum. They had, however, declined that accommodation, and the benefits they would have derived from it. He had, notwithstanding, to state, that a very considerable sum had been paid, to the Bank of England; and arrangements had been formed, by the operation of which, the directors of the Bank were satisfied, that the sum of 5,000,000*l.* would be paid by the time pointed out by parliament. He therefore saw no reason for altering or encroaching on the system of arrangement which parliament had deemed it advisable to adopt with respect to the Bank.

THE NEW PENAL BILLS.] Mr. Brougham wished to ask the noble lord opposite, whether he meant to persist in the notice he had given last night, to move the order of the day on Thursday next, for the second reading of one of the bills which he had introduced? The reason why he asked this question was obvious; because, whichever of those bills came first to be discussed, the debate consequent on it would involve the discussion of the whole system to which that bill had reference. He would ask the noble lord, whether it was a decorous proceeding towards the country, after three days notice, and occupied as they would be that evening, in an important discussion, to call on them to consider a measure which went to effect a most extensive change in the constitution of the country—an alteration greater than ever was contemplated in the memory of man, by any one act of the legislature?

Lord Castlereagh said, he saw no reason for altering the proposition which the House had adopted last night, namely, to read the bill (which had been printed and handed round in connexion with the others) a second time on Thursday next. The learned gentleman had, in his opinion pushed the connexion between the bills too far. The sooner they came to the discussion of the principle, the sooner they would separate the bill from all the misrepresentation with which the learned gentleman seemed so anxious to surround it, during his short speech of last night. That speech made him extremely desirous to come to close quarters on the measure, in order that the country might understand what the bill really was to which the learned gentleman and those around him attributed such fearful qualities, and that it should be completely freed from the misrepresentations that had been thrown upon it.

Mr. Brougham said, as there was no question before the House, he certainly had not a right to answer the noble lord, but he might be permitted to observe, that his having studiously endeavoured to surround the measure with misrepresentation, as had been alleged, so far from being a reason for rapid and immature decision, afforded the best possible ground for a short delay. The bill itself could not be affected by his misrepresentations: it might be laid in its own natural "features" as the noble lord would call them, before the public; and its provisions might then be argued by the country and the House, with that deliberation and calmness for the exercise of which the delay of a few days was absolutely necessary. If the noble lord would not listen to him—if he would not consent to that delay—then he would say to the speaker and to the House, that, in common decency, some little time ought to be allowed for them to communicate with their constituents, whose most valuable and sacred, and until now, he would have said, inalienable rights and privileges, were about to be overturned by the system recommended by his majesty's ministers.

Lord Folkstone said, he had gone to the proper office and got a copy of the bill; and he defied any individual who had procured it, and who had turned over one or two of its pages, to say, that he could be at all prepared, considering the labour gentlemen were likely to go through that night, and the important discussion which was fixed for to-morrow, to decide on so important a measure on Thursday. It was impossible for any gentleman who examined the bill, and saw the numerous and complicated provisions which it contained, to be prepared to discuss it on Thursday, so as to justify his conduct to his constituents, for the vote he might give. Why should a bill of such importance be hurried through the House in this manner? Was it that the people should know nothing of it until it was passed? Were they so anxious to get rid of those meetings, that the bill, which restricted the assembling of the people, was to be hastened forward, so as to prevent the people from assembling to state their opinion with respect to the measure itself? If it were hurried forward with such precipitation, it could neither be understood in the country nor in that House. He hoped the noble lord would agree to the proposition of his learned friend, and postpone the second reading of the bill for a few days.

Mr. Bennet earnestly wished the noble lord to put off for a short time the discussion of a measure which he deliberately and advisedly considered to be subversive of the constitution. He was most anxious, as the bill would effect such a change in the constitution, that the House of Commons should be assembled together to meet it; and he now gave notice, that he would to-morrow move that the House be called over.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] Lord Althorp said, he could most unaffectedly assure the House, that he felt more oppressed on the present occasion, than he had ever before done when the House had honoured him by listening to what he had to offer to their notice. The importance of the question struck him as very great, even when he gave notice of his intended motion; but what had occurred since—he meant the introduction of those bills, the object of which the noble lord last night stated—had increased the importance of the question so extremely, that he felt unfeignedly sorry he was the person destined to bring forward this momentous subject. He wished very much that some person more able to impress its importance on the House than he was, had given notice of the motion; but feeling it to be his most imperious duty to draw the attention of the House to the subject, and having given notice that he would do so, he begged of the House to extend to him that indulgence, while he delivered his sentiments, which they had frequently done on former occasions. On all sides of the House it was admitted, that the state of the country was most alarming. Every gentleman on the other side of the House had allowed that great cause of alarm existed, though that alarm was traced to different sources. If, then, it was agreed by all, that the country was thus situated, surely it was necessary that the House, in passing the measures which they were called on to adopt, should proceed with the utmost deliberation, and take the greatest possible pains to satisfy themselves that what they did was not only not more than was necessary, but that the measures they pursued were exactly applicable to the danger which appeared to threaten the state. It was, therefore, necessary for the House to be clearly convinced, that the existing laws were not sufficient to meet the exigencies of the time; that measures of a coercive and vigorous nature were necessary to be resorted to; and, lastly, that the bills proposed by the noble lord were those which were exactly applicable to the dangers that were to be encountered and which they had reason to hope would check it. To enable them to come to this conclusion, it appeared to him, that every possible information should be laid before the House. He did not pretend to recollect precedents, but he believed such a question was never before brought under the consideration of the House, without full information being laid on their table, to enable them to understand correctly all the circumstances connected with the situation of the country.

There were only two grounds on which the House could agree to the measures now proposed—either a perfect confidence in his majesty's ministers, a decided conviction that they would propose nothing that was not proper; or that the papers laid before parliament gave the most full and complete information respecting the state of the country. Now, with respect to the first point, he thought no gentleman would argue that measures of this kind ought to be carried merely on the principle that confidence was due to his majesty's ministers. Therefore, he inferred, that the House, in agreeing to the adoption of severe measures, ought to be satisfied that the information contained in those papers afforded a full justification of their conduct. Alluding to the papers that had been laid on the table, he should state generally, the impression which they had made on his mind. They might be divided into two distinct classes—those that referred to the period preceding the 16th of August, and those that related to circumstances which occurred subsequently to that time. The statements contained in those papers showed, that in Lancashire the magistrates apprehended considerable danger before the 16th of August. But after the meeting, Mr. Spooner wrote word, that “he was perfectly satisfied the rising was not likely to take place in that part of the country.” Danger, therefore, was not then apprehended there. Lord Fitzwilliam, who was attending the assizes at York, wrote, “that there was no disposition to create a disturbance amongst the inhabitants of the West Riding of the county of York.” With respect to Lancashire, an alteration seemed to have taken place since the meeting of the 16th of August. Prior to that period it was said, that a system of training had been adopted, but no mention was made of arms. But after the meeting of the 16th of August, arms were alleged to have been prepared. Since the events of the 16th of August, symptoms of irritation were observable, it was stated, in different parts of the country. Meetings had taken place in Yorkshire and in Scotland, and a simultaneous meeting, for purposes which had not before been contemplated, was spoken of as fixed for the 1st of November. He would wish to call the attention of the House to this point, because he conceived that this also would form part of the examination which his motion would call for. It appeared, that the meeting of the 16th of August was assembled for the discussion of a particular question. There was no mention before that, that it was to be for an illegal purpose; but since then quite another character and account had been given of it. Now, he wished to impress this upon the consideration of the House, because it showed that there were chasms and defects in the information before them, which ought to be filled up, before they could well consider of, or agree to, the measures proposed by the noble lord. It would, indeed, in his opinion, be quite inconsistent with the duties of the House to pass any such measures, without the most deep and serious consideration; first, into the causes which were said to require them, and then into the necessity of the measures themselves. Disturbances were said to have taken place in Scotland: into these he would wish that inquiry should be made; for he again begged to remind the House that it would be impossible to provide any effectual remedy, unless the origin and nature of the disorders were precisely ascertained. The state of the county of Lancaster was alluded to, but it would not be sufficient that we should know what had occurred on the 16th of August, but also what had occurred previously to that time. Full and complete information was necessary in order that the proposed measures should not act merely as a palliative or a temporary, but should operate as an effectual and permanent remedy. The statements of the noble lord (Castlereagh) and of his colleagues would not be sufficient. The assertions of any honourable members could not be taken for facts in debate where the proof of those assertions was not given. The chief ground on which ministers went, was the letter of Mr. Hay, but this itself required much explanation; His majesty's ministers had since seen, and held conversations with that gentleman, and they were bound to explain what they had further heard upon the subject of the letter. Unless they did so, it was impossible for the House to form any correct judgment on it. Indeed, the statements of the noble lord (Castlereagh) were quite at variance, or at least very different from those which had been given by Mr. Hay. Mr. Hay stated in his letter, that the Riot act had been read, and the meeting dispersed. The noble lord opposite said, that the Riot act was read three times, and that one of the magistrates, in his attempt to read it, was knocked down and trampled on. Now, it was somewhat strange, that if this circumstance had occurred, it should not have been mentioned by Mr. Hay. Nothing could be more natural, than that he should have noticed this serious accident occurring to one of his brother magistrates. If then, such a difference arose between the statements of the noble lord and those of Mr. Hay, did it not show clearly the necessity of further information? The House, he contended, had a right to be informed of every thing which took place, not merely at the meeting of the 16th, but also what had occurred previously and subsequently to that period; for it was upon the whole of these matters that the measures of the noble lord were said to be founded. The House had at least a right to expect, that in forming their judgment upon those measures they should be put on the same footing with respect to information as the ministers themselves.

Another point respecting the meeting, which, in his opinion, the House should have explained, was the absence of the general of the district, sir John Byng, on the occasion. It was very generally said, and he believed it, that if sir John Byng had been present, the result of the meeting would not have been as fatal as it was. Why, then, was he not present? It would naturally be supposed that, as the commanding officer of that district, he should be at the post of danger. It was not, however, the case; but what was the cause? Why, the magistrates themselves acknowledge that sir John Byng was at Manchester on the 14th, and offered his personal assistance in case it should be found necessary; but the magistrates informed him that there was no danger, and that his attendance would not be required. Sir John Byng then said, that he would be within the reach of an express, and would attend if it should be deemed necessary. He was not, however, sent for. Now, if there was any blame to be attributed in this respect, it should be to the magistrates, who had declared the attendance of the gallant general unnecessary. At all events, the fact was one which showed a strong ground for farther inquiry, and it was, even if nothing else was concerned, due to the characters of all the parties, that such inquiry should be instituted.—

Another point to which he wished to draw the attention of the House was, that a great portion of the matter which had been laid before them was upon anonymous evidence. It might be necessary, he would not deny, that in some cases, where evidence was given of the state of disturbed districts, the names of the persons giving it should be concealed; but then, did it not look in this, and indeed in almost all cases, like the evidence of spies? Did it not seem as if some of the persons had made the evidence for the purpose of giving it? What was more natural under such circumstances than to believe that the persons who swore to the existence of pikes in several places, might have purchased them for the sake of giving information afterwards? At all events, was not anonymous testimony obtained under such circumstances to be viewed with suspicion? Indeed, it could not be otherwise, if the House recollected what had occurred on this subject two years ago. He would then put it to the House, whether they ought to pass the proposed measures on such evidence—whether they would let the matter rest on the prudence, the discretion, and integrity of such informants, as they were told gave this information, but of whom they knew nothing more than that it was said they gave it? He contended that such a proceeding would be calculated more to excite and increase, than to diminish the public alarm.

These were the reasons which occurred to him to show that a committee ought to be appointed to take the whole of the matters into consideration. One objection which he supposed would be urged against his proposition was, that it would occasion a very inconvenient delay; and another, that it would embrace an inquiry into the conduct of the magistrates at Manchester, which it was said would more properly come before another tribunal. To the first he might use the argumentum ad hominem, and say, that if the noble lord and his colleagues had known of those proceedings at Manchester and elsewhere before the 16th of August, why had they not called parliament together sooner? But this argument he did not mean to press, because if the House believed just grounds for interference to exist, they might fairly say, that the country should not suffer because the noble lord was to blame. He denied, however, that any inconvenience could arise on the principal measures proposed by a delay for inquiry. As to the measure which went to prevent military drillings, he would not argue. He saw in those drillings nothing of good and much of evil. With respect to the measure proposed for repressing them, therefore, he offered no opposition. But the other measures he could not consider in the same point of view. That which restricted the right of traverse to indictments under particular circumstances, could not operate until the next assizes. The delay, therefore, would not affect that. Then it was next proposed, that a power should be given to search for arms. Now, it did not appear, from any thing contained in the papers before the House, or from any thing which the noble lord opposite had said, that they had been accumulated in such numbers as to render a short delay of the measures respecting them dangerous. There might have been twenty or thirty pikes in the possession of individuals in particular places; but that, in his mind, was not sufficient to warrant the immediate passing of the proposed measure, without a strict inquiry. With respect to the suppression of meetings, he contended, that when magistrates were prepared to oppose their violence, if any, when it was seen that they had sufficient force to disperse the largest of them, it could not be supposed that any danger could result from a delay of the measures respecting them. It might or might not be necessary at other periods, to pass some of the proposed bills; but what he contended for was, that there could no danger arise at present from that kind of delay which would be necessary for the purposes of inquiry. In every state there might be some political evils, but when it was proposed to correct those evils, the measures by which that was to be effected should be seriously and maturely considered. As to the objection respecting the Manchester magistrates, he contended that it was not a fair one. He did not think that it had been properly brought against the amendment of his right hon. friend on a former evening; nor did he think it was of greater weight against the motion with which he should conclude. His motion, like the amendment to which he alluded, was made with a view to information upon those subjects in which the House were called to legislate. Those gentlemen who said that the country was in danger; that all law and authority were attempted to be trampled under foot; that every thing which we held dear in this life and sacred in the next, were brought into ridicule and contempt;—such gentlemen surely would not contend that inquiry as to our real situation should be retarded, because something might possibly come out against Mr. Norris or Mr. Hay. Why, if those gentlemen were innocent, nothing could come out which would affect them; and if guilty, it would not be contended that they ought to be screened from the consequences of their acts. He did not mean to prejudice the magistrates in any way, but he maintained that their conduct, whatever it might have been, ought not to be placed as a bar to inquiry upon such important questions as were before the House.

He had now briefly stated his reasons why an inquiry should take place into the state of the country. He had pressed the necessity of having full information on the subjects before the House, and had endeavoured to point out the defects in that which had already been given, and to answer the objections against having farther information. Perhaps what he had urged would not be sufficient, if the House had not heard the measures proposed by the noble lord—measures which he had listened to with astonishment and deep regret. He regretted that it was not in his power to express the feelings which the mention of such measures excited, but he conceived it dishonourable and disgraceful to sacrifice the rights and privileges of the people in a case of only temporary alarm. The noble lord concluded, amidst loud cheers, by moving, “That the Papers relative to the Internal State of the Country, presented to this House by command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, be referred to a Select Committee, to examine the matters thereof, and to report their observations thereupon to the House.”

Colonel Davies, in seconding the motion, expressed his regret at perceiving that his majesty's ministers anxiously seized upon the state of alarm into which the country had been temporarily thrown, in order to invade the rights and liberties of the people. He should deem himself unworthy of the confidence of his constituents, or of a seat in that House, if he did not stand forward and express his disapprobation. He fully agreed with an hon. friend of his, in expressing his surprise at the awful denunciation of the noble lord opposite. He was astonished to find the House called upon to adopt the severe measures proposed by that noble lord upon no other information than the garbled and imperfect statements contained in the papers which had been laid on the table.—Those statements were not sufficient to warrant the House in supporting the proposed measures. The papers in question afforded ample evidence in support of an observation made by an hon. baronet on a former evening, that if the law had been stretched beyond its proper limits, it was the fault of those whose duty it was to put it in execution. Were the House to shut their eyes on what was passing around them? were they to view with unconcern the demand made for a greater extension of power than was ever before vested in any ministers? It appeared from the papers before the House, that there was a design on the part of ministers to introduce despotism, and to trample on the liberties of the people. If there were any doubt on that point, the approval by the noble lord opposite of the principles laid down by the right hon. member for the university of Dublin was sufficient to remove it. That right hon. gentleman had urged, that if magistrates entertained a fear that the public peace was to be disturbed by the assemblage of large bodies of people, they had a right to disperse them, and if blood were shed in consequence of such a proceeding, the magistrates would be justified. This opinion was hailed with enthusiasm by the legal gentlemen on the other side of the House, and re-echoed with enthusiasm by the noble lord himself. The papers on the table were, in his opinion, an argument against, rather than in favour of, the measures of ministers. It appeared that government had been aware of the fact, that training had been carried on to a considerable extent—that they knew of large bodies having been assembled for this purpose in different places—that it was difficult for persons to pass about their ordinary business without being interrupted by these men—and yet no measures were taken to prevent such proceedings [Hear, hear!]. The papers were also evidence that arms were openly manufactured and disposed of in different districts, and yet no steps were taken by the magistrates, who were vested with the power, to prevent it. He was aware that such proceedings ought to be stopped; he felt, too, that the wild spirit which had gone abroad ought to be repressed; seeing that it

tended to demoralize the people. If the law was not strong enough to do this, he was willing to arm it with additional power—with power sufficient to crush disaffection wherever it appeared. But let the House examine the measures proposed as a remedy. He, for one, dissented from them, as he considered them calculated to subvert the constitution. But, as if these measures were insufficient to suppress disaffection, ministers called for an additional armed force! Let him, however, ask the House what it was which caused this discontent and disaffection? They could not conceal from themselves that an excessive load of taxation was the cause. This it was which caused the distress and misery which were to be found in all parts of the country. And, with this fact before their eyes, were the measures of the noble lord the best mode of redress? If the people complained of their sufferings, were they to be answered by military execution—if they remonstrated, were they to be told that their only answer should be the bayonet? It appeared that government having once drawn the sword, were determined to throw away the scabbard. If the manufacturing districts were in a state of rebellion, and were to be ruled with a rod of iron, how, he would ask, was such a system to be supported by military force? It was impossible to go on in such a manner without subverting the constitution. It was taxation—taxation unequalled in the annals of history—which reduced the country to this miserable situation. They had at present a revenue which was decreasing at the rate of five millions a year: though new taxes were added, still there was a decrease. Was this a system which could support measures of coercion? If ministers were desirous of relieving the wants of the country—if they showed themselves not inattentive to the feelings and distresses of the people, they would, instead of adding new taxes, practise economy and retrenchment in every branch of the public expenditure: but there never was a set of men less inclined to do this than the present ministry. He had a short time since occasion to look into the department of the military establishment, and he was sickened at heart to find the degree of extravagance which was carried on in all its branches. The expenses in that department were, now that we were in the fifth year of peace, double what they were in 1806. The salaries in the different offices were double what they had been at that period. This showed that there was something radically wrong in the present system. He did not wish to resort to the cant term of reform, but it was evident some revision was imperatively necessary. He had heard the state of this country compared to that of France prior to the revolution. At that period France laboured under the most arbitrary despotism, and the revolution was hailed as the dawn of freedom. If the French government had not been deaf to the warning voice of public opinion—if they had attended to the interests of the people, that dreadful scene of bloodshed which ensued would not have taken place, and the unfortunate monarch of that country would not have terminated his existence as he had done. Was this country to go on without being made wiser by experience, until the dreadful lesson was brought home to them. If ministers persevered in the measures which they had acted upon, then it required no great spirit of prophecy to foretell that it must end in a despotism. The hon. member concluded by giving his most cordial support to the motion of his noble friend.

Mr. Bathurst opposed the motion, and expressed his great regret at seeing the noble lord lending himself to such measures as those which he now advocated. It was with regret he saw those most respectable gentlemen who formed what was called the Opposition, pursuing their present course at a moment when the state of the country was such as to require the united efforts of the House to restore it to tranquillity. If the noble lord and his hon. friends conceived that by their present course they would conciliate the radicals, whom certainly they did not defend, but whose conduct they endeavoured to prevent the House from inquiring into—if they imagined that they would conciliate those men, they would, he thought, find themselves much mistaken. The House, he contended, stood pledged by the address, which was voted, to the opinion that those persons called radicals were wrong, and that their proceedings ought to be put down.—The right hon. gentleman here adverted to, and repeated several passages in the address and amendment, and contended, that by them, all parties in the House were pledged to give their aid, collectively and individually, to repress those practices which were complained of as disturbing the state of the country. It was admitted on the other side of the House, that a great degree of disaffection existed, for it was asked why had not ministers put down illegal meetings, drillings, &c. ? Now, if this state of the country was admitted (and it was proved by the testimony of magistrates and grand juries in more counties than one), upon what ground, he would ask, could those measures be opposed which only went to put down such proceedings ? The right hon. gentleman then took a review of the practices of the seditious, of the prevalence in many places of blasphemous and seditious doctrines, and described the danger which was likely to accrue to society by suffering them to remain unchecked. Was it, he asked, a time, when such things were admitted to exist, to stop measures calculated to suppress them, by calling for information which ministers could not properly give ? His majesty's ministers could not lay all the information they possessed before the House ; but the question was, whether they had not laid sufficient for the measures which were called for ? With respect to the Manchester proceedings, he maintained that they ought not to come before the House, because, as far as inquiry was necessary respecting the magistrates, it would be better carried on in a court of law. It was not pretended that all the information which ministers possessed on this subject was laid before the House, but a sufficient portion was given. The right hon. gentleman then observed, that the Riot act was first read by Mr. Ethelston, a second time by Mr. Sylvester, and would have been read at the hustings by Mr. Trafford, if the confusion had not prevented it. The reading of the Riot act was not, however, of that importance which hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to consider it : for though the provisions of the act were destined to apply to certain emergencies, they by no means did away with the provisions of the common law, which, when a riot actually had commenced, allowed the magistrates to disperse it before the expiration of the hour. It had been argued, but the argument had been well answered on a former occasion, that the House ought by all means to institute an inquiry into the conduct of those who called, of those who attended, and of those who put down the meeting. He allowed that an inquiry might be necessary, but then it ought to be conducted before the usual tribunals of the country, and in the usual manner in which other offences were investigated.—The noble lord had divided his subject into two parts, and had discussed separately the events which had occurred before, and those which had occurred after, the 16th of August. Now, he did not see what reason there was for marking that day so expressly, as the same system was in existence both before and after it, and was productive of the same alarm to the loyal inhabitants of Cheshire and Lancashire. The noble lord had also shut his eyes to the danger which arose from another quarter, and had almost argued that the people had no pikes, because the blacksmiths who made them had not been discovered and prosecuted. He had also said, that there had not been arming among the people till after the 16th of August : if that circumstance had been correct, it might have looked something like an argument, but unfortunately, it was sufficiently notorious that there had been arming before. The people had been taught to march in military array ; they had been instructed to wheel, to form in column, and to go through other military evolutions in large bodies : and, would any person say that, with arms in their hands, these men, though not capable of contending with regular forces, would not be excessively formidable ? For his own part, he believed that the object which they had in view was to plunder and destroy ; and in this belief he was confirmed by the declaration of more than one bench of magistrates, and one grand jury. True, it might be, that this was not the object of them all ; that their leaders might have one view, and their followers another ; but still, was it not clear, from their simultaneous meetings, that, if plunder was not their object, they intended to carry some grand political purpose ? What could that purpose be, except the total subversion of the government, and all the existing institutions of the country ? Their intention evidently was to intimidate the sovereign and the two Houses of Parliament into an acquiescence with their designs, by the display of their numerical power ; and, if that failed, to carry them into execution by the exertion of their physical force, or, in other words by force of arms. Could, then, the House ask to have a fuller exposure of the views of these infatuated men, than that which had been afforded to it by the papers now upon the table ? The noble lord had also wished to inquire why sir

John Byng had not been at Manchester on the 16th, personally to superintend the employment of the military. A sufficient answer to this point was, that sir John Byng had previously made all the necessary arrangements for such an occurrence, and had left the troops under the command of an officer in whom he could place implicit confidence. The noble lord had likewise confessed the dangers to which the country was at present exposed, and the House had pledged itself to find a remedy for them. Now, considering the state in which the nation was at present situated, the time which an inquiry into all these points would consume, would be so long as to make him vote against instituting it, especially if the remedy which the danger required was not, according to the noble lord, to be administered until the inquiry was concluded; though at the same time it was only fair that he should repeat his conviction, that such an inquiry ought not to be allowed, even though it would not continue for more than a single day. Indeed, he thought that the government, so notorious was the system now existing in the disturbed districts, might have said—"We will put a stop to it," without making any inquiry at all.—The noble lord had declared, that he was not satisfied with the statements which were now before the House; because the names of the persons (who, he ought to recollect, had made them on oath) were not given to the public. The reason why the names were concealed was, that if they were known, the lives of those who bore them would be placed in the most imminent hazard, even though they were brought up to London for the purpose of being examined: the names, however, of one or two of them were stated, and in all cases the names of the magistrates who had taken their depositions.—The noble lord had seemed to think that the county of Lancaster was the chief focus of all this disaffection and sedition, and had argued, that because the magistrates had dispersed the numerous meeting at Manchester with a small military force, more troops were not wanted; but, was it not probable, that as the reformers had been once dispersed by a few soldiers, indeed by not more than thirty or forty of the yeomanry, they would take care not to be so easily dispersed on a future occasion? This was rendered more than probable by what had occurred at a recent meeting at Burnley. There a large multitude had met, many of them armed with pistols, and most of them with staffs, in which a socket was made for the reception of a pike-head, which they likewise carried in their pockets. Now he would ask any hon. member, whether it was possible for any magistrate, without the assistance of a military force, to have put down this meeting, confessedly illegal, armed as those who attended it were, with pistols and with pikes? But were these all the facts which were at present before the House? Was there not the declaration of the constables at Manchester, stating their opinion regarding the inefficiency of their police? Was it possible that society, to say nothing of commerce and the ordinary transactions of life, could continue to exist, whilst such a horrible system remained in action? What would the hon. gentleman opposite say to the various attempts which had lately been made at assassination? Were they not aware that two public officers in the prosecution of their duty, had had pistols fired at them, and that at Manchester a constable had been absolutely stoned to death? Were they not aware that this method of intimidation had been extended from the manufacturing to other districts? Did they not know that attempts had been also made to assassinate the mayor of Newcastle? Could they believe that such endeavours to intimidate would not be extended, unless they were now checked? Was it a thing of little importance, that if any tradesman or publican exerted himself to preserve the public peace, not indeed as a yeomanry-man, but as a special constable, he was deprived of all custom, and found his business entirely ruined? There was, indeed, a case before the House which showed, in a strong light, the state of the kingdom—he was not now alluding to the meeting at Manchester, or to any of the meetings in Cheshire or Lancashire, but to the three distinct meetings which had been held at the same place near Leeds. There the magistrates had waited till some outrage had been committed. [Cheering from the Opposition.] He would give the hon. gentlemen the full weight which they wished to derive from this admission, and he would then ask them, whether it was either right or expedient that whenever a public meeting was called, the magistrates should be compelled to be upon the alert with their special constables, and to have no military force at hand to back them? And yet, what would now be the result, if this was not the case? The House might easily judge by referring to the papers which were placed before it; for it was in evidence, that at Glasgow it was nothing but the military that prevented an attack from being made upon the lives and property of the loyal inhabitants. Was it not well known (and he really thought that the public press had disgraced itself by inserting the speeches of those radical gentry), that public discussion had been held regarding the time when the people ought to rise, and that denunciations had been made of certain individuals for not following up the successes which they had achieved? When this was nothing more than a bare statement of facts, how could hon. gentlemen come forward and say, that the House was in want of farther information? The right hon. member then said, that he could wish the noble lord, or any of the friends who surrounded him, to explain what they meant by the term conciliation, which they were so much in the habit of using. A right hon. gentleman had, on a former night, spoken in most decided terms of reprobation of the agitators who were now disturbing the state, and had condemned with great eloquence the principles on which they acted. Now, he should be glad to know, whether the right hon. gentleman wished to conciliate by granting concession to their principles, or alleviation to their distress? If concession to their principles was the meaning which was to be put on conciliation, how much of his own principles would he give up to them? Would he advise the House to grant them, not indeed what they asked, but what they did not ask—moderate reform about which they professed themselves indifferent? If it were granted, did he think that it would satisfy them? Was he not, on the contrary, quite positive that they would say, “We have a right to more, and we will not rest till that right is fully granted to us; it is not sufficient that you have granted to Birmingham, to Leeds, to Sheffield, and the other large towns, the power of returning members to parliament, and that you have diffused the right of suffrage more generally through the counties—you must grant us all we demand, or never will we rest content and satisfied?” If this was true—and he maintained that it was—nobody could doubt that concession to their principles would be of no avail. Then, as to the alleviation of their distress: and here he could not help expressing his conviction that the disaffection which existed in the manufacturing districts was much greater than the distress; and that though distress might have originally enlisted many under the banners of disaffection, they would still remain disaffected when the distress was taken from them. If, however, the people were distressed, and the house intended, and was able, to conciliate them by relieving their distress, for God's sake let them set about it, as soon as ever the way was clearly and distinctly pointed out to them. He had to apologize to them for the length at which he had addressed them [Hear!] but he had been led to say as much as he had done, because the motion of the noble lord was calculated to paralyse the spirit which the House had so lately evinced. He had consequently felt it to be his duty to implore them to go into the consideration of the measures which had been proposed to them without instituting a previous inquiry. If they were too strong, they could be altered; or if they were incorrect in any of their minute details, they could hereafter be corrected. The House was bound to redeem the pledge which it had on a former evening given to the crown, it was bound to give instant vigour to the law, because that vigour was calculated to prevent the employment of a military force; but till that law received that vigour, nothing else but a military force could preserve the tranquillity of the country. He had not said anything upon the seditious and blasphemous publications which had lately emanated from the press, because the noble lord had not disputed the existence of them, and because the House appeared sensible of the general danger arising from them. He concluded by again conjuring the House to adopt the measures of vigour which had been proposed to them, and by reminding it, that nobody could justly complain against them, except those who expected to suffer by their operation.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that the motion of the noble lord was for the reference of certain papers to a select committee, and that if any thing had been wanting to convince him of the necessity of such a measure, it had been just supplied by the speech of the right hon. gentleman opposite. He had expressed his surprise at the conduct of those gentlemen whom he denominated the Opposition, and had asserted that the country would participate in it; but he would take the liberty to inform the right hon. gentleman, that the country now looked up to the opposition, with the utmost confidence, on account of the resistance which they had given to the late and the present most mischievous acts of government. That resistance was not made with any view of giving any support or countenance to the radicals as the Whigs had as little cause to like the radicals as they had to admire the ministers. The reform which the radicals sought to obtain was, what would lead to the subversion of the constitution, for it was annual parliaments, universal suffrage and election by ballot; but would any body say that a single individual could be found to advocate such sentiments on the bench where he was sitting? The hon. baronet then proceeded to argue, that the call for inquiry which had been heard in every quarter of the kingdom, made it an imperative duty upon the House to institute it, and ridiculed the assertion that it was already making in the courts of law, when the only single point which was before them was Hunt's trial. He also inferred the peaceable disposition of the people in the neighbourhood of Manchester, and their willingness to submit to the constituted authorities of the country, from their not attending the meeting convened for the 9th of August, because the magistrates had declared it to be illegal; and asked, if the meeting of the 16th was so manifestly illegal as it was now contended, why the magistrates had not issued, as they had done regarding the intended meeting of the 9th, a proclamation declaring its illegality. The peaceful demeanour and willing obedience to the laws which they had then exhibited, was such as would lead him to oppose the vigorous measures recommended to the House, until he was convinced of their necessity by the granting of an inquiry. That inquiry was rendered more particularly necessary by the precipitate vote of thanks which had been given to the magistracy, and which was not to be justified by any of the precedents which ministers had adduced to defend it. The documents on which they had been called to enact severe and coercive measures, proved that the disaffection was only local and temporary. It was therefore too much to ask of the House, because dissatisfaction, and, for the sake of argument he would say, disaffection prevailed in certain districts, to place the whole country out of the pale of the law, and to subject all the inhabitants of England to a system of persecution. [Loud cries of "hear."] He repeated, to a system of persecution—for to what else could these new enactments possibly lead? The hon. baronet then alluded to Mr. Bathurst's declaration that he did not know what meaning his noble friend attached to the word "conciliation." He would tell him, though he could not do so without expressing a wish that conciliation was a little more in the mouths and hearts of his majesty's ministers, as they would find it better calculated to preserve the peace of the country, than all the coercive measures which they had latterly adopted. Conciliation, then, was to show the nation, that, while they made laws to coerce the disaffected, they would exhibit every readiness to receive the petition and redress the just grievances of the people—that they would use every endeavour to relieve their distress, and alleviate their burthens—that they sympathised in all their woes, wants, and calamities—and last, though not least, that they were willing to take the subject of parliamentary reform into immediate consideration. [A laugh from a member on the ministerial benches]. Some persons might think the latter subject of little importance; but he could assure them, that during the last twelve months reform had made such an impression upon the middling classes of society, that not all the arguments of the gentlemen opposite, nor all the eloquence of a right hon. member of the cabinet, who was generally very eloquent upon that topic, would be able to remove it, unless indeed ministers would show by their future, what they had not shown by their past conduct, that reform was not so necessary as had hitherto been supposed.

Mr. Long Wellesley said, he had heard with the sincerest regret a violence of language on the other side which before that time he had but seldom been under the painful necessity of attending to. He did think, that the noble mover had pledged himself to sentiments not quite in unison with those he had heard from him on former occasions. He adverted to the former arguments of the Opposition against committees of inquiry, and wondered how they could now adopt the entirely opposite course, of recommending what they had hitherto so strenuously objected to.

One right hon. gentleman carried his opinion so far, that on the proposal for a committee of finance last session, he had declared it was no better than a packed jury, and could produce no desirable result. The hon. gentleman went on to show, that no advantage could arise from agreeing to the motion, nor would it allay the ferment in the country. The documents laid before them proved this plain fact, and it was supported by every legal and other authority which had been called on to deliver an opinion, that an alarming state of disaffection existed. This was the spontaneous and unanimous opinion of all the honourable men, in whatever capacity, called upon to inquire into the situation of the country. They therefore stood in need of no committee to ascertain this fact. It seemed to him that gentlemen opposite had abandoned the main point at issue; at least he was sure it was so considered by all the magistrates with whom he was in the habit of acting, who thought that the great question for the House to decide was, whether the Manchester meeting was legal or illegal, and especially which character the conduct of the magistrates bore. But as they had blinked these subjects, he was inclined very much to doubt the pretensions set up by the gentlemen on the other side to a superior knowledge of the public opinion. If they had possessed this, they would have come fairly forward, and not have yielded, as they had done, [the principal matters at issue. The hon. gentleman then went into the assertions which had first appeared in the public newspapers, and were re-echoed by the Opposition, and contended, that if these had been true, there would have been much greater inflammation than there really was. An hon. baronet the member for Southampton, had detailed to the House the hair-breadth escape with his life of a reverend divine, who had been prompted, by a very pardonable curiosity to see Hunt, to attend that meeting; whilst another hon. baronet had descanted on the atrocity of the attempt made by the yeomanry to surround with a cordon of troops the hustings, on which that agitator with others stood. A third member had endeavoured to raise an argument upon the throwing out a bill of indictment against one of the military, as having been thrown out through a technical informality. The House had not betrayed any serious commiseration for the case of the curious friend of the hon. Baronet, nor suffered itself to be shocked at the atrocity of surrounding these inflamers of the public mind, and the assertion had been very satisfactorily contradicted and disproved by a noble lord, the son of a Whig lord lieutenant that this indictment had not been thrown out for informality, but for want of sufficient matter alleged. Hon. gentlemen could not but see that no proposition was less likely to terminate in any beneficial result than that of rendering that House, composed of so many members, and incapable of examining witnesses on oath, a court for the exercise of any thing resembling judicial inquiry. No place could be so well adapted for that species of inquiry, in his mind as courts of law, where the witnesses gave their testimony and the jury its verdict upon oath. He most sincerely felt that there was no circumstance which could tend so directly to keep up the agitation and alarm which now existed throughout the country, as a display of any hesitation on the part of the House to adopt some well defined and salutary restrictive measures; as its natural result would be to convince the public that parliament was not as yet aware of the spirit which was abroad, or the dangerous designs of the disaffected.

Mr. Douglas Kinnaird rose at the same moment with several members, but the courtesy of the House gave the precedence to the hon. gentleman as a new member. He said he was anxious to raise his voice that night in behalf of the suffering people of this country, while yet they had a constitution; for after that night, he feared, they would be without the shelter of such a blessing. He was little acquainted with the forms of the House, but he thought, that when a communication like that lately made from the throne came under their consideration, it ought to be discussed in the most formal manner, and with that temper and deliberation which would at once show the best regard for the Crown, and become the character of the representatives of the people. He felt that the ministers of the Crown were in a most responsible situation—his alarm at the existing state of affairs was great, and increased it must be, if, by the event of this night, he was driven to the melancholy conclusion, that prejudice and passion got the better of the judgment of the House of Commons, and that they were prepared to take for granted the assertion of ministers as to the state of the country, though that assertion was flatly contradicted by a variety of evidence. He felt the utmost pain at hearing a sweeping charge of sedition and impiety levelled against the great mass of the people of England. From the best authorities the House knew that the people were suffering under the weight of the severest distress; it was singular, then, to think that instead of seeking the means to remove this distress, they should at once plunge into the abyss of impiety, and endeavour to subvert the whole moral order of social life. He could never believe the people capable of such fatal and useless misconduct, and he was the less inclined to believe it, now that he saw the proposition utterly untenable from the evidence in the papers laid before the House. On the part of the people of England, therefore, he protested against those fearful accusations. It was singular that if the people, as had been stated, were ready for plunder, and only wanted the opportunity of carrying their intentions into effect, the gentlemen of the country should leave their homes, around which, if the danger were real, they would assemble their friends and tenants, to save their families and property from ruin and devastation. The hon. member then proceeded to enforce his opinion, that no such danger was apprehended, by alluding to the earl of Derby's inability, according to his letter to lord Sidmouth, to arm a battalion of yeomanry from the gentry of the county, even though the letter was dated one month after the occurrence at Manchester. He had every reason for thinking that much exaggeration prevailed respecting the designs of the people, even where the highest irritation prevailed. Pikes had been spoken of, but on authority that he thought questionable, because it was anonymous. He would presume to suggest to ministers the adoption of conciliatory rather than coercive measures, and to appease rather than exasperate the people by sowing mutual distrust among the different classes of society. The people, he believed, held together, and relied much on each other's support at the present crisis—[Hear, hear! from the ministerial benches].—Gentlemen might cheer, but were the people less likely to confide in each other when they were placed out of the pale of the law? He much feared that ministers relied too much on spies, and had created a system which was calculated to delude them. On a former occasion they had been told that a dreadful toast had been given in a company of the disaffected. Dreadful indeed it was—"May the last of kings be strangled with the entrails of the last of priests"—and yet it ultimately appeared that this toast was given by Castles the spy, and received with disgust by the company upon whom it was obtruded. This was the spy who was decked out in good clothes, and produced in a court of justice in the hope of his imposing upon a jury. The hon. member then commented upon lord Castlereagh's speech in support of the intended measures—a speech which was well described as touching less upon the privileges that the new bills meant to take away, than upon those which they left. The noble lord had rather unfairly attacked the female reformers when he described their political interference as unprecedented in the history of this country. Did not the noble lord know that during the elections for Westminster the ladies were always prominent—and that even in the last election a ladies committee had actually been formed in favour of a particular candidate? Petitions had frequently been presented to that House from ladies, and duly answered by parliament. Lord Clarendon described the circumstance of a petition being presented to the House of Commons by five thousand of the wives of the citizens of London, Southwark, and the adjoining suburbs, and couched in very remarkable words. The petitioners addressed the House in behalf of their husbands, who were taken from them and imprisoned, and their estates seized in the most arbitrary manner. They prayed to be eased of their grievances, and protested in their frail condition. These females, in emphatic words, exclaimed, "See our husbands imprisoned from us, our children dashed against the stones, and our infants blood flowing in the streets." This petition was answered by Mr. Pym—the females pressed up the stairs of the House, and as they were importunate, the trained bands were at length called out and ordered to fire upon them, which they did, and the women, in the words of the historian, nothing daunted, cried out, "Peace, peace!" He hoped, by showing this precedent, and alluding to others, he had divested the noble lord's speech of any importance which attached to it from his observations respecting the novelty of the acts of the female reformers. He was ready to admit, that the state of the country was in many parts alarming, but the evil he feared would be aggravated by coercive measures: a relaxation from taxation would alone allay the irritation which unfortunately prevailed among the labouring classes. On the subject of parliamentary reform many opinions might prevail, without the holders of them being liable to any imputation of criminality. The duke of Richmond's plan of reform had received the sanction of Mr. Sheridan, and though Mr. Fox did not go the same length of supporting it, he yet admitted it to be the ground-work of a better system than the then existing one. There was certainly a prevailing error, that only one mode of reform ought to be adopted; though he might dissent from such an opinion, he yet saw nothing criminal in those who held it, nor any reason why they should be held out as seditious and disaffected to the country; and he also thought that although the people put their claims forth in a certain shape, it was by no means a corollary that they would be satisfied with less than they asked. If they saw a disposition to concede, there was no doubt they would not be inflexible in their demands. The hon. member quoted, in support of this opinion, a resolution passed at one of the late popular meetings, which expressly called called upon the higher orders to join the lower, and avowed that an alienation of the rich from the poor would be the ruin of both. The hon. member concluded by earnestly conjuring the House to adopt a system of conciliation as the mode best calculated to allay the existing ferment among the people, and most consonant to the feelings of humanity and justice.

Lord Lascelles rose to state a circumstance which had been communicated to him by general Byng, to show the first intention of the magistrates at Manchester respecting the intended meeting of the 9th of August. The general had called upon the Magistrates when that meeting was announced, to inquire if they wanted his assistance or that of the military for the occasion: The magistrates answered, that they did not apprehend any danger, and would not require the proffered aid. The general apprised them, that he would remain in his own house, and not quit the immediate neighbourhood, until after the meeting of the 16th; in order that the magistrates should, if necessary, have an opportunity of sending for him. Now no message came to the general, and the fair conclusion was, that the magistrates had no intention of dispersing the meeting until the morning of the day when they saw the entrance of the concourse of people into Manchester, and their numbers and nature. So much for the general intentions of the magistrates prior to the meeting. The present question was, however, whether the House could enter into the consideration of ulterior measures without a select committee. Of the Manchester transactions, and the acts that occurred on the 16th of August; he knew nothing. [Hear, hear! from the Opposition benches.] When he said this, he begged not to be understood as condemning them, he meant to pronounce no opinion whatever. He was ready to believe, that the origin of the disorganization in the country was in the distresses of the people.—When parliament last broke up, the manufacturing part of the community were in a state of unexampled distress. Advantage was taken of their situation by designing men, and the idle people attracted by the force of novelty from one meeting to another, were unfortunately led, step by step, to the habit of listening to the doctrines of itinerant orators, who gave them neither rest nor repose.—What he most lamented was, that among those deluded characters there were many honest well-meaning men, who were artfully drawn into the schemes of others, and seduced into the sacrifice of their characters and their safety. Such men were, he knew, not ripe for rebellion; though he knew there were others of a different description, and who formed an immense class in the scale, who were ripe for insurrection. A sort of infatuation appeared to prevail, and there was no chance of ever getting rid of the difficulty so long as itinerant orators were suffered to perambulate distant parts of the country, and excite that idle curiosity which every one acquainted with the manufacturing districts must know prevailed to an extraordinary degree. If this system was suffered to continue, the manufactures of the country would be rooted out—and the wretched population who now complained would consequently become the first victims. He was willing to admit that even if the proposed laws were enacted, still a number of heavy privations must remain to be endured by the people. Though their trade must revive, and though they must always have an ample portion in the mercantile traffic of Europe, still he feared that a number would remain unemployed, or at best but inadequately paid for their labour. It therefore required all the calmness and energy of the country to enable the people to work up against their difficulties, and to meet them in the manner which was best calculated to retrieve their situation. He denied that ministers had grounded their proposed measures on the general disaffection of the people; on the contrary, they had declared them necessary for the protection of the sound and loyal part of the community. A distemper had certainly grown in the state, which must be eradicated or else it would infect the whole of the community. It was agreed on all sides that something must be done to prevent the growth of disaffection and impiety. When this admission was generally made, he lamented that the gentlemen opposite should confine their views to one side alone of the question. With regard to what had been said by the hon. gentleman who last addressed them, he could not agree with him, that they were called upon to legislate merely against impiety and sedition. They were called upon to protect the sound, the honest, and the laborious,—and not to allow a distemper to spread which would destroy them all.—Were they to sit still while mischief did its work?—No. Something ought to be done. He did not pretend to define what that should be, and it was a fair proceeding to discuss the measures proposed and examine if they were calculated to effect what was desired. But he could not help lamenting the tone adopted by the gentlemen on the other side—a tone entirely coinciding with one view of the subject, presuming on the Manchester business, according to strong prejudices which they seemed early to have imbibed, and inflaming their minds by looking only at the bearings of the question as it favoured their inclination. It was thus that the measures offered to the House came to be characterized as harsh and oppressive; as if none but those whom these measures affected deserved their care—as if the peaceable and industrious were nothing, and the licentious and discontented every thing.—Alluding to the comment that had been made on lord Derby's letter, and the non-filling up of the regiment within a month after, his lordship observed, that this had also happened in other places, but it was not because great alarm was not felt, but from other causes. What he most lamented in the present dangerous times (dangerous they were if tampered with) was any disposition to see one side of the case only, as, if such a course was persevered in, he greatly feared the consequences would be such as were not intended by those pursuing that course. One of the principal means employed for the introduction of dangerous principles into the minds of the rising generation was, the establishment of schools, in which children were instructed in impiety, and brought up with a total disregard of religion. Another feature in the progress of corruption and disaffection in the country, was seen in the Union Societies, which were in plentiful existence in every populous town in the kingdom. He himself had heard it lamented by some of the leading members of these societies, that the gentlemen of the neighbourhood would not join their body and enter into their views. And what was the object of these societies? They laid claim, as a right, to nothing less than universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and election by ballot! To reprove such ignorance would be no simple matter. It was to the poisonous sources from whence they derived these notions, that the remedy must be directed. It would be almost incredible to those who had not been witnesses of the fact, the pains that were taken, and the means that were put in practice, to circulate irreligious tracts and other publications, which were of a nature equally deserving of being proscribed. There was a regular system of carrying them into the houses of persons who otherwise could never have read them. It thus happened, that the labourer, after returning from his daily work, would set about, and read from beginning to end, these tracts; and this he would do day after day, till he actually had them by heart, and to this was to be attributed that clear explanation on these subjects, which excited the surprise of many who had been in situations to be brought in contact with them. He thought a line might be drawn, and he hoped prudent men would draw a line, between the disaffected demagogues and the persons who listened to them through curiosity.—But he did not think it prudent, in the present state of the public mind, to use any concession. He thought, if the unanimous opinion of the House was, that the people should be allayed by endeavouring to show them the delusion under which they laboured, it would have a great effect on their conduct.—Every one knew, that these men were deluded, to the ruin of themselves and families. The proper course for the House to adopt was, to express an honest indignation at the conduct of those persons who sat the people in commotion. He would conclude by saying, that any attempt to support the errors of the people would be productive of ruin to themselves, and of injury to their families.

Mr. Bennett, of Wiltshire, rose with considerable diffidence to offer his opinion to the House. He had never had the honour of addressing it before; but, although he had always considered that it contained a great majority of the wisdom and talent of the country, yet he conceived it to be his paramount duty not to be silent, if, by the exertion of his small voice, he thought he could advance any thing for the interests of his country. He had listened, with great attention, to the arguments which had been used in the course of the several nights debate on this occasion, and his conviction was, that a committee should be formed on the papers at present before the House, before it passed such strong restrictive measures as had been proposed to them. He begged of the House to consider that the measures of restriction contemplated, applied to the whole country, whereas the seditious turbulence which originally called for them was confined to only a few districts. He would give full credit to all that appeared from the papers on the table; but he conceived the House was asked to go a great length, when they were called upon to agree to coercive measures without any other information. If disorders existed in some parts of the kingdom, should the House be called upon to agree to measures which would extend to the entire kingdom? He would compare the House, if it so acted, to a physician, who applied a remedy without knowing the cause of the disorder. He believed the causes of the present discontents might be attributed to the opinion which the people entertained, that their wishes were despised, that their petitions for reform were not listened to. To these causes one part of the disaffection might be attributed. But the distress of the productive classes was a more powerful cause. Every person knew that the people were all but starving, and that starving people were the readiest to receive the poison of these mountebank orators. He would say there was not a county in England more attached to the constitution, and more opposed to the mountebank orators, than the county which he represented. Instead of passing coercive measures, the government ought to devise means of procuring food for the people. He felt convinced that some further inquiry was absolutely necessary, before such restrictions on the liberty of the country as had been proposed, could be honestly sanctioned.

Lord Milton said, that although there was nothing in the early part of his noble friend (lord Lascelles') speech, in which he did not agree, yet he thought his noble friend had fallen into the error of which he had accused others, of viewing only one side of the subject, as he was prepared, not only to vote against the motion, but to vote for all the bills which had been brought in. The vote which was now proposed to the House comprehended the events at Manchester, events which, of all that he remembered, were the most unfortunate, and called the most loudly for parliamentary interference. Much obloquy had been cast on himself and his friends for their conduct with relation to these transactions. If they had not felt that the constitution was at stake, no earthly consideration would have induced them to interfere. It was not affection for the leaders of the Manchester meeting, or its objects—it was not even sympathy for the blood that was shed, but a conviction that by the conduct of the yeomanry, sanctioned as it was by his majesty's ministers, rights the most important had been called in question. It certainly did make a difference whether the meeting was legal or illegal. If it was illegal it was to be dispersed according to law. He did not say, that if force had been used by the meeting, it might not have been met by force, but it remained to be proved that any violence originated from the people. He called to the recollection of the House the letter of Mr. Hay, written on the eve of the transaction, which confirmed all the suspicions he had entertained. The ministers indeed had said, that this letter was not a fair and full account, but that they were enabled to give it out with other information which explained the matter to their satisfaction, though they had taken care not to communicate it to the House and the country. Mr. Hay says, that "while the cavalry was forming, the most marked defiance of them was acted by the reforming part of the mob." From this two things appeared, first, that all the mob was not of one description, and in the next place, that the marked defiance was all that the mob could be charged with—which was something very separate from what followed. It was in fact as manifest from Mr. Hay's letter as negative proof could be, that there was no attack on the side of the people. They had been told indeed in that House, that the Riot act was read by Mr. Silvester, who was trampled under foot, and by Mr. Ethelston, from a window; but why was not the proof laid before them? Why were they to accept as evidence of this the word of a minister? That the yeomanry originated the violence seemed to him evident, but there was no proof that they did so by order of the magistrates. In following Nadin, the yeomanry pursued the orders of the magistrates; but in their subsequent conduct there was no evidence that they acted under command. "In the mean time," says Mr. Hay, "the Riot act was read, and the mob was completely dispersed, but not without very serious and lamentable effects." Let them only look how important it was to Mr. Hay's case for him to say (if he had been able to say it), that the yeomanry had been previously attacked; but not a word was there of this. He had conceived that he should have found more friends to an inquiry into these transactions in the House. At York he imagined that gentlemen of both parties pledged themselves to demand an inquiry; and he could not help thinking that they must still feel awkward under their implied pledges. They were now told of an inquiry in courts of law. But, when all the trials now pending in the courts, Mr. Hunt's, Mr. Owen's, and even the information against an hon. baronet (sir F. Burdett) were decided, the conduct of the yeomanry and magistrates would not have been subjected to any investigation, and we should still be told, that the magistrates were most anxious for inquiry. An hon. gentleman, the member for Dover, had said, that the magistrates were anxious for inquiry, but nothing satisfactory, it was said, could proceed from an inquiry before a committee up stairs. He differed with those who said so. Would not an inquiry by such a committee lay grounds for a subsequent and solemn inquiry, if such should be deemed necessary? If, on the other hand, the committee found that the conduct of the magistrates did not demand an inquiry, they would state that fact to the House; and such declaration from such a committee would have great weight with the country. That inquiry, he thought, was due to public feeling as well as to public justice; the more so when he considered the nature of those measures which were last night introduced by the noble lord—measures which, in his mind, were sufficient to abolish the constitution. He agreed with an hon. gentleman who had that night addressed the House for the first time, that if those measures were made the permanent law of the land, it was impossible that public liberty should survive. Those measures, it appeared, were intended not merely to put down what were called dangerous opinions in this country, but others—they were not intended for England alone, but for other countries—for Germany, for Italy, and for France. He confessed he felt alarmed for the liberties of England, when he saw an endeavour made to shape her constitution and her laws to the views of foreign governments—of crowned heads, who ruled their subjects by other maxims than those of liberty—of Prussia, who promised a constitution to her people, and then broke that promise in the hour of security, with the same facility with which it was made in the hour of need—of Russia, who governed with an absolute and unresisting sway—of Spain, for whose purposes an act was brought in last session, prohibiting the people of this country from interfering in the contest between her and the people of her transatlantic dominions—dominions which she had forfeited by misrule and oppression. He trusted that there was a spirit remaining in England, and that she could not be governed by the maxims of foreign states. This consideration, however, seemed to escape the attention of ministers, and they brought forward measures which filled him with the most serious apprehensions for the liberties of his country. He differed from his noble friend (lord Lascelles) with regard to the sources of our danger, and was of opinion that it rather menaced the people, than emanated from them. Referring to the affair at Manchester, and considering the conduct of the magistrates on that occasion, with regard to its previous and subsequent effect upon the transactions of that period, he need only allude to Leeds, a place where there had been already several meetings held, each less numerous than the preceding. Then came the Manchester meeting of the 16th of August, which was followed by a variety of others in different parts of England, all of them then increasing in number tenfold. It was not by riding through a body of men, or mowing them down by soldiery, while they were assembled at a meeting of this character, that the people of England were to be subdued, but by means and measures of a more lenient and conciliatory character. His lordship proceeded to urge the necessity of a mild and temperate consideration of the condition and objects of the people, remarking, that the character of the House had been misrepresented to them, and that it should be their endeavour, therefore, to ensure the people's affections. He trusted that the House would listen to their petitions with attention; that it would patiently listen to their grievances; and even when they should prove unreasonable, that it would not notice the moody manner in which they might be presented; but that it would consider the privations and distresses under which they had been conceived. He would venture to hope even, that when they entertained the most wild and visionary theories, the House would not insult them by telling them that they were so, but would rather bear with all the faults of those who had had so much less education than hon. gentlemen themselves, and who by consequence had so little knowledge to guide and direct their conduct by. If hon. members viewed the important subject of an inquiry (and none more important could occur) as it regarded the magistrates alone, they neglected the more important question of the rights of the subject. Would they, when they saw the blood which had been spilt upon this disastrous occasion, the lives which had been sacrificed, the misfortunes which had occurred, overlook the more important fact, in their regard for a matter of less moment? Yet, when a parliamentary inquiry was asked for into the causes of these melancholy events, they said, "No; for we must support the character of the magistrates of Manchester." It was surely a most curious course to pursue, for the attainment of such an object, to refuse the inquiry demanded.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, he had no doubt but that the part taken by his noble friend and his noble father, was dictated by the purest motives of public duty, and the warmest and most honourable anxiety for the good of their country, but he was prepared to show that they were mistaken. He would state to the House exactly what had taken place between him and his noble friend respecting the meeting at York, and he would show distinctly that no pledge was given by him or by his noble friend (lord Lascelles) which could bind them to vote for a parliamentary inquiry. Here the hon. gentleman went into a detailed account of what had taken place between himself and lord Milton before the meeting at York, and of the proceedings at that meeting. He said that the object of himself and his friends was, to exclude persons from that meeting who went about deluding the people, and to assemble the rank and wealth of the county; for that purpose he was willing to agree to join in an address for the calling of parliament, provided his noble friend opposite would concede to him another point, reserving to himself the right of expressing the opinion which he entertained that if an inquiry should be instituted, it ought to be instituted in a court of law, before a jury of twelve men. He had said to his noble friend, that he was willing to give up his opinion on one point, if his noble friend would give up his on another. That having been refused, by what right was he called on to stand to any concession he might, for the sake of the country have been willing to have made. The hon. member proceeded to describe the state of the meeting, the conduct of individuals who attended it, the approach of mobs with drums and flags, upon one of which the words "Hunt for ever" stared him and his noble friend in the face. If he had given any specific pledge, he was willing to stand by it—nothing would induce him to violate it; but no pledge of the kind was given by him. With regard to the bills introduced by the noble lord (Castlereagh), the state of the country at present required some laws of their description. He did not say that conciliatory modes should be abandoned, but he felt at the same time that it was necessary to oppose the spirit which was abroad, and which spirit was opposed to the peace and the prosperity of the community.

Mr. Denman felt himself called on to explain the opinion he had lately expressed on a particular occasion. As an humble individual, he had no pretensions to high influence as a political authority in that House; but he felt that he was a member of the House of Commons, and thought he claimed some pretensions to legal authority, from the profession to which he had the honour to belong. A noble lord, he understood, on a very recent occasion, and, in his absence, had done him the honour to say, that he, as a lawyer, would not state in his place in that House the opinion which, as a lawyer, he had expressed in another place. But he could assure that noble lord, that he would not state an opinion here or elsewhere that he did not entertain. A right hon. and learned gentleman, who spoke last night, powerfully as to his eloquence, but whom he did not consider as a good law authority, had asserted, that by the law of the land, the magistrates were warranted in putting down, as they did, the meeting at Manchester, as being a riotous one even from its numbers. A good law authority, in this case, must be founded upon an intimate knowledge of the statutes and of the common law of the land; and from all the knowledge he could derive through a laborious intimacy with those laws, in the course of his professional experience, he must say that the principle laid down by that right hon. and learned gentleman was most dangerous. He had been charged with holding opinions in his professional capacity to which he did not agree; and he expected to be asked if such were his opinions. But it was not fair to consider persons who did not express their opinions as assenting to those of an opposite nature. Many opinions had been expressed last night in favour of the proceedings which took place at Manchester, which opinions he sincerely deplored, and he must say, that upon that subject he entertained an opinion perfectly different. It had been supposed, that he had stated the meeting at Manchester on the 16th of August to be an illegal meeting; but he now begged leave to say, he had expressed no such opinion. The point in question was, whether the meeting was or was not lawfully dispersed? From all that he had learned on the subject his opinion was, that the persons met there were not lawfully dispersed. He thought the meeting was legally assembled, that it did not appear they had done any thing to warrant the imputation of riot, previously to the attack made on them by the yeomanry, and he thought the manner in which they were dispersed was a fatal blow to the constitution of this country, from which he feared it would never recover; more especially when followed by the repeated blows which the bills now in their progress would inflict. The meeting, he would say, was legally assembled, but the manner of its dispersion was wholly unlawful. The people of the town were legally convened to discuss the grievances under which they considered themselves suffering, and to petition for redress, and therefore they did no more in this instance than they were entitled to do as Englishmen by the laws and constitution of their country. But the people came from a distance there in great numbers, marshalled in columns and military array, and such was the statement in the dispatches of Mr. Hay. How far those persons who came from a distance used any riotous conduct he knew not; if, however, they had done so, this was only in degree, and was not to be charged upon the inhabitants of the town quietly met. But if such persons made use of any threatening language to persons as they came along the road, this was but the act of a few, and could not justly be charged upon a whole multitude. But if such persons made use of any threats of injury to the residents in the town, he thought their conduct was riotous, and that they would incur all the liabilities to which by law they were exposed. But if the magistrates had on the morning of that day used their authority, and the means in their power to prevent those persons from passing through the town, they would have done a most acceptable service to their town. But if the magistrates suffered those persons to advance into the town, he could not see why the people of Manchester were to be prevented from meeting, or how the march of those offenders through the town should prevent the townsmen from assembling peaceably to discuss their own grievances and petition for redress. Why, then, if those strangers only were guilty of riotous conduct, and the townsmen were conducting themselves peaceably, he would contend that they were guilty of no offence, and that there must be a considerable difference between the cases of both. When Hunt came on the hustings with his flags and banners, the magistrates, from what they had heard, issued their warrant to take him up, and prevent him from inflaming the popular mind by his speeches. He had no hesitation in saying, that the conduct of itinerant orators of this description, who went about from place to place to stir up, by their inflammatory harangues, the bad passions of the common people, deserved the contempt and detestation of every good man; but when he was told that nothing but coercive measures, such as those now proposed, could reclaim the people to a sense of their duty, he trembled for the result. He was convinced, that however erroneous the temporary irritation of the popular mind might be at this present crisis, arising from a variety of causes, there was still in the great mass of the people of this country, an ardent feeling of loyalty to the throne, and attachment to the laws and constitution, which left no just fears for danger to either; and that the best and readiest mode of putting down the turbulent spirit which had for some time prevailed, was to put down those itinerant seditious demagogues who went about to disturb the country. This he said merely en passant. But with respect to the multitude assembled at Manchester on the 16th of August, he would say their motives and dispositions were as numerous and different as their persons: and while some might come to this meeting with dispositions to high treason, there must be many others whose views were perfectly innocent. But when it was said that their object was revolution and plunder, he thought it was a most harsh imputation against so numerous an assemblage of the people of England, whose conduct showed not the least disposition to riot or disorder. It was a cruel case thus to traduce the character of the common people of this country, who deserved the highest praise for the respect they had shown to the property of their neighbours under all the cutting privations they had endured for years past from the pressure of the times. He did not mean to deny that revolutionary intentions were entertained by many mal-content persons in the country. Nor did he mean to deny that many of the numerous meetings which had been assembled in various parts of the country of late, might be intended by such men as a display of their strength in numbers. But vast numbers of persons wholly free from such views, must have mixed in those meetings, and it would be hard indeed to involve the innocent with the guilty. He did not suppose that magistrates could be expected to enter into minute investigations upon such occasions, or that they could analyse the many-headed monster, called a mob. He would say, that if the peace was violated at such a meeting, the magistrates had no alternative but to put it down by the best means in their power, without any responsibility for the consequence of the necessity in which they were placed. But he would entreat of the magistrates to pause before the sword was drawn, and not mow down without distinction the innocent with the guilty. The House had heard of banners exhibited, and of expressions used by private individuals, which were, no doubt, of a questionable character; but then there was no evidence to implicate the whole meeting in any censure which might attach to those banners or expressions. This, then, formed a legitimate ground for the proposition of inquiry. At present it appeared to him, that the conduct of the magistrates of Manchester was uncalled for by necessity, and contrary to law; and let those who in thinking otherwise opposed, he had no hesitation in saying, the general impression of the country, accede to inquiry, in order to ascertain the real merits of the case. According to his judgment, Hunt, if there were ground for his arrest, should have been arrested either before he entered into the meeting, or after the meeting had dispersed. The period fixed upon for the arrest of Hunt was in every respect exceptionable, especially considering the manner in which the meeting was proceeding—that in fact, it was quite peaceable, and that Hunt was exhorting it so to continue. But his hon. and learned friend (the solicitor general), had maintained that it was a riotous meeting; that, indeed, the assemblage of numbers without any riotous act was unlawful.

The Solicitor General disavowed that position.

Mr. Denman resumed, and said that he of course misunderstood his hon. and learned friend, but such as he had stated was certainly his conception of his hon. and learned friend's doctrine. In order, however, to demonstrate the fallacy of such doctrine, and to show the real character of a riotous meeting, he referred to the authority of lord Coke, to the case of Howard and Gell in Hobart's report, and to the opinion of Justice Holt. But if his hon. and learned friend thought the Manchester meeting illegal upon the grounds which he had stated, why did he not advise lord Sidmouth to act upon his opinion. The resolutions adopted at the Smithfield meeting were notoriously of the most inflammatory and illegal character, and why were not proceedings at once taken against Hunt, who presided at that meeting? Here the hon. and learned gentleman quoted the case of Demaree and Purchase from Foster's report, to shew the grounds upon which constructive delinquency legally rested. The people composing the meeting at Manchester ought, he maintained, to have been apprised that the warrant against Hunt was about to be executed; for neither the yeoman, nor any other agents of power, could be warranted in the exercise of violence, for the execution of a process among people, who were wholly ignorant of the nature of that process. The people assembled at Manchester were ignorant of the nature of the warrant against Hunt, and yet many of them were cut down or maimed, for impeding, or being supposed to impede, its execution. Such conduct could not, he contended, be regarded as consistent with the law of England, or with the law of any civilised nation upon earth, and therefore the circumstances connected with it imperiously call for inquiry. This inquiry was, indeed, the more necessary, in consequence of the measures proposed by the noble lord, to none of which, as an Englishman, anxious for the maintenance of his country's rights, could he possibly persuade himself to give his assent.—The hon. and learned gentleman sat down amidst loud and general cheering.

Mr. Mansfield commented with much force on the demand now made for a committee of inquiry by those who uniformly described the reports of committees of that House as merely containing the sentiments of the minister, every syllable of which he was, when such an argument suited their purpose, supposed to supply. He described the fatal consequences resulting from the formation of seditious clubs throughout the country, and said that in order to arrest these evils in their course, he was disposed to support the present measures.

Mr. W. Courtenay thought the House would best discharge its duty by resisting the motion for inquiry. He was not ignorant of the responsibility that attached to the House, yet he could not overlook the thousands and tens of thousands who were looking up to that House for protection. It had been argued, that lawyers were not proper judges of the present question. He differed from that opinion entirely. He would appeal to reason and common sense, and if these were exercised, he did not believe any one could contend that the meeting at Manchester, constituted as it was, was not inconsistent with every form of government in the civilised world. In his opinion the meeting was altogether illegal; and if so, it was the bounden duty of the magistrates to disperse it as an unlawful assembly. If the civil power could have effected it, it should alone have been employed; if not, it was their duty to call in the military. By what was the character of the meeting to be ascertained, but by the conduct of the persons who attended it? What had been their course? Why, not contented with proceeding in a straight course to the place where the meeting was held, Hunt, with the flags and emblems of military array, paraded through the principal streets of the town. Before the House was called upon to institute an inquiry, a prima facie case should be made out that some infraction had been made on the constitution. Was it possible for any man who had witnessed the proceedings of the last six months, to doubt that parliamentary enactments were necessary? In his opinion, it was the duty of that House to afford that protection to the community which they so anxiously sought. They asked not for a protracted inquiry, but for some legislative measures to repress the torrent of sedition and blasphemy that had so long been spreading throughout the country.

Mr. W. Lamb, on reviewing all the circumstances of the case, found it absolutely impossible to doubt that inquiry into what had taken place at Manchester ought to be immediately instituted. This was necessary for the character of the magistrates themselves. To the argument which seemed to be principally relied on, that a parliamentary inquiry would prejudice proceedings about to take place in a court of justice, he would reply, that in a case of national importance, this was an inconvenience that must be submitted to. In the next place, he would remark, that he knew of no pending prosecution that would bring the whole case before any of the ordinary tribunals; and for himself he would say, that in his opinion, nowhere could so impartial an investigation of the circumstance take place, as in a committee of that House. If it were admitted that the magistrates had acted legally, still an important political question must arise on the discretion which they had exercised, and this made a parliamentary inquiry desirable. He was apprehensive that coercive measures, in the present state of the country, would prove injurious, and was afraid that more meetings like that at Manchester might be expected, if something was not done to conciliate and tranquillize the public mind. A measure he understood, was to be brought forward by an hon. friend of his, the object of which was, to effect a reform in parliament. He should be ready to support it if he thought its provisions were good. He had hitherto objected to the plans of the advocates for a parliamentary reform, because he thought them not calculated to effectuate their object, and tending to degrade rather than to improve the representation of the people. He should certainly vote for the motion.

Mr. Lawson rose amidst loud calls for the "Question!" The distinction attempted to be drawn by the last speaker between a judicial and a parliamentary inquiry, appeared to him to supply no good reason why the latter course should be adopted. The annals of inconsistency, teeming as they did with the exploits of the gentlemen opposite, offered nothing equal to their unaccountable conduct in calling for a committee on this occasion, after lifting their voices so frequently against the reports of the committees of that House, which they had heretofore affected to regard as the reports of ministers. Suppose the circumstance of the case reversed—suppose that instead of wishing the proceedings to be brought before a court of justice, they were to demand that they should be referred to a committee of that House! What in that case would be the language of their opponents? The cry would be, that they wished to withdraw them from an impartial tribunal, that they might be inquired into, where the acts of ministers were sure to be judged right—that they therefore took the case from a court of justice, to bring it before a partial committee of a corrupt House of Commons. It was now proposed that such a course should be taken, and that too, to satisfy those very persons who had no confidence in the House of Commons as at present constituted. He censured the language held respecting the yeomanry. The members of those corps he could only view as special constables in red coats; and was it for those to complain that such a force had been employed, who had been declaiming all their lives against paid mercenaries and a standing army? It had been asked, if it were possible that justice could be obtained from the funds raised by the penny subscriptions of the radicals. He did not wish to wait till a sufficient sum could be advanced to meet the expense of the proceedings, from their verdigrise exchequer. He, for one, would be content to vote any sum out of the public purse that might be necessary to bring the question before a legal tribunal. He proceeded to show the difficulties that would arise if it were resolved to institute a parliamentary inquiry on this subject. Adverting to what had been said of the sharpening of the swords of the yeomanry, he observed this was no proof of "malice prepense." As well might it be contended that the fact of one of the yeomanry having made a hearty breakfast was a proof of "malice prepense;" for he believed it was not more the practice of yeomanry to make a hearty breakfast once a day than it was for the yeomanry corps to have their swords sharpened once a year. On this subject the most palpable mis-statements had appeared in some of the newspapers. They had seen a story of a boy who was said to have travelled two hundred miles to show Mr. Orator Hunt his wounds—that was, to tell a lie. Then there was an account of a person who had had his ear cut off, but who was so very peaceably disposed that he never attempted to retaliate, but coolly pocketed the affront and the ear together. One man was described to have been taken to the Infirmary covered with wounds, and, on his way, like another Regulus, or rather like one of the ancient reformers, he had declared his sufferings served but to increase his attachment to the cause of reform. He defended the magistrates, and the thanks which had been given to them in the name of the Prince Regent. The meeting at Manchester he regarded as illegal. The inscriptions on the flags which they had carried threatened death and vengeance to some of their countrymen, and though he did not know exactly who were the victims intended to be sacrificed to the offended deity of radical reform, it was pretty clear that the fury of the malcontents would be directed (where they had the means of following their inclinations) against the anti-reformers.

Mr. R. Martin said, the House had heard much from the noble lord opposite on the subject of conciliation. He wished for conciliation as much as any man, but he desired to know what was meant by the word as it was now used? He wished to know from the noble lord who had brought forward the present motion, and those who supported him, what they would be disposed to give to conciliate the radicals? Would they propose other taxes to the chancellor of the exchequer in lieu of those which now pressed heavy on the lower classes? Would they propose a new property tax? If they would do this, he, for one, would approve of their efforts of conciliation.

Lord Castlereagh rose amidst loud cries for the "question." Nothing, he assured the House, could persuade him to address them on this occasion, but he wished to state the nature of, rather than to argue, the present question. The noble lord who brought forward the motion, intended by it that the papers relating to the state of the country should be referred to a committee, and this, if carried, he intended to follow up with another—that this committee should have the power of sending for and examining persons, papers and records. It had in this a double view; one was, to inquire into the whole of the proceedings at Manchester; and the other to take the general state of the country into consideration, and for this purpose calling before them persons from every county where they might imagine that any disturbance or discontent existed. The question resolved itself to this and he submitted to the House whether they would consent to it—that the whole of the remedial measures should be postponed until this tedious double inquiry were gone into, for that was really the object in view. Would they submit, in the state of the country which had been alluded to in the speech from the throne, and described in the papers before them, to postpone all the measures arising from that state to an indefinite period—till this committee should have terminated its lengthened labours? Was the House prepared to rescind the vote it had come to the other evening, which vote decided, in his opinion, that the Manchester proceedings could not properly be inquired into by parliament? Would they wait until this committee reported the testimony of the Pearsons, the Bamfords, and all the other radical evidence which would, no doubt, be offered to them? The radicals, however, knew their business much better than to wait until the committee had decided upon them; and before that time, they would have taken care that this committee should never report at all. They (the radicals) had taken a very different view of things; they looked to some such circumstance as this delay, though certainly without any concert with gentlemen on the other side of the House; but was the House prepared to swallow down their view of things? Would they, after what had transpired respecting the opinions and conduct of the radical reformers, consent to a delay of measures, upon which, in his conscience he believed, the tranquillity and security of the country depended? Would the right hon. gentleman opposite think this a fair way of treating the country? What would the radicals themselves say to it? Why, they would despise those who could legislate in such a manner: for they did not disguise it from the public—they did not disguise it from each other, that they only waited for an opportunity of trying their strength. But what would the loyal portion of the community (and it was consoling to know that they formed out of all proportion the majority of the population of this country]—what would they say to such a measure? They had looked to the House, they had earnestly demanded security and protection for their lives and property. Were they now to be told, when danger pressed around them, that they must wait—for what? Must wait for an inquiry, first, into the proceedings at Manchester, and then for a general one into the state of the country at large. He would admit that there were in the country many men of untainted loyalty, who were slow in admitting the existence of danger to themselves and to the state, to the extent, which he thought he might say it was generally believed; but what was the House called upon to do in this case? Why, as good subjects, and faithful guardians of the public security, they were to act for such men; they were to take such steps as would prevent themselves, and those who were less apprehensive of the danger, from being involved in one common ruin. Yet in the face of those loyal subjects, who were so anxiously expecting protection and security at the hands of the legislature, what was parliament called upon to do by gentlemen on the other side? To postpone those necessary measures of safety until a period when, in all human probability, they could be of no avail. Honourable members talked of conciliation, and of the necessity of ministers uniting with them in effecting such measures as would produce that conciliation. He would assure the right hon. gentleman opposite, and those honourable members by whom he was surrounded, that ministers would have no objection to co-operate with them in any measure which might attain the desired effect, if they thought they could hope for their support. [Cheers from both sides of the House.] If they could rely upon their willing assistance, there would be no objection on the part of the ministers to join with them for the better security of their common country. But, after what he had heard last night, after having witnessed the whole course adopted by the gentlemen opposite since the opening of the session, he professed that he saw little ground for hoping for any assistance to his majesty's government from that quarter. He had seen them interpose to prevent by inquiry justice from reaching those who wished to destroy all social order, and all regular government. He had seen them joining in the cry of men against the government, who wished to destroy every thing valuable in our constitution. He would not impute this to the ambitious view of getting into power, for he believed that every gentleman on the other side would go along with him in thinking, that office at the present moment was a heavy and serious responsibility, he would not therefore impute any unworthy motives. The right hon. gentleman had, however given currency to the assertion, that at this moment the Whigs alone could save the country. [Mr. Tierney, across the table, I never said any such thing (Hear, hear, from the opposition).] Lord Castlereagh continued.—The right hon. gentleman might not have said so in so many words, but he had said it in effect. "There," said he, "ministers have enjoyed power for such a time, and see what are the effects. These said the right hon. gentleman" mentioning a long list of grievances, "are the effects of their being in power." What was that but saying, that if their opponents had enjoyed the confidence of their sovereign and of parliament, no such thing could have occurred. In his opinion the gentlemen opposite would have acted a better and more useful part for their country, had they lent their support to the government on the present occasion. Instead of this, they acted in concert with a set of men, who, he would readily admit, had nothing in common with them. They had contributed, unwillingly no doubt, to sanction opinions which they themselves condemned—they had kept in countenance the notion that government was a delusion—a notion in which he could not but think that they themselves were deluded. Notwithstanding, however, that they had chosen to adopt this line of proceeding, he felt confident that there was sufficient good sense, firmness, and spirit in the House and the country to save both—not, indeed, in spite of the Whigs, but without their assistance. This speech, which was delivered with more than the noble lord's usual animation, was at its conclusion followed by loud and repeated cheers from his side of the House.

Mr. Tierney rose. Never, he observed, in the whole course of his parliamentary life, was he so unexpectedly called upon to address the House: for up to the extraordinary rant which the noble lord had just concluded, he had not conceived that it would have been necessary for him to offer one word upon the question before them. But the House would perceive that he had been goaded into it by the noble lord, in a speech the sole object of which seemed to be, to rouse a strong party spirit, as if the debate could not be as well concluded without it. Indeed, next to the surprise which this unexpected call had excited, nothing astonished him more than the tone and manner in which it was delivered. He had never before heard the noble lord express himself in a similar manner. The noble lord had on all former occasions so demeaned himself in debate as to entitle him to the respect of all who heard him; but, on this occasion, he had gone into a complete rant, with no other view, as it appeared to him, than that of exciting a strong and acrimonious party spirit. The noble lord had talked about conciliation. Did this look like it? Was not this any thing but an attempt at conciliation? Was it not rather calculated to excite strong party feelings on both sides? In some of those insinuating terms, of which the noble lord was so perfect a master, he had declared that the Opposition were allied with the radicals. They who had ever stood in the front rank against those deluded men, were now taunted by the noble lord with being associated with them; and this was the return which they got from the noble lord, as well as from the radicals—that they were abused by each for being hostile to both. The noble lord had said, that he (Mr. T.) had declared that the Whigs alone could save the country. He had made no such assertion; but a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), whom he regretted not to see then in his place, having boasted that ministers had been in power for nearly fifty years, he had ventured to say, “Yes, and see the effects. I,” continued Mr. Tierney, “did not want that the Whigs should be in power. I did not assert that they alone could save the country; but I did ask, what had been the effects of the long continued power of their opponents. I now ask the same thing—What are those effects? We have the annual expenditure raised from fifteen to sixty millions. We have a nation overburthened with debts and taxes, and a chancellor of the exchequer obliged to break faith with the public creditor (for that was really the fact, whatever other term they might give it), in order to support a sinking revenue; and these were some of the effects of the administration of the Tories. We had acts of severity and coercion multiplied, acts to increase and prop up a falling revenue. We had paupers increasing with the increase of the poor-rates; trade and commerce declining; and the people naturally discontented; and these, too, were the effects of the excellent administration of the Tories.” Yet the noble lord called upon them for confidence; he wished them to unite in support of such a government! Now, he (Mr. Tierney), said that such a government could not be supported: the House might make laws for them, and raise money, and put troops at their disposal; but they could never give them authority; they might exercise all the powers of which they were possessed, but, as an administration, they could never command the respect or esteem of the country [Cheers]. He felt warm on this occasion: it was very natural—he could not feel otherwise; for he never expected to find such a turbulent gentleman opposed to him as the noble lord had proved himself to be. He had not expected that a polished nobleman, as the noble lord was admitted to be, would have indulged in such a strain as that which he had now uttered. Indeed, he had expected that the noble lord would have gone quietly to bed, contenting himself with the majority which it was likely he would gain on the present occasion. But no; that would not satisfy him; and when he conceived that the House was about to adjourn quietly, he all at once found the noble lord, to his great astonishment, indulging in this most extraordinary rant. The noble lord had said, that one object of the motion was, to make particular inquiry into the conduct of the Manchester magistrates. That was not the case; but if such an inquiry was brought on, it would be the result of the shifting, miserable temporizing conduct which had been pursued on the other side. The noble lord might complain of the conduct of members on this side of the House, in touching upon that subject; but he himself and his colleagues were to blame—the matter had been forced upon them (the Opposition) by the papers which had been laid before the House. Those papers, he maintained, were garbled, and insufficient for the object for which they were said to be produced. It was on this account that a more full inquiry was demanded. The noble lord had said, that the House, in having agreed to the address, and rejected the amendment, stood pledged not to consider that case. This was entirely erroneous; there was no such pledge expressed or implied; and he hoped that no honourable members would be led away by this kind of sophism. The papers which had been laid before the House had forced their attention not only to the proceedings at Manchester, but to the state of the country generally. It should be recollected that those papers only referred to one part of the country, but that the measures to be founded on them were not local or temporary, but permanent and general, now, and for ever, all over the country. That was to say, it was intended to mulct the whole people of England for the misconduct of some persons in two counties. That misconduct was said to exist, and those seditious practices to be carried on, in Lancashire and Cheshire; but there was none in Yorkshire. A noble lord opposite (lord Lascelles), whose manner of expressing himself in that House entitled him to the respect of every member, had not stated that any disturbances had occurred in Yorkshire, but that the people were in that state which exposed them to the pernicious influence of a few designing men, who endeavoured to mislead them. And had not the noble lord well accounted for those feelings of discontent, which would lay them more open to the designs of the seditious, by alluding to the excessive distress which reigned among them? What had the magistrates themselves said upon this subject? "When the people are oppressed with hunger, we do not wonder at their giving ear to any doctrines which they are told will redress their grievances." Would the noble lord point out any violent criminal outrages which had been committed to justify his proposed measures? He denied that any could be shown, except the fatal one at Manchester; and upon the nature of this he need not say that opinion was divided. There had been no acts to disturb the public peace. It was true that the people had assembled together in large numbers, preceded by flags and music, and in a kind of regular, or, as it was said, of military order; but he was certain, if they had been let alone, and not disturbed, they would have been found as peaceable as several similar meetings had been before and since. Indeed, the experience of every succeeding day showed that these meetings would die away if not opposed. The people would find, that after assembling and hearing some three or four speeches which they did not understand, and being some four or five shillings out of pocket, these were practices which they could not follow. But, upon all these local transactions, what did the noble lord do? He brought in a general law affecting the whole country, and that without giving the House any particular information. If he had confined himself to such a measure as the Watch and Ward act, it might not have been objectionable; but a general sweeping law, affecting the whole country, now and for ever, founded upon such grounds, was, he believed, a thing which never entered into the mind of any person but the noble lord himself. He had asked, besides all these additional securities, for an additional force of 11,000 men: indeed, he had called them forth without asking. What did the papers on the table say of the necessity of such a force? Why, from all he had read of them, and he had read them through, it only appeared that two troops had been called for, one at Leeds, and the other at Wigan. The right hon. gentleman then alluded to the conduct of the mayor of Leeds, and contrasted it with that pursued by the magistrates of Manchester. In the former instance, every necessary precaution had been taken to prevent a breach of the peace: there had been no unnecessary parade of the military. Troops, it was true, were near at hand, but they had not been ostentatiously paraded before the meeting. What was done at Manchester? When the vast multitude were assembled together, the military force was drawn up before them. The mob, on seeing this, gave three cheers; and what did the yeomanry do? They also gave three cheers, and drew their swords. Was that, he would ask, like a fair and impartial administration of justice? or did it evince men determined to keep the peace? Now, as to the arrest of Hunt in the centre of the meeting, was not that a case into which a court of law could not inquire, and which might very properly call for the censure of parliament, if upon inquiry, they found that the arrest was unnecessary at that time? He firmly believed, that if Hunt had not been arrested that day, no riot or disturbance would have taken place. The meeting did not look like one which had come prepared for riot; they had brought their wives and children with them—a circumstance the least likely to have happened, if they had determined upon violence. What was there in the nature of this meeting, which should have led to the supposition that it had assembled for violent purposes? When they had seen others nearly as large assemble and disperse quietly, because they were not molested, why should it be inferred that this meeting had previously determined upon riot? What had been said of the meeting at Leeds? That a great portion of them consisted of the idle and the curious, and that scarcely a fourth or a fifth part could be said to be radical reformers. Indeed, he believed, that if the radical reformers had been separated at all those meetings, from those who had been brought together from idleness and curiosity, their number would be found but very small; and he did not see that a man, conscientiously believing the justice of universal suffrage and annual parliaments, might not be a loyal subject, and have no disposition whatever to subvert the constitution. With the example of the duke of Richmond before him, he was not prepared to say that what brought one man into the cabinet should take another to the gallows. Itinerant orators had been complained of, as exciting the people to seditious practices. There were, perhaps, five or six persons of this description; there were Hunt, and Wooler, and Johnson, and Harrison, and one or two others whose names he did not recollect; but he believed of all these, Hunt was the only one who had been heard of or known before. How would the measures of the noble lord prevent the opinions of these men from gaining circulation? They might, it was true, be prohibited from going to spout at several places, but would not their opinions still get abroad among the people? It was well known that the speeches delivered in one place were not confined to that particular spot, but were disseminated very widely. How could this be prevented? Reports of them would be printed and read: like the rant of the noble lord, they would not be confined to the place where they were delivered; and if that should be reported, it would no doubt set all the noble lord's friends capering from one end of the kingdom to the other. One consequence of those small and restricted meetings would be, that the reporters, from the thinness of the attendance, would get front places, and, of course, be able to give all that occurred much more accurately to the public. He really did not conceive that the orations of these demagogues were listened to with such serious attention as was supposed. From the account of the meeting at Birmingham it appeared that when Wooler and major Cartwright were willing to deliver their orations, the people were not disposed to listen to them.—There was one thing asserted, to which he would particularly wish to call the attention of the House. It had been stated, that schools had been opened in particular districts, where sedition and irreligion were inculcated upon the minds of children. Now, was not that in itself a matter of sufficient importance to warrant inquiry? Could any thing be more serious, or more deserving the consideration of the House, than the alleged fact, that parents suffered their children to be instructed in such principles? Why, then, not inquire into it? The House had before them a statement, garbled and broken as it was, said to be of facts. How did they know that? One good effect of the committee would be, that it would guarantee those facts, if they were such: for all the House knew, the greater part of this information might have only existed in the imagination of the noble lord opposite. One thing was certain, that a great part of it rested upon the information of spies. From the letter of Mr. Lloyd, it appeared that a meeting was broken up, because the persons assembled said, that one of those who had addressed them was a government spy. This perhaps was the sixth itinerant orator; but then he was the orator of the noble lord. The noble lord had said, that they (the Opposition) had forced this question forward. This he denied. It was forced upon them; for if it was not meant that parliament should inquire, why were the letters of Mr. Hay and others laid before them? With respect to this letter of Mr. Hay, there was one question which he wished to put to the noble lord. Was the letter describing the dispersion of the meeting on the 16th of August that on which the thanks of the Prince Regent had been founded? If it was, and if there was no other information, he would say, that never were men more branded with guilt than those ministers who had advised those thanks. What was it, but as if they had said to their prince, after learning that a large meeting was violently dispersed, many of them sabred, and some of them killed—“Now, Sir, is your time to show your contempt for human life, by thanking those who shed this blood?” But he did not think that any of his majesty's ministers were capable of such conduct. What, then, was the inference? That they had received other information on the subject of the meeting, besides that which was contained in the papers on the table. For that information he now called. He wished that the House should be put in possession of whatever information ministers had received in their subsequent personal communications with Mr. Hay.—The right hon. gentleman next adverted to the declaration in Yorkshire by those who did not agree to the requisition for the county meeting, and contended, that, according to the opinions there expressed, it was clearly admitted an inquiry should take place. He then read the whole of the declaration, after which he contended, that it was the direct compact offered by the declarers, that they would join in an address to the Prince Regent, praying that he would assemble parliament for the purpose of instituting an inquiry into the transactions at Manchester, provided the requisitionists agreed to a declaration as to the state of the country. If that agreement had been assented to, he had no doubt whatever that the gentlemen who signed the declaration would have faithfully adhered to their contract, and voted for that inquiry which they now so strenuously opposed. But it was said by an hon. member (Mr. Stuart Wortley), that by an inquiry he meant an investigation by the courts of law. That, however, would not be prevented by a parliamentary examination; for if the House saw grounds for it, they might, as they had done in other instances, direct the attorney-general to prosecute. It would, perhaps, be said, that the attorney-general could prosecute still. He denied that he could; for it should be recollected, that his masters were some of the parties accused; and if they turned earl Fitzwilliam out of office for only expressing an opinion in favour of inquiry, what might the law officers of the crown expect?—The right hon. gentleman next defended the conduct of the Yorkshire requisitionists against the charge of having joined with the radicals. There was nothing done there, no question agitated, but the one for which they had assembled, namely—to demand an inquiry into a transaction in which it was admitted on all hands that British blood had been shed, and where no sufficient grounds had been made for the attack. Was it not, he asked, natural that such a demand should be made? When torrents of blood had flowed, when several had been maimed, and some killed, what could be more rational than that an inquiry should be instituted? But the fact was, that they who gave the thanks to the magistrates knew right well that they had not a case to make out. If they had any colourable one upon which they could rely, the House would never have heard of such a thing as this outcry against all investigation. The right hon. gentleman then contended, that if meetings were allowed to go on, there would be an inquiry, a parliamentary inquiry, sooner or later into the Manchester business. He maintained that, from the papers now upon the table, they were bound to be able to aver, that a case had been made out which affected not only the right of the three counties which were disturbed, but also the rights of the remainder of the fifty-two counties of England. Now, forty-seven of them, according to the noble lord himself, were untouched; and yet all of them were to be put out of the pale of the law, because disturbances had arisen in others from the pressure of distress. He would not give the clerk the trouble of reading, he would merely allude to the words of the Prince Regent's speech at the commencement of the last session of parliament, in which the nation had been congratulated upon the commerce and revenue of the country being in the most flourishing condition. Now, the noble lord must have known that this assertion regarding the flourishing condition of the trade and revenue was any thing but true; and he (Mr. T.) had told him so at the time, and had advised him to try the effects of conciliation. The noble lord had, however, now turned round upon him, and had asked him, what he would do in the spirit of conciliation. One thing he would not do—he would not vote for the addition of three millions of new taxes. He was not bound to say what he would do; it would be sufficient for him to say what he would not do. He would not, among other things, have imposed a tax upon wool. That tax had done more to alienate the people of Yorkshire from the government, than all the other measures which they had proposed; for it was a tax that affected not only the lower orders, but also the master manufacturers, at a time, too, when there was a complete stagnation of their trade, and almost a total want of orders. What object, then, could be attained by such an impolitic measure, except the exasperation and irritation of the people? Was the noble lord still anxious to know what he would do in the way of conciliation? He would at least show a wish to relieve the distresses of the people; he would,—but he would not, even if he had any measures to propose for the present emergency, say what those measures were, because coming from him they would be certain not to meet with fair play among the gentlemen on the other side of the House. One thing, however, he would advise them to do: if severe laws were to be passed, and if a resolution was to be adopted to restrict still farther the liberty of the country, it was their bounden duty to take into consideration the distress, and the causes of the distress, which now prevailed. The noble lord, indeed, had asked them, whether they would wait and postpone the passing of his measures, until they had inquired into the necessity of enacting them. With as great reason might the poor man turn round and say to the noble lord, "Will you postpone to relieve me, when I am starving, until you have inquired into the means of removing my distress?"

The House then divided; when the numbers were, Ayes, 150; Noes, 323: Majority against the motion, 173.

Wednesday, December 1.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved the order of the day for going into a Committee of Supply,

Mr. Brougham said, he felt that he could not conscientiously discharge his duty without opposing the motion. The present was a parliamentary and constitutional occasion for the statement of grievances. As often as a supply was demanded by the crown, so often was any member of that House entitled to state the grievances of the people. In opposing the present motion, therefore, he was only exercising that constitutional right with which, in any case of emergency, every member was invested. The great objection and grievance which he had to state, was the extraordinary and unprecedented haste with which ministers seemed resolved to hurry the new measures through parliament. If they were temporary or local in their character it would be a different matter; but it was because they would effect a great and a permanent change in the constitution; it was, in short, for the reasons which he had mentioned yesterday, although they had had no effect on the noble lord, that he considered it highly indecorous to urge them with such unprecedented dispatch. The House was now at a notice of eight and forty hours—about twelve of which had been passed in debate on another part of those measures—it was at a notice of thirty-six hours to go into the consideration of the details of the new system. It was to be called upon to-morrow night, in discussing the first of the proposed bills, to enter into a complete investigation and discussion of the whole of those measures by which it was proposed that the law of England should be changed in some of its most essential points, and changed for ever. This was not only indecorous as it regarded the House, it was highly indecent and unjust as it regarded the people. For to propose to change the laws, by which the rights and liberties of the people had been hitherto protected; and to change them, not to be restored when the supposed exigency, which required the change, should have passed away, but for ever, without allowing such a delay as might give the people an opportunity of considering the subject, and making their feelings and opinions upon it clearly manifest, was a denial of that to which the people were justly entitled. What did the noble lord propose to do? He would not grant the delay of a single day! He persevered in bringing on to-morrow the second reading of the bill already introduced into the House, before it was possible that any part of the country, except the metropolis, could be aware of the nature of the proposition which parliament was entertaining. That was not the course pursued in 1795. Violent as were the measures then proposed, a delay—he believed of three weeks—was allowed for their consideration, although the pressure of the emergency was certainly as great as in the present instance. For these reasons, he protested against the present motion for going into a committee of supply, as he had a constitutional right to do; although he would not take the sense of the House upon it. If the House were willing to adopt the proposed measures without due discussion; if they were so tired of the free constitution of England, that they would not deliberate before they not merely suspended, but absolutely overthrew it, he and his honourable friends were in vain endeavouring to discharge their duty to themselves and the country, by attending from day to day to attempt to prevail on the House to perform its sacred obligations to the public.

NAVY ESTIMATES.] The House having resolved itself into a committee of supply,

Sir G. Warrender proceeded to address the committee. He said he could anticipate no opposition to the resolutions which he held in his hand, which merely provided for the requisite number of seamen for the year. He ought to mention that in one branch of the service, he meant the royal marines, there was an increase of 2,000 men; so that, in future, the whole duty of the dock-yards would be executed by that corps. It would be found of the greatest service to increase the royal marines to the number of 8,000 men; by which means, if any cause should arise, an efficient permanent force would be ready to assist in the formation of an armament. This was not like an increase of the military force, a measure of a temporary nature; but was intended to be a permanent increase to the extent of 2,000 men. The hon. baronet then moved, "That 23,000 men be employed for the Sea Service, for 13 Lunar months, from the 1st January, 1820, including 8,000 royal marines."

Sir Joseph Yorke inquired whether the hon. baronet meant to make any addition to the guard-ships, which he described as being in a very bad situation. Considerable difficulty was encountered at present in fitting out men of war, as was exemplified in the case of two line of battle ships that were lately sent to a distant quarter of the globe. The seamen were now placed on the preventive service: they were employed under the command of the chancellor of the exchequer, in preventing smuggling. When they came back from a service of that kind, they were generally more fond of the gin-cag than of the gunpowder-cask. There was not a naval officer, he believed, who would not, for the duties of reefing, steering, splicing, or fighting the enemies of their country, take any other set of men, in preference to those who had been placed on this service. When the hon. baronet asked them to vote 2,000 men more than were called for last year, he hoped he would not refuse to give the House some information on the points he had alluded to.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, if he understood the hon. baronet correctly, the nature of his proposition was, that 2,000 men should be added to the marines, which would have the effect of releasing 2,000 of the military force of the country from the duty they now performed in the dock-yards. Therefore, when an increase of the military force was called for, the House ought to keep in view, that by this new measure, 2,000 men would be virtually added to the military establishment. He could not, at that moment, make any observation on the proposed increase of the army; but when the noble lord brought forward the proposition, it would be for him to demonstrate the necessity of such a measure in time of peace.

Sir B. Martin said, the duty of the dock-yards was formerly executed by the marine corps, and it was always highly desirable that it should be performed by them. That which was now proposed was therefore nothing more than merely reverting to the ancient system.

Sir G. Warrender stated, that with respect to the guard-ships it was not intended to make any alteration in the system which had been approved of by the House last year, and which rendered that species of force more efficacious. The reasons, founded chiefly on a principle of economy, which he had detailed to the House in the last session, operated to reduce the number of guard-ships. But, if the hon. baronet supposed them to be in a state of inefficiency, he had formed an erroneous opinion. With respect to the armament destined for South America, to which the hon. baronet had alluded, it was not fitted out so tardily as he imagined. One of the vessels, the Superb, commanded by sir T. Hardy, was in the Sound, with all her stores on board, in four days after the orders were issued for her equipment, and her complement of men was speedily completed. With respect to the increased number of marines, it would be most advantageous. If an armament were ordered to be equipped, these men would be ready for service, and the military might undertake the dock-yard duty, as before.

Mr. Tierney said, if the marines were increased by 2,000 men, it was clear that 2,000 of the military would be applicable to some other service. If 2,000 additional marines were raised, who were to do a duty now performed by the military, ought not the army to be decreased to that amount? If it was not, then it came to this, that to this extent they increased the army. He had no objection to the marines having the care of the dock-yards, for common sense pointed them out as the most proper force to undertake that duty; but he did not approve of this mode of strengthening the army. It was understood that 10,000 men were to be added to the military force of the country, and no person would contend that that number was not quite enough; but, by the proposition now made, it appeared that there would be an increase of 2,000 more.

Sir G. Warrender said, that gentlemen were not correct in supposing that the dock-yard duty was entirely performed by the military of late years. The fact was, a part of that duty had always been intrusted to the corps of marines.

Mr. Tierney said, he had no objection to the increase of the marines, but he did not like that, to the same extent, the military force should also be increased, which would evidently be the effect of the present measure.

Mr. Croker said, it was impossible to deny that this arrangement would relieve that portion of the army which was now employed in the dock-yards, and pro tanto, would increase the disposable military force. The number of men that would be relieved by this additional vote of marines was about 1,200.

The motion was then agreed to. Sir G. Warrender then moved, "That a sum not exceeding 650,325*l.* be granted to his majesty, for wages of the said 23,000 men, for 13 lunar months, at the rate of 2*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* per man per month," also, "that 612,950*l.* be granted, for victuals for the said 23,000 men, for 13 lunar months, at the rate of 2*l.* 1*s.* per man per month."

Mr. Baring asked, what was the reason that the charge for victuals was 1*s.* per man per month greater than it was in the vote of last session?

Sir G. Warrender could not state the exact reason, but the officers who made the estimate found that the addition was necessary.

Sir B. Martin said, the sum voted last year was found to be inadequate, and it was necessary that the charge should be fully covered. Therefore the additional shilling was put on, and for no other reason.

Mr. Baring did not mean to oppose any part of the service, but when the hon. baronet came down to vote the navy estimates, and made any alteration in the items, he had a right to state to the House on what ground he made it. It was the paramount duty of that House to inquire into all appropriations of money, and therefore he called for information.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the vote of last session was insufficient, and therefore it was proposed on this occasion to vote 1s. more per man per month; because, on calculation, it was found that such an increase was necessary to meet the expenditure.

Sir G. Warrender said, in proposing this vote, he relied on the judgment and opinion of those gentlemen who belonged to the department and whose duty it was to look into and consider the subject. Better authority he thought he could not have. He could not presume to go into minor details of this kind; and when he received from official authority, a statement that such a charge was correct, and that it must be laid before parliament, he felt himself justified in coming down to the House and proposing the vote.

Mr. Baring considered it to be the duty of the hon. baronet, when he called for any augmented vote, to state the grounds on which he applied for such augmentation. The estimates should be moved by some person who could give to the House all necessary information on the subject.

The motion was then agreed to.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.]
The House having resolved itself into a committee on the Stamp Duties act of the 56th of the King, c. 56,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he should decline discussing the principle on which the resolution which he had now to move was founded, as it would most probably come before the House immediately, on another occasion. He had thought it his duty to introduce it to the House, because a considerable fraud had been committed on the revenue, by means of the pamphlets against which his measure was intended, and because a considerable invasion had also been made by them upon the property of the regular newspapers. He then handed up his resolution to the chairman, which was as follows:—"That all Pamphlets, or Papers commonly so called, and all other papers containing public news, or intelligence or occurrences, or any remarks or observations, address, or letter thereon, or upon any matter established in Church or State, printed in any part of the United Kingdom, to be dispersed and made public, which shall not exceed two sheets, or which shall be sold or exposed to sale for a less sum than six-pence, exclusive of the Duty to be charged thereon, shall be deemed and taken to be Newspapers within the meaning of the several Acts in force relating to Newspapers in Great-Britain and Ireland respectively, and be subject to the like Duties of Stamps."

Mr. Brougham said, that as this was only a resolution preparatory to the bringing in of a bill upon the subject, he should not enter into the principle of it at any length, because, though the resolution entered into some details, it had not mentioned any of the exceptions which it was doubtless intended to allow. He should therefore only refer to one circumstance at present, which had been very incorrectly stated by the noble lord on a former night. He had not the slightest doubt of the misrepresentation which the noble lord had made being unintentional; he conceived it to have arisen from his not having seen, or from his not having considered the acts of parliament which already existed upon the subject. After the decided reprobation which he (Mr. Brougham) had passed upon the seditious and blasphemous libels which had emanated from the press in the course of the last three years, he did not expect that he should be suspected of too great a leaning towards them. He must, however, say, that nobody ought to be charged with more crimes than those of which they were actually guilty; and therefore he thought that it was not altogether right to charge men who were guilty of treason or blasphemy, with being also guilty of a fraud upon the revenue. He would show the House good reasons why the publishers of these pamphlets were not guilty of the charge which had that evening been brought against them. The words of the Stamp act, on which alone this charge had been substantiated, and upon which he had always given his opinion, when requested so to do, were "Any newspaper or papers containing any news, intelligence, or occurrence." From those words it was impossible to argue that a person who did not publish any news, intelligence, or occurrence, but merely commented upon them, was guilty of a fraud upon the revenue, because the loophole through which he escaped was evidently a loophole contemplated by the legislature. That this was the case would appear more clearly by considering the intention of the legislature. The act allowed not only individuals to publish every week, or at any other periodical intervals, such comments, but also contained a clause stating the terms on which they were to publish them. From the wording of this clause it had always been his opinion, that a man who published a pamphlet, containing mere comment, periodically, was not evading, much less defrauding the revenue. He had thought it requisite to make these observations, in consequence of what had fallen from the noble lord on a former occasion. He was clearly of opinion that nothing could be more dangerous to society, nothing more pernicious to the best interests of humanity, than what had recently gone forth to the world in these twopenny pamphlets, and his charge against ministers was, that they had not endeavoured to stop that torrent of blasphemy and sedition which had lately inundated the country, before it had arrived at its present height. The existing laws conferred on them sufficient power wherewith to have done it; and he would pledge himself to show, when the proper opportunity arrived, that they were more effectual for such purpose, than those new measures which the House was called upon to adopt, and that they would be the laws to which the ministers would ultimately be compelled to repair in order to punish offenders, even though they carried their present severe and extraordinary propositions.

Lord Castlereagh said, that he should imitate the example of his right hon. friend, and say very little upon the resolution now before the House, inasmuch as it was merely formal, and arose from the necessity which existed of having a recommendatory vote from the committee before it could be brought into the House, owing to its being a money bill. The bill was not in the hands of hon. members at present, and that gave him another reason for not discussing its enactments at present. If, in the debate of a former evening on this subject, he had said any thing incorrect or offensive, he was ready instantly to retract it; but he had then quoted the case of one Journal which appeared to have taken the same view of the subject as he himself had done; it had originally paid the usual newspaper duty, but it now escaped it by passing under the name of a pamphlet. He thought some such legislative enactment as that which this resolution contemplated to be actually requisite to protect what he had called the respectable part of the press. An acquiescence in the resolution of that evening would not pledge hon. members to support the measures which might afterwards be founded upon it.

Mr. Brougham begged leave to inform the noble lord, that the publication to which he alluded, and which he believed to be Cobbett's [lord Castlereagh bowed assent,] did, at the time when it paid the duty, contain news, and especially when parliament was sitting; ever since it had ceased to pay the duty it contained no articles of public intelligence.

Sir M. W. Ridley entered his protest against the measure now proposed. He thought that it most materially affected the interests of the country; some of the other bills were local and temporary; this was general and permanent; he, therefore, felt himself bound to raise his voice against a bill which made so important an alteration in the laws of England.

The resolution was then agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, December 2.

TRAINING PREVENTION BILL.] Lord Sidmouth moved the order of the day for the second reading of the bill for prohibiting training. Their lordships, he said, had made an order, that two of the bills which had been read a first time on Monday, should be read a second time this day; he might, therefore, now allude to both. The provisions of one of the bills were similar to those of the Temporary act which was passed some years ago, when the midland districts were in a disturbed state; and if their lordships compared the present bill with the act of the 52nd of the king, they would find that its provisions were much less rigorous. The papers which had been laid before their lordships contained instances of training and of the procuring of arms, more than sufficient to prove the necessity of the measures recommended to their adoption. But the evidence on this subject, irresistible as it already was, had been greatly strengthened since those papers were placed on the table. Within these last few days information had been received that military training was still going on, and that the practice of procuring arms, for purposes the illegal nature of which could not be questioned, was continued. If, then, there was evidence sufficient to warrant their lordships in countenancing this bill, the grounds which would recommend it to their adoption had, instead of being weakened, become much stronger. He should at present say nothing more, except to move, that the bill which stood first in order be now read a second time.

Lord Erskine contended, that the papers before the House did not afford sufficient ground for the measures proposed, and in particular, that the allegation in the preamble of the bill respecting training was not made out. If their lordships found the enactments of the bill unexceptionable, still they ought not to adopt the preamble as a ground for such legislation. His lordship then argued, that the present measures were in themselves far more objectionable than the act to which the noble secretary of state had referred. He believed they would not have the effect which was expected from them. Transportation he considered much too severe a punishment for the offence of drilling. In the course of his long experience in the courts below, he had always found that severity of enactment defeated its purpose. He was therefore of opinion that ministers would be more likely to succeed in their object by making the penalty less. With regard to the bill for the seizure of arms, though it was only temporary the powers which it gave were so extraordinary, that their lordships would surely pause before they sanctioned it. After the assertion in the preamble, the bill proceeded thus:—“Be it therefore enacted, that it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, upon the information upon oath of one or more credible witnesses, that he or they believe that any pike, pike-head, or spear, is in the possession of any person or persons, or in any house or place,” &c. The clause then went on to say, “or any dirk, dagger, pistol, or other weapon,” and authorized the issuing of warrants to seize arms, and search any house by night or by day. From the terms in which this clause was framed, he must contend that the most loyal person in the country, within the operation of the bill, would be liable to have his house searched, and if any arms were found, might be made liable to all the penalties of this severe law. The people were entitled by the constitution to have arms for their defence; and if a measure of this kind were rendered necessary by local circumstances, it was fit their lordships should look carefully to its provisions.

Lord Lilford, though aware that the noble and learned lord who had just sat down ought to be better qualified than himself for the discussion of evidence, could not look at the papers in his hand without being satisfied that there was ground, not only for the bills which had been introduced, but for more coercive measures. He referred their lordships to the papers on the table, where they would find a letter from Mr. Marsh, a magistrate at Westleigh, followed by the substance of certain depositions relative to the making of arms. Having communicated with Mr. Marsh, he had had access to the informations relative to the procuring of arms, and he could assure their lordships that he had sufficient knowledge of the parties to state that they were persons who deserved to be credited on oath. He thought it right to say this much, though the noble and learned lord had not, as on the former night, founded any argument on the anonymous nature of the correspondence. Some alterations might be necessary in the provisions of the bills, but if the noble lords on the other side had the opportunities which had occurred to him, of ascertaining the credibility of the evidence, he had no doubt that they would come to the same conclusion as himself.

Lord Erskine gave full weight to the observations which had fallen from the noble lord, but still could not rely on the truth of the evidence generally. He had been taught by experience to place no implicit faith in such informations. Their lordships might recollect, that a great mass of similar informations had in 1794, been referred to committees of both Houses of parliament; and that, upon the reports made by those committees, indictments for high-treason were found against certain individuals. When, however, the persons accused were tried they were acquitted. There was evidence enough to satisfy parliament, but not evidence enough to satisfy a jury of the country. Recollecting these things, he could not place confidence in such evidence as appeared in the papers on the table. The noble lord surely would not say, that anonymous information was to be relied upon by the House with as much assurance as the evidence of persons whose names were made public, and who might be called before them. When testimony was given, he liked to see the witness's face; and if an opportunity for that was afforded, it might be ascertained whether the evidence came from a spy or not. He must say that the manasures were altogether inconsistent with the principles of free government. When he looked at all the bills on the table, and thought how little England would be like England, when once they were passed, he could not help being filled with indignation and disgust at such a melancholy prospect. How fortunate would it be for the country if another course were adopted. Conciliatory measures would do more to restore confidence and tranquillity, than all the rigorous enactments that could be adopted.

The Lord Chancellor, in consequence of what had fallen from his noble and learned friend, thought it necessary to state, that when he found it his duty, in 1794, to prefer charges of high treason against certain individuals, he did not proceed on the credit of any report of either House of parliament, but upon the credit which he gave to information on oath. His noble and learned friend thought that England would be unlike England when these bills were passed; but he would ask their lordships what they supposed England would be like if they did not pass? It was only by passing these bills that they could preserve the country from destruction. He always paid the highest respect to the opinion of his noble and learned friend, but it appeared that, on the present occasion, he had misunderstood the clause in the act relative to the seizure of arms. It was not the mere possession of any dirk, dagger, pistol, or other weapon, that gave the power of searching a house, but the possession of some such weapon "for any purpose dangerous to the public peace." The overlooking of these words made an important difference in the view of the clause. A man might be possessed of a dagger, not only without any improper, but for a laudable purpose. He recollected being in the House of Commons when a great man, now no more (Mr. Burke), but whose memory was stamped with immortality, threw down a dagger on the floor in the course of his speech. That dagger was still preserved, but the person in whose possession it was, certainly did not hold it "for any purpose dangerous to the public peace," but in order that it might be transmitted to posterity as a memorial of that great man who had been instrumental in bringing about the adoption of the course of policy which had saved the country, and rendered England what England now was. With regard to the constitutional question of the right of the people to possess arms for their own defence, which had been alluded to, the noble and learned lord observed that, in looking at the bill of rights, the principle was not laid down in so broad a manner as it was frequently represented, and that it was accompanied with the strong qualification, that subjects might have arms suitable to their conditions. There was, therefore, little force in the objection urged on this ground. But if their lordships had any doubt of the propriety of passing these bills, it would be removed on giving a fair consideration to the evidence contained in the papers on the table. If the persons to whom that evidence referred, were arming and training with the intention attributed to them, then were they guilty of nothing less than high treason. If their object was to give to meetings, by the collection of great numbers, the quality of physical force, for the purpose of procuring, by the display of that physical force, any alteration in the government, in church or state—if this were done by any individuals, either in this city or any other part of the country, he must declare that such a proceeding was an overt act of treason. With respect to the bill before the House, it never could be supposed that it was wished to render it one of unnecessary rigour. It would be for their lordships, when it went into the committee, to consider all the details, and to render it as lenient as possible.

Lord Redesdale regarded the reports of the secret committees of 1794 as standing on unquestionable authority. There was not a single fact in them, which, when brought before a jury, was disputed or discredited. The attempt to lessen their authority was, therefore, perfectly fruitless. The charges of erroneous statements which had been made against these and subsequent reports were all unfounded. That which had been advanced against the report of one of their lordships committees consisted in an evasion. It referred to a word which had been inserted in the report without a qualification. The word "correspondence" should have been "correspondence by messengers."

Lord Holland, when he saw so many tremendous bills on the table affecting the liberty of the subject, did not think it necessary to dwell much upon the transactions of 1794. He was not now disposed to consider in what manner the noble and learned lord on the woolsack had at that period performed his duty. But another noble and learned lord had asserted that the facts stated in the reports of 1794, and upon which no verdict was obtained, were not disputed. Mark the able reasoner! Did he not know, that all the facts in the reports which were made the subject of charges against the gentlemen tried for high treason, were after the investigation of juries, discredited? How could it be said that they remained undisputed? It was not said, that because the reports of 1794 or 1812 had proved false, the evidence now laid before the House must necessarily be false; but what had occurred with respect to these reports afforded reason for caution now. The noble and learned lord had alluded to the use which Mr. Burke had made of a dagger in the House of Commons. No man had a higher opinion of the talents of Mr. Burke, than that which he entertained; but if he had wished to cite an example either of his eloquence or judgment in debate, he certainly should not have fixed on that particular argument which the noble and learned lord had chosen to select. For his part, he should have preferred some of the profound political maxims which he had often uttered in the House of Commons. The present discussions might have brought to the recollection of the noble and learned lord, what that celebrated statesman had said on popular discontents. He had on one occasion observed, when the people were charged with being discontented, that if that charge was true, this at least must be allowed—either that they were a very bad people, or had a very bad administration. That was a maxim which would keep its place in his mind at least as long as the scene of the dagger. The noble viscount, from the manner in which he had introduced these bills, had placed him in a considerable degree of embarrassment—not on account of any deficiency in the explanation of his object, for that he had given in the most candid manner, of all the bills in the aggregate. But though there might be details to which he did not wish to object, the whole of the measures rested on grounds which prevented him from giving even these details his unqualified concurrence. For instance, he perhaps, with some qualifications, would not object to the measure for preventing secret training, or to the seizure of arms. Though he was no lawyer, he could easily understand that training for a seditious purpose must be a crime of some description or other. This acknowledgment was not, however, sufficient to induce him to agree to the present bill, as it began with an allegation, of the truth of which he was not convinced. The noble lord opposite (lord Lilford) thought the evidence sufficient: he did not, and there they differed. He wished for more evidence, because the experience of former testimony had taught him to doubt the present. He was therefore anxious to have it understood, that in agreeing to any of the details, he by no means sanctioned the preamble of the bill. It was said, that training for seditious purposes was a misdemeanor; but that there was a difficulty in obtaining legal proof; and to remove this difficulty it was necessary to come to parliament. This was a reasonable proposition; but if all that was wanted was to remove a doubt as to the law, why introduce the measure with an objectionable preamble? The details of the bill were not, however, free from objection. It appeared a great inconsistency that the person who drilled should be liable to seven years transportation, and those he trained to two years imprisonment. The purpose of the driller might happen to be more innocent than that of the drilled. Why, then, was there such a difference in the punishments? The noble lord who spoke second in the debate had referred to his knowledge of certain informations; but the noble lord would surely acknowledge that anonymous evidence could not be expected to convey with it the same weight with persons who had not the same opportunities of information which that noble lord had. But he had reason to know that in that part of the country from which the evidence came, there were many Orange lodges, which were a great cause of dissension. If the names of the individuals who had given evidence were disclosed, it would be known what and who they were. If their lordships had them before them, they might ascertain whether or not they were members of these lodges. No man could lay his hand on his heart, and say, that he could rely on anonymous evidence with as much confidence as on that the authors of which were known. He, therefore, could not agree to the preamble, as it asserted that of which he could have no knowledge. But with the qualifications he had stated, he was willing to say "content" to the principle of the present bill.—With respect to the second bill, it had been contended, that it contained no violation of any constitutional right. The noble secretary of state had not made such an assertion on introducing the measures. On the contrary, he very candidly admitted, that with regard to the bill on the subject of the press, there was, to a certain extent, a violation of principle. He was astonished that it should be supposed that this bill was sanctioned by the words of the Bill of Rights, which said that the people might have arms for their defence suitable to their conditions. He looked back with gratitude to those great men who, at the period of the revolution, settled the government on the principles of liberty. Was it to be supposed, that by the introduction of these words, they meant to deprive the mass of the people of their right to possess arms for their own defence, to make a distinction between the rich and the poor, and to deprive the latter of the advantage given to the former? The principal record in the Bill of Rights was applicable equally to the rich and the poor, and it was most insulting to the people, to tell them that this measure for the disarming of certain districts was according to the provisions of the Bill of Rights. But if, unhappily, it were necessary to depart from the principle of that great constitutional act, let at least the disarming be done with as much tenderness as possible; let it not be accompanied with any questioning of that principle. He saw with satisfaction, that information on oath, before the arms were seized, was necessary; and though the clause referred to by his noble and learned friend was liable to the construction he had put upon it, yet the bill altogether was better than that of 1812. There were some of the details objectionable, but what he had to say on them would be better reserved for the committee. As the bill was contrary to a great principle of the constitution, their lordships ought to be the more careful to prevent the evil from being aggravated by unnecessary rigour in the provisions. Into the great question of the unconstitutional nature of the measures, he should not now enter, more especially as his noble friend (earl Grey), whose absence from indisposition he lamented, had discussed that part of the subject much better than he could. His noble friend had fully stated all his sentiments and feelings, and he did not wish to weaken the impression which his speech must have made. He must, however, observe, that he believed the whole policy of his majesty's ministers to be founded in error. He would not say of them, or of any other set of men, that their intention was, to subvert the constitution, in order to acquire for themselves unlimited power; but if they had such an intention, he knew no better method that could be pursued, than that of occasional remissness in checking the progress of sedition, in allowing it to grow to an alarming height, and throwing on parliament the duty of putting it down. In such a state of things, many honourable and good men could see no other course left, than to adopt the measures of rigour which were recommended.—But he should say no more on this part of the subject. The two bills under consideration were the least objectionable of the whole series of measures. If he gave any opposition to them beyond the point in which he disagreed as to details, it was because he considered them as parts of an objectionable whole. On the contrary, if he concurred in parts of these measures, he begged it might not be therefore understood that he gave any approbation to the whole. He admitted, as he had said before, that this bill, by disarming only certain districts, and by being limited in its duration to a certain time, did as much to render the measure palatable as it was possible to do. But still their lordships should recollect, that the necessity of disarming the people, if that necessity really existed, implied a will and intention on the part of the people to oppose the government of the country. He believed that the greatest power that could be exercised by any government, either despotic or limited, was to attempt to disarm the people. He stated it, therefore, as one of his strongest objections to all these laws, that if they did not succeed in accomplishing the object for which they were framed, they must prove highly dangerous, on account of the impressions they would make, and the wounds they would leave on the minds of the people. On all these considerations he could not say "content" to the second bill. As to the first, it certainly was better than that passed in 1812, and therefore it was not a measure on which he would express that abhorrence and detestation with which he viewed the system of coercion about to be established.

The Lord Chancellor, in explanation,

denied having said any thing with regard to the principles recognized in the bill of rights, that could admit of the interpretation given by the noble lord. Nothing that fell from him could justify the inference, that it held out one law for the rich and another for the poor. He was as proud of the Bill of Rights as any noble lord could be; but at the same time he considered that it did not hold out a single protection to him, or to their lordships, which it did not equally afford to every class of his majesty's subjects. In alluding to that part of the bill which allows the subject to have arms for his own protection he did not sacrifice a single principle; and while he continued in public life, he would pledge himself, that as far as it could depend on him, the subject should never lose the benefit of a single word or letter which it contained. It was not against having arms for his own protection, but against using them for the destruction of the constitution, that either what he had said, or what the bill before the House provided, could fairly be supposed to apply.

The Marquis of Buckingham said, he should not object to this bill, because it was one not for disarming the people, but for preventing them from using their arms against the constitution. He had been surprised to hear his noble friend accuse the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, of having misquoted the Bill of Rights, and of having said that there should be one law for the rich, and another for the poor—that the one had a right to keep arms in his possession, and that the other had no such right. He could not conceive on what grounds these charges were founded; for what the noble and learned lord had said was, that every man was entitled to have arms suitable to his protection; and that, the moment he rose in arms against the constitution, it was the duty of parliament to interpose, not, indeed, to prevent him from having arms, but to take care that he should not use them in overturning the constitution of the country. The noble lord had deprecated the interference of parliament by any new legislative enactments. But what had their lordships on the former evening been discussing? What was the question that had then been agitated? Was not the proposition of the noble marquis (Lansdowne) that they should go into an inquiry? And yet the noble lord now objected to these measures, because they would throw upon parliament the onus and the odium of interposing. It was important, considering the nature of the evil for which a remedy was now required, that no time should be lost. They were at present placed between two difficulties. He agreed with the noble lord in thinking that one of the greatest mischiefs that arose from ill-designing persons creating alarm in the country, was the necessity of giving a great preponderance of power to the crown. But they must either make sacrifices to obviate this difficulty, or compromise the safety of the state by not checking those whose object was to overturn it. He had heard a great deal about its being the duty of parliament to conciliate the people; and he had waited long to hear in what manner this conciliation was to be accomplished. No doubt the principle was a good one, and parliament ought to adopt it, if it was practicable. The noble lords had all said, that conciliatory measures ought to be resorted to; but they had not told the House till now, what measures would satisfy the people. Now, however, it was said by the noble lord, that nothing more or less than a reform in parliament was necessary, and that nothing else would satisfy the people. He did not wish at present to enter into a discussion on the propriety or impropriety of granting a reform in parliament. He himself had a distinct idea on the subject; but how was it with the noble lords? There were not two of them who agreed in their views of the question. The people at their public meetings had declared, that they would not be contented unless they obtained annual parliaments and universal suffrage; and therefore, the noble lords must either offer the people what they would throw back in their face, or they must agree to the measures proposed.

Lord Holland, in explanation, denied that he had charged his noble and learned friend on the woolsack, with misquoting the Bill of Rights. All he intended to convey was, that he had frittered away a part of it in his version. The noble and learned lord had taken high dudgeon at this. As he had since explained himself, no doubt could be entertained with respect to the meaning of his words; but as they were first delivered, he (lord Holland) being something of an angler, thought he had a good bite [a laugh]. The noble marquis was guilty of an inaccuracy, when he supposed him to have recommended parliamentary reform as the means of conciliation. He had not, in fact, mentioned parliamentary reform at all, or even if he had, the noble marquis, who had certainly formed a distinct opinion on the subject, might allow him the credit of having a distinct one also.

The Duke of Sussex said, he rose in consequence of the speech of the noble marquis who had attacked that side of the House as if, in general, the principles of radical reform were adopted by them; and he wished that noble lords, when they spoke of any individuals, or, indeed, of any matter whatever should be correct in what they stated to the House. He did not agree in opinion with those who approved of all the measures that were brought forward; but he would take that opportunity of stating his acquiescence in the bills then under their lordships' consideration. He regretted to hear from the other side of the House opinions which implied the imputation, that noble lords on his side were inimical to the interests of the state; they felt they were contending for the interests of the country as much as the noble lords opposite; and while he differed very much from them in political sentiment, he should endeavour so to express his dissent as not to inflame the public mind. He should beg leave to advert to what had fallen from the learned lord;—for any subject connected with the Bill of Rights, with Magna Charta, or any other of the great barriers of the constitution, every one must feel to be important. The learned lord would allow him to say, with every respect for his character, and with great deference to his legal knowledge, that when he stated his opinion that certain proceedings were treasonable, he (his Royal Highness) should have wished that the learned lord had been in the situation of attorney-general when these proceedings occurred, because he was convinced that that opinion, if stated and acted upon by the attorney-general, would have relieved the country from a great part of the evil now said to exist. He would state to the noble marquis, that although he was not a radical reformer, he had an opinion on that subject; an opinion as distinct, and, he hoped, as constitutional, as that of the noble marquis himself; and whenever they should enter the lists of argument on the subject, he hoped they should fight fairly and manfully. He agreed with the noble lords opposite, that the House ought not to lose its time; but still he must look to causes, and he would say, that those physicians who did not examine minutely, but took the symptom for the disorder, might kill the patient, but would never cure the disease. He returned his acknowledgments to their lordships for the attention with which they had listened to him. In the situation in which he stood, he was anxious that his opinion should be known, as well from his attachment to the constitution, as from the affection he entertained for the interests of the people.

The Earl of Darnley thought it his duty to give his support to some of the measures before the House. With respect to the arming bill, it was universally admitted that such a measure could be justified only on the ground of necessity. The only objection which he was prepared to make to this bill he should take the liberty of throwing out at present, for the consideration of the noble lord opposite. He thought it extremely dangerous to give to any man the power of entering another's house at night; and, if possible, it would be expedient to avoid giving that power. He would not waste their lordships' time in arguing on the inexpediency of this provision, or of the present measures in general; but he would take the liberty of inquiring, before he decided, whether the present measures, supposing them to be necessary now, might not have been avoided, if a different course had been adopted by government. He apprehended they all considered the measure to be grounded on the fact, that arms were possessed by individuals for dangerous purposes. From the papers on the table, however, he thought that this measure arose entirely from the transactions at Manchester on the fatal 16th of August. It was, no doubt, to be lamented, that itinerant demagogues were going about the country, and inflaming the minds of the people; but still it was known that meetings of the same description as that at Manchester had taken place in other parts of the country, and had separated without any bad consequences. He maintained, therefore, that whatever evil disposition there was in the situation of the country, it was mainly owing to the unfortunate conduct of the magistrates on that day, and to the subsequent conduct of ministers in stifling inquiry. If government had granted an inquiry, he was satisfied that the evils now to be provided against by these measures would not have existed.

Let the people be satisfied that parliament was prepared to do them justice by going into an inquiry, and then it would not be necessary to have recourse to measures of extraordinary severity. The noble marquis had said, that noble lords on the opposition side of the House, talked of conciliating the people, but did not tell how that was to be accomplished; and at last he had come to the subject of parliamentary reform. He was astonished to hear the noble marquis imputing to his noble friend the wish to establish annual parliaments and universal suffrage. Their lordships would do his noble friend the justice to acknowledge, that he had said nothing that could warrant such an imputation. In answer to what the noble marquis had said on the subject of conciliation, it was only necessary to observe, that the measure of inquiry proposed by his noble friend (the marquis of Lansdowne) would have been most conciliating and satisfactory to the country. After some observations against the coercive system of ministers, the noble earl remarked, that in order to govern the people of this country, it was necessary to appeal to their hearts, not to their fears; and that endeavouring to pass such laws as these would excite apprehensions that the object was to govern them by the bayonet. For his own part he must acknowledge, that he would rather be governed by the noble earl and the noble viscount opposite, than by Mr. Hunt and Dr. Watson; for any government however bad, was better than theirs.

The Earl of Darlington expressed considerable diffidence in offering himself to the attention of their lordships, but he felt it a duty which he could not decline to address them for a few moments. He presented himself to their notice not merely as a person possessing some estate in the country, and respecting the laws and constitution under which he lived—not merely as a member of the legislature, in whose dignity and security he was interested—but as the holder of a situation under the Crown, which he had had the honour to fill ever since the year 1792. He had forborne to obtrude himself upon former occasions, but his name had been already introduced to their lordships' notice in the documents which were laid on the table by his majesty's ministers. It might be supposed, from his residence in the county of which he was surrounded. He had taken great pains to ascertain their opinions, and though in the northern part of the county of Durham he considered at one period that they were quiet, he could not help observing that there were some symptoms not indicative of perfect tranquillity. They were silent, indeed, but their silence was of a sullen character. A meeting was held in the neighbourhood of Newcastle, the numbers of which were greatly increased by a difference between the proprietors of the collieries and their workmen. The meeting was conducted quietly, but the manner of its assemblage was such as ought not only to have attracted the notice of government, but of all who wished well to the country. In some time after, it was intimated to him that a rising would soon take place. He had then no fear of such an event; nor should he now have intruded on their lordships, if he had not received intelligence, within these few days, which confirmed that intimation. From that intelligence he was certain, that at the present moment, while the deliberations of parliament were in progress, a correspondence was going on between the North of Durham and the south of Newcastle, for the purpose of carrying projects into effect for the subversion of the constitution. Under this impression he felt it to be their lordships' duty to unite in the endeavour to find out the persons who aimed at the destruction of the government, or endeavoured to excite tumult and disturbance which endangered the whole property of the kingdom. Here it was that he disagreed from his noble friends with whom he generally acted. They had expressed their dislike and suspicion of anonymous information. The principle was certainly just; but he could say, that he had received intelligence upon which he could place the most implicit reliance, but the authors of which he would not upon any account disclose. As far indeed, as he could form a judgment on the subject, he was with great deference obliged to differ from the notions of his noble friends on that subject. With respect to the bills of which the secretary of state had given the outlines on a former day, he had some hesitation in agreeing to them without qualification. Some objections might be stated, and some alterations might be necessary, but as far as the general tenor of such bills went, he believed they were absolutely required. Though he was far from being an alarmist, when he saw such things pass before him, the existence of which he could not doubt any more than he could doubt his eye-sight, it was his duty to state that ministers were called upon to bring forward some measures extremely strong in order to meet the emergency. It would have been a matter of great satisfaction to him if an union could have taken place between both sides of the House on this occasion; but unhappily that was not accomplished. That inquiry should take place as to the causes which brought the country into this state, was a fact he was ready to admit; but it was foreign to the present question—as foreign indeed as the question of reform, and like that only a waste of the time of the House. Reform was, in his opinion, to some extent necessary; but he should now conclude by stating, that with some trifling alterations the present bills had his approbation, as well as the other measures with which they were connected.

The Earl of Strathmore rose also to make a statement to the House, which he thought it of importance that they should be acquainted with. He corroborated the statement of the noble lord who preceded him, on the subject of the meetings in the neighbourhood of Newcastle, which he described as inconsiderable in point of numbers at first. The last, however, was alarming, both in point of numbers, and with regard to the flags exhibited. The motto upon one of the flags was, “the day of retribution is at hand,” and the device a death’s head and bones. Though no mischief was done, he was convinced that they were ripe for mischief. He had certain information, that many persons attended the meeting with pistols, and had that day received a letter from a most respectable clergyman at Newcastle, which would show the extent to which the alarm had reached in that part of the country. The letter commenced by observing, that about twenty factious demagogues, who ought to be hanged or incarcerated, had done all the mischief, and succeeded in preparing the minds of the people for rebellion. It proceeded to state that an hon. and rev. gentleman, a magistrate of the county, the brother of a noble earl whom he did not then see in his place, had with his family taken refuge in that town. What must the state of that county be when magistrates were obliged to fly for refuge. He was glad that the noble lords who sat on the same side of the House with himself, had not objected to the bills under consideration. He hoped that no time would be lost in passing them, for he was sure their lordships must see that unless they were carried no man could answer for the safety of the country. Another fact, of which he wished to apprise the House, was, that the colliers were divided into different classes, consisting each of twenty persons, under the direction of a leader. The Black Dwarf, The Republican, The Cap of Liberty, and other blasphemous publications were the constant subjects of their study, and he feared were too successful in corrupting their minds. He trusted, however, that they would soon be convinced of the error of their ways. In addition to this, it was certain that there were 14 or 15,000 men on the banks of the Weir and the Tyne ready for rebellion. After what had been said of the northern part of Durham, he was much gratified at being able to bear testimony to the loyalty of the south-western district. There was little or no disaffection there, and he was persuaded that the great mass of the people were ready to defend the king, the constitution, and the laws. In the north of Yorkshire the same spirit prevailed, and he was persuaded would soon manifest itself in any case of danger. He had said thus much in corroboration of what had fallen from the noble earl, and in explanation of the letter he had received that morning, which he thought it of importance that the House should be acquainted with.

The bills were then read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, December 2.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] Lord Castlereagh having moved the order of the day for the second reading of the Seditious Meetings Prevention bill, Mr. M. A. Taylor begged leave to ask a question of the noble lord, whether it was the intention of his majesty’s ministers to propose any alteration or amendment in the bill, or to allow it to stand in the state it then was: he was proceeding to discuss the matter, when the Speaker called him to order. Mr. M. A. Taylor resumed, and observed, that it was not his intention to debate on the subject before the House, but merely to ask a simple question. Lord Castlereagh was sure the hon. member had too much experience not to know that the committee was the place for discussing the details. Mr. Grenfell rose, and was about to state his opinion on the bill, when Lord Castlereagh put it to the hon. gentleman whether it would not be more convenient to give his sentiments on the question for the second reading. Mr. Grenfell acquiescing, the order of the day was read. The Solicitor General then got up to move the second reading of the bill, when Mr. Tierney observed, that if the noble lord did not intend to commence the debate, it was open to his hon. friend to speak. After some further discussion, in which lord Castlereagh, Mr. Tierney, Mr. Grenfell, the Speaker, and Mr. Perceval participated,

Mr. Grenfell said, it was not his intention to detain the House at length, but he wished to avail himself of the opportunity of expressing the opinion he entertained of the general proposition, of which the bill before the House formed a part, and which engaged the almost exclusive attention of the country at large. He confessed that he stated that opinion under feelings of greater pain than any he had experienced from the first hour of his sitting in that House to the moment at which he spoke; for his sense of public duty compelled him to adopt a course decidedly opposite to that pursued by his hon. friends near him, with whom he had hitherto had the gratification of being politically connected, and with whom, notwithstanding this exception, he hoped to remain politically connected for life. He was one of those who had abstained from giving any vote, either on the amendment proposed by his right hon. friend to the address, or on the motion made by his noble friend on Tuesday. He had so abstained from feelings of a personal nature, and in doing so was not aware that he had been guilty of any dereliction of his public duty. He could assure his right hon. and his noble friend, that the only motives which induced him to abstain from voting on the occasions which he had mentioned were, his personal regard and affection for his right hon., and his respect for his noble friend. He could no longer, however, allow any private feeling to interfere with that line of conduct which his public duty seemed to him to demand. His only object in rising at that moment was to state, in the face of the House and of the country, that from the best consideration which he had been able to give to a subject which he was quite aware involved the dearest interests of the empire—from all the information which he had obtained on that subject, sanctioned and strengthened as that information was by the observations made on a recent evening by the noble lord who represented the county of Lancaster, he felt it incumbent on him to declare that, reserving to himself the right to object to any of the details of the measure, and to support any amendment to them, from what quarter soever it might proceed, and also reserving to himself the right of further consideration with respect to the expediency of making any or all the measures temporary in their application—he was prepared to give his steady and hearty concurrence and support to the principle of all the measures recommended by the noble lord on Monday last. Such were his opinions, and on those opinions he was prepared to act, and he should therefore assent to the second reading of the bill under consideration.

The question being put for reading the bill a second time,

The Solicitor General congratulated the House on the candid speech which had just fallen from the hon. gentleman, and said he flattered himself, that after the question should be fully investigated, and, after the true character of the measures which his majesty's government had thought it necessary to recommend should be fully developed, in addition to the vote of the hon. gentleman, those measures would claim and obtain the support of many other hon. gentlemen, who were not in the habit of acting politically with his majesty's ministers. In undertaking the duty which he was about to perform, he must request the indulgence of the House. It was a duty which, in consequence of the absence of his hon. and learned friend had been suddenly cast upon him since he came down to the House; and he must intreat the indulgence of the House with respect to the manner of his performing the task. Of course he was familiar with all the details of the measures in question; but it was a very different thing to be acquainted with those details, and to be prepared suddenly to unfold them with the distinctness and precision so desirable on such an occasion. He would endeavour, however, to discharge the task that had fallen upon him with as much simplicity and clearness as he could command; and to explain the nature and character of the measures which it had been advisable to recommend to parliament, for the purpose of meeting the extraordinary dangers with which the country was menaced; dangers, which, in his opinion, there was a great disposition, on the part of many of the hon. gentlemen opposite, to underrate. A right hon. gentleman had attempted to show, that those dangers were principally confined to two counties in the north of the island—Lancashire, and a part of Cheshire. It was only necessary to look at the documents on the table, and to advert to facts notoriously before the public, to be satisfied that such a representation was wholly unfounded. It had been stated, that in Yorkshire no coercive measures were necessary. The papers on the table, however afforded decided evidence of the necessity of legislative interposition with respect to Yorkshire, as well as the other counties in the north of the island; for in those papers it was stated on authority, that although no immediate danger was to be apprehended, there was reason to suppose that a conspiracy of a most alarming and extensive character would burst forth, unless great precautions were taken to suppress it; and it was stated to be matter of absolute certainty, that revolution was the aim of those who were engaged in it. Was the House, therefore, to be told, that it was only to a part of Cheshire, and to Lancashire, that the proposed measures ought to be directed? But he would go a step further. He would refer, not merely to the documents on the table, but to the general notoriety of the state of the county of Northumberland, of the state of the county of Cumberland, of the state of the county of Durham, and above all, of the state of the western parts of Scotland, especially in the neighbourhood of Glasgow and Paisley. He would omit all mention of the metropolis and its vicinity. He would not mention the meetings which had taken place in Coventry and other parts of Warwickshire, and those which had been attempted in the county of Stafford. He would merely observe, that the state of the northern district which he had adverted to, comprehending an extent of 290 miles, and including a large and active population, afforded abundant ground for the measures proposed.

There was one very alarming feature in the character of the designs evidently entertained by the disaffected, namely the activity with which objects contemplated by them were pursued, and the rapidity with which the principles of sedition were diffused from the head quarters in Lancashire to the most extreme outposts. This was a most formidable part of the evil, and proved the necessity, not only of legislative precautions, but of adopting those precautions with the utmost expedition. It had been said by some hon. gentlemen that the disease was merely local. Good God! was it possible that those by whom such an assertion was made had entirely forgotten what had already occurred in the world? Was all the experience derived from the course and progress of the French revolution to be lost to the world? Who did not know that at the commencement of that revolution, a large part of France was not alienated from the existing government? Who did not know that it was only in the great manufacturing and populous districts in France that disaffection originally manifested itself, and that to the inertness of the friends of monarchy in the other parts of that kingdom the deplorable consequences that followed were attributable? He would ask the House whether, if the principles avowed, and the schemes going on in the northern districts, had extended to the whole island, the revolution would not only (according to the expression in one of the newspapers) have begun, but have been perfect and consummate? Having stated so much with respect to the extent, he would now consider the character of the proceedings in question; for it was indispensable to take a view (however slight) of the combined danger, in order to enable the House duly to appreciate the merits of the combined measures recommended to meet it. The particular points against which the proposed measures were directed were—first, the training to the use of arms for revolutionary purposes; secondly, the collecting of arms to be placed in the hands of those previously trained to their use, in order to carry into effect the designs of the disaffected against the constitution; thirdly (and it was a consideration of the utmost importance), the means of intimidation resorted to, and actively spreading through the country, for the purpose of checking all opposition to the plans of the evil disposed, and encouraging and supporting the disaffected.

—In addition, he would recall to the attention of the House the open and unblushing attempts at intimidation by assassination. The principle of assassination had been avowed in the metropolis, in public debating houses, and in newspapers. In the Reformers Gazette, at Manchester, in July last, a particular individual was openly pointed out for destruction, and it was asked—"Is there no noble Brutus who will plunge a dagger into the heart of the tyrant?" The next important point to which he would advert was that which formed the foundation of the bill, the second reading of which was proposed to-night, namely, the assemblies collected under the pretence of petitioning for parliamentary reform, but with the purpose of exhibiting the strength of the disaffected, encouraging their friends, and intimidating their opponents. The intimidation thus occasioned was a most formidable engine in advancing the plans of the individuals in question. Another, and a great evil against which the measures recommended by his majesty's government were directed, was the state of the press of this country, not of the regular and established, but of the cheap and low press. The evil was admitted on all hands; whatever difference of opinion might exist with respect to the nature of the means that ought to be adopted to counteract the poison which had of late years been so actively diffused throughout the community. He had now briefly pointed out the various parts of the system against which the measures proposed by his majesty's ministers were directed. The question was, whether, as some measures must of necessity be adopted for correcting the evils, the measures proposed by government were not as effective, and at the same time as moderate and constitutional, as any that could be devised for the purpose? He could assure the House, that in the preparation of those measures it had been the most anxious wish of government to trench as little as possible on the laws and constitution of the country; and when the various measures which they proposed should come to be thoroughly investigated, he was persuaded it would be found that they were calculated to carry into effect the object in view, with as little injury to those laws and to that constitution as the circumstance of the case would permit. An hon. and learned friend of his on the other side of the House, had very properly stated, that it was impossible to consider the operation of any one of these measures without looking to the whole of the bills to be introduced. Before he directed the attention of the House to—

Mr. Brougham rose, and observed, that the hon. and learned member had mistaken him. What he had said was, that it would be difficult to consider any one of the measures proposed without looking to them as a whole. The hon. and learned member seemed to be about to go into a discussion of the other measures, which he conceived was rather premature.

The Solicitor General said, that in order to meet the wishes of his hon. and learned friend, he would treat the subject as he had advised, and touch as lightly as possible upon the other measures to be introduced, but the evils which the House were called upon to counteract, formed a combined system, and could only be counteracted by another system equally combined in its nature; and therefore the bearing of one measure upon another, as if one evil upon another, could not be lost sight of. The first point to which he wished to direct the attention of the House was, the bill to be introduced for restraining the liberty of the press. The object of this measure was, as he before stated, to restrain the publication of those cheap pamphlets, which had occasioned such mischief in the country. There was not any man who more zealously advocated the liberty of the press than he did. The liberty of the press and the trial by jury were the main pillars which supported the constitution; and he could assure the House that he was the last man in the country who would advocate the invasion of either of those inestimable privileges of the people. But what was the character of the publications to which he alluded? What were the evils to be apprehended from them? They were sold at such a price as afforded the lowest orders an opportunity of perusing them. The persons who sold them were men of no property or character; and besides, they were very difficult to be come at. Those persons declared, and with truth, that those publications were a powerful engine in their hands; and that the people were, and must continue to be strongly influenced by them—Was it then too much to expect, that the publishers of such pamphlets should give security for the payment of such penalties as might be imposed on them for an abuse of the powers of their mighty engine? Was it too much to say, that in the event of their being convicted not by any minister or magistrate, but by an impartial jury of their countrymen, there should be a fund from which the fines to which they had subjected themselves should be certainly forthcoming? In what respect could this be considered as an invasion of the liberty of the press? The bill demanded security—nothing more; it did not ask for any previous censorship: it did not ask for any limitation of the trial by jury. If ministers had proposed any such measure, they would have deserved and incurred not only the reprobation of that House, but the reprobation of the whole country. The press was a powerful machine, and might be turned to good or to bad purposes, according to the disposition of those who used it; was it not, therefore, right, to call upon publishers to give security that they would so use as not to abuse it? This was the first measure which ministers had to recommend; it was perfectly in unison with the constitution, and he augured that it would be found effectual to counteract the mischief. Another point in these publications was, their nature and their character. In the act of the 38th of the king, when it was first proposed to impose a tax upon any paper which contained any public news, intelligence, or occurrences, it was considered that those words were so general that they might embrace all periodical publications whatsoever; and this was proved by the circumstance that many actions were commenced upon them in the courts of law. In order to meet the present danger of the times, it was now proposed to extend the regulations of that act, so that those publications which assumed the existence of facts, and then argued upon and drew deductions from them, should be made liable to the tax upon newspapers, just as if they contained the first account of the facts themselves. This was the second point in the system: the next was to inflict an increased degree of punishment, that of transportation, at the discretion of the court, upon any individual against whom a second conviction was obtained. The principle on which this enactment was founded was well known to the English law; and he would ask the gentleman opposite, when a party, after being once convicted of a blasphemous and seditious libel, came forward a second time to brave and insult the court, whether it was not proper that such discretion should be vested in the judge? When they said that such enactments were hostile to the liberty of the press, they ought to consider that they were confined to publications of a certain size and character. He now came to the bill against military training. It was said by members on the opposite side that the existing laws were strong enough to prevent it. A single word on that argument would be quite sufficient. If any persons met for the purpose of training themselves to the use of arms, and for the express object of opposing the government, such training would constitute an overt act of high treason; and therefore if the intention of the party training could be proved to the satisfaction of a jury, no new law would be found necessary. But though it might be an easy matter to convict an individual of this training, it might be very difficult to bring home to him the intention with which he was thus training himself, in a court of justice. It was therefore proposed that no persons should meet to be drilled to the use of arms without a licence from the Crown. From what had fallen from hon. gentlemen on the other side, he did not expect that this measure would incur any opposition. The next measure to which he must call the attention of the House, was of a technical nature. It was that for accelerating trials in cases of misdemeanor. It might, as the law at present stood, be 2 years or 3 circuits after an offence had been committed, before it could be brought on for trial. This was the old law of the land in cases of misdemeanor, and formerly had also been the law in civil actions; but as serious inconvenience to suitors had resulted from such delay, a remedy had been introduced for it many years ago. It was now proposed to apply the same remedy to misdemeanors, but in so guarded a manner, as not to trench upon any method of defence which the accused might be inclined or advised to adopt. He was not to be compelled to take his trial at the first assize, without sufficient cause; he was not to be deprived of the benefit arising from a writ of certiorari. Circumstances might so happen that he could not obtain a fair hearing in the inferior courts; he was, therefore left at liberty to remove his cause into the superior courts, and all his rights and privileges there remained as before. He therefore did not expect any objection would be made to this bill, unless it were to be contended that it was a benefit to the subject to have a delay of justice. He now came to the bill for the seizing of arms, which was founded upon facts, that were unfortunately but too notorious. By that bill it was provided that magistrates in certain districts should have the power to seize all such arms as appeared to be inconsistent with the public safety. In every one of its clauses care was taken not to trench upon the liberty of the subject. It had been provided that in all cases pikes and pike-heads should be seized, because it was evident that they must be intended for improper purposes; but where the weapons were of a more doubtful nature they were not to be seized, unless some individual should give information upon oath that they were intended to carry illegal, and unconstitutional objects into effect. The magistrate might then seize them, but his decision was not final: the person conceiving himself injured by the seizure might go before him, and demand to be allowed to prove that they were kept for innoxious purposes: and if that circumstance were satisfactorily made out, the arms must be restored. If not so restored, he might appeal to the quarter sessions, for their restitution, so that every possible care was taken to protect the innocent from any thing like unjust persecution. He had nothing more to say upon this bill, except that if it were passed into an act, it was to be merely temporary and local. He had now shortly gone through the chief points in the system which it was proposed to adopt; but before he proceeded to the remainder of them, he should beg leave to make a few remarks on an argument which had been used against putting the press under any limitations. It had been said that the existing laws would have been found sufficient to punish all the breaches of them which had taken place, if they had been properly administered; and that the abuse of the liberty of the press, which all parties in the state now acknowledged to be enormous, had arisen from the negligence and supineness of the law-officers of the Crown. Personally, he had nothing to do with this complaint: and, therefore, he might be allowed to say, that the abuse, when thoroughly investigated, would not be traced to that source. It was possible that there might be libels published two or three years ago which had not been made the subject of prosecution. But what was the reason that they had not been prosecuted? Why, the evil had suddenly burst upon the country with all the impetuosity of a flood or a torrent, and it had been found impossible to check an irruption of so sudden and unexpected a nature, by the presentation of any bills of indictment to a grand jury, or the filing of any criminal information. If he were asked what was the cause of so great and so unexampled an evil, he would say that he could not develop the whole cause. He would, however, say, that the acquittal of Hone had partly occasioned it. When that individual was tried and acquitted eighteen months ago, for the publication of libels on which no reasonable man could entertain a shadow of doubt, libels which were denominated most seditious and blasphemous by the judge of the King's-bench, who passed sentence on a poor deluded wretch found guilty of vending them, his acquittal was hailed as a victory and a triumph by the gentlemen opposite; and the individual himself, though previously in a humble situation of life, and not over well provided with the gifts of fortune, found subscribers, and among them, he regretted to observe, several persons of rank and respectability, to give him a reward for the offences which he had committed. To that circumstance, he partly attributed the swarm of libellers which at present existed: it was not indeed the whole cause of the present evil, but it formed a great part of it; and it, therefore, ill became those who were now so clamorous, to complain that the evil was owing to the supineness and neglect of the law officers of the Crown. Having discussed, and, he hoped, refuted this objection, he should now proceed to the Seditious Meetings bill. It was contended on the other side, that the people had a right to meet in any numbers to deliberate upon any matter of public importance, to consider of any grievance, and to devise the best means of obtaining redress for such grievance. Whatever construction might have been put on the act of Charles 2nd by the judges of the court of King's-bench, on the trial of lord G. Gordon, which act, as it was unrevoked, was still the law of the land, he should not now dispute the existence of that right. He should assume as a settled point, that the people had a right to meet for the sake of deliberation, petition, remonstrance, or redress of grievances. But, admitting that to be the case, was it

likewise necessary to admit that they could meet with propriety in a tumultuous meeting, professing, indeed, legal and constitutional objects, but evidently pursuing ulterior illegal ones? Could any man have the boldness to assert, that it was not the duty of the legislature to interfere in such a case, not, indeed, to prevent discussion, but to place public meetings under such regulations that they might be held without injury to the constitution? What then was the remedy proposed? It was allowed the people to attend any public meeting that might be called by the lord lieutenant, or the sheriff, or the majority of the grand jury of the county, or by any five justices resident within it. If any one of those distinct bodies should concur in thinking a public meeting requisite to be holden "for the purpose of deliberating upon any public grievance, or any matter in church and state, or for the purpose of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution, or address, upon the subject thereof," the people might legally assemble under his or their authority. What was the objection to this provision? Why, that you might find a lord-lieutenant, a sheriff, a grand jury, and a whole magistracy, who would concur in not calling any one public meeting. If the question were a proper question to be discussed, surely among all the individuals designated in the bills as capable of convening a public meeting, some would be found inclined to do so; and if some were to be found, the objection as on a general principle was not a valid objection. But as if to obviate that objection, and to guard against such a contingency (for contingency it must be called) it was provided, that if the authorities above named would not call a meeting, the people might meet in their respective districts or parishes, though not in the tumultuous manner to which they had been of late accustomed. He hoped that he should not be understood as saying that the people were to be allowed to meet only in their districts or parishes—by no means: it was only a discretionary power assigned to them, in order to protect them from an abuse of power on the part of those who were authorized, and who yet refused, to call county meetings. What, however, must be the nature of that measure, on which neither a lord lieutenant, nor a sheriff, nor a majority of the grand jury, nor five justices could be found willing to call a meeting? But as it was possible that those authorities might act unjustly, it was to guard against the people being deprived of all opportunity of meeting that this clause was provided. He would ask the House, whether any measure could be proposed less exceptionable than the present? Ministers must either have drawn up new divisions of the country, or have adopted the old ones; and could any person doubt of the propriety of preserving the latter? Honourable gentlemen on the other side had said that they would oppose the details of these measures. After the explanation which he had given of the principle on which they were founded, and which he trusted that he had proved to be correct, he did not expect that they would make any opposition to the principle of them, but that if any thing in the details appeared to them to be objectionable, that they would suggest an amendment. It was not, however, requisite for him at present to state what those details were; that would be better done when the House went into a committee. It would now be for them to direct their attention to the principle of the bill which was to prevent seditious and tumultuous meetings. The people, according to this bill, could meet by their own act in their parishes and townships, and this was a satisfactory answer to the objection that it went to destroy all public meetings. One objection made to the bill was an objection in principle; the evil, it was said, was local. He admitted it; but was it local in the sense which those gentlemen supposed? That which existed in the metropolis—that against which it was requisite to guard in all the counties adjacent to the metropolis—that evil which extended from York up to Glasgow, and showed itself also in Warwickshire and Leicestershire—that evil, which, if repressed in one place, burst out immediately in another, was not so local, that it was possible to say where it existed at any precise moment. In all former bills which the legislature had made under similar circumstances, the evil had been more local than it was at present, but in all of them the acts passed to repress it had been general in their application, and he should not discharge his duty, if he now applied for an act which was to extend only to particular counties. There was also another objection to the bill: "it was to be permanent." To this objection he should make an answer similar in principle to the answer which he had just given to the objection founded on what was called the locality of the evil. Temporary bills had been passed every three or four years, to check the mischief which had arisen from these tumultuous meetings; and yet, during the whole of the last 25 years, it had continued to exist with little interruption. Once it had been repressed by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act, but the moment the Suspension act was repealed, it burst forth again with the same malignant spirit which it had before displayed. Unless, therefore, the House were of opinion that it was expedient to pass, from time to time, severe restrictive measures, they ought to adopt such a moderate permanent measure as he was now recommending. The gentlemen on the other side were always advising the ministry to try the effects of conciliation. There was every disposition on the part of ministers to conciliate the honest, the well-disposed, and the loyal: there was no disposition to exercise coercion on them, and instead of being a coercion on loyalty, the system was calculated to protect all who deserved protection from the designs of men who had sworn to overturn the constitution, and who, if they succeeded, would soon be involved themselves in the general destruction. But how were ministers to conciliate these reformers who were drawing the sword against them? It would be weakness to attempt it. They were not men to be conciliated. To offer conciliation would be to succumb—would be to give a triumph to the disaffected, and an encouragement to them to rally round the banners of sedition.

Mr. Lyttelton rose to offer his opinion on the measures proposed by ministers, as well as on the recent proceedings in the country. He expressed his regret at being on this occasion obliged to differ from those honourable friends with whom he was in the habit of acting—indeed, nothing but an imperious sense of duty could induce him to do so—a conviction that the proposed measures were necessary to the safety of the state. If he were influenced merely by party principles, which, in general, he believed to be public principles, he certainly should co-operate with his right hon. friend, especially after the extraordinary speech of a noble lord, who, in contradiction to the usual mild and manly manner in which he performed his parliamentary duties, had taunted the Whigs with acting from factious and corrupt motives. But, he was sorry to say, that he was convinced there was a great conspiracy in the country against the constitution. In spite of all the cheering which this declaration had occasioned, he would pledge himself to make good his assertion. If ministers had granted an inquiry, they would have had the support of nine-tenths of unbiassed men to the measures now proposed. For what took place when laws were before passed for the temporary suppression of seditious meetings? He asked, whether they were repressed longer than the suspension of the Habeas Corpus lasted? He asked whether meetings were not held at the end of that period, for effecting the purpose of those who called them by force? Some 9 or 10 months ago, a meeting was held at Smithfield, most inflammatory and alarming in its character. Since the last prorogation of parliament, meetings had been held all over the country. At Hunslet-moor a meeting was held, to which he supposed the member for Bishopscastle had alluded; and if any meeting was treasonable, that was so. At that meeting it was recommended, that district and deputy meetings should be held, and it was declared that the object in view ought to be obtained by an “overwhelming” majority. What was this but to propose to carry things by a general and systematic rising or rebellion? Was this a system which the people’s House of Parliament, as the member for Bishopscastle called it (he supposed he had taken the expression from the resolutions of some of the meetings), was not to put down? Afterwards a meeting was held at Birmingham, where the strange, unprecedented, and unconstitutional villainy of conduct was adopted, of returning a member and legislative attorney to that House, without any right or authority. Such proceedings in his opinion would justify the measures now proposed, if no papers at all had been laid upon the table. Then came the meeting at Leeds, which was spoken of as indicating increased violence, but it at length fell off to a small number. At last came the Manchester meeting, with respect to the proceedings at which he, for one, thought it would be much better, if ministers manfully instituted an inquiry. The magistrates, acting under circumstances of great provocation, might have overstepped the law, and that ought to be inquired into.

and he still hoped an inquiry would be conceded. A full and impartial inquiry would prove infinitely more honourable to the magistrates, and to the yeomanry who were denounced—aye, individually denounced—than to leave the existing calumny unrefuted. But setting that aside, would any man contend, that, if the peace of the country, and especially of the manufacturing districts, was to be preserved, such meetings ought to be tolerated? Would any man say of the Manchester meeting, that if it was not contrary to law, it was not high time that the law should be altered, to prevent the recurrence of such a meeting? It was perfectly ludicrous and absurd to maintain any such doctrine. Then came meetings of large bodies of men—meetings, exasperated by the excessive severity exercised at Manchester; more exasperated, perhaps, by the misrepresentations which had been propagated, and exasperated most of all by the injudicious thanks which had been given by ministers to the authorities at Manchester. A meeting was again held at Birmingham, which had every characteristic of rebellion, and seemed prepared to resort to actual force upon the property and persons of his majesty's subjects, until put down by military interference. Upon these facts, without any papers at all, the noble lord might have brought forward his measures. Such conduct would have been better than the inconsistent course of presenting papers, and yet refusing inquiry. But the papers, he would contend, did form a very complete and conclusive case. They had been represented as scanty and meagre; they were scanty and meagre only respecting the Manchester question—a question in which his majesty's ministers were themselves compromised. The declaration of the Cheshire quarter-sessions (he spoke of a private letter from one of that body) stated, that schools were established there for disaffection, and that the fact was verified upon oath. The earl of Derby transmitted an account of the alarming state of the district with which his lordship was connected, and afterwards represented the difficulty of arming the respectable and loyal inhabitants. His hon. friend—he meant the member for Bishops-castle, whom he had no right certainly to call his political friend—had inferred that this circumstance proved that there was no alarm. On the contrary, he would say, that it proceeded from intimidation. Besides, there were several depositions before Mr. Fletcher in the beginning of August, not anonymous depositions, that training was practised by great numbers in that part of the country. Prior to this the spirit of disaffection had been manifested in the assassination of Birch the constable. Above all, there was the declaration of the Lancaster grand jury, which represented that there was no symptom of, he did not say rebellion, but of a conspiracy against government—not against government alone, but against property—there was no symptom of such a conspiracy which the grand jury did not set forth as existing in that county. This was marked by the extensive circulation of seditious writings—by a system of intimidation being resorted to—by military trainings—and by a systematic determination to refuse payment of rent and taxes. That men should refuse to pay taxes, being discontented with the government, and in doubt as to the continuance of its authority, might be one of the ordinary features of disaffection; but nothing but the desire of subverting all the rights of property could suggest the refusal to pay rents. Such was the testimony of the grand jury of Lancashire. But, leaving the disturbed and disaffected counties of England, they had testimony highly respectable, and not anonymous, from the west of Scotland. He would ask, was it true or was it not true, that the duke of Hamilton (than whom no man stood higher in rank and character) wishing to gain signatures to a loyal address, and to form a corps for the preservation of the peace, and the protection of property, had found both impossible? In the west of Scotland, there had been meetings at which, whatever some persons might say of the peaceable disposition of such meetings, the peace was violated, and riots were committed for two or three days—riots, too, of peculiar malignity, for clergymen were attacked without any pretence or provocation. The case, then, for the measures now brought forward, was made out—first, by the notoriety of facts and proceedings throughout the country; and, in the second place, it was confirmed very much by the papers on the table. He came now to consider the second point of view in which he had proposed to discuss the question: that was, whether the present laws, impartially and vigorously administered, were sufficient to meet the danger. He was of opinion that they were not sufficient. He did not know whether the laws might not have been equal to the task at a former period; but now, after the course which had been pursued, after the supineness of ministers and the oscitancy of the attorney-general, that strong measures were necessary to overwhelm the torrent of blasphemy and sedition which had assailed us, he could no more doubt than he could doubt that he was at that moment addressing the speaker. The law was very strict against high treason, and any thing that might be construed into high treason; but such was the proper regard for the lives of the subjects which our laws possessed, and such was their salutary jealousy of arbitrary power, that the execution of the law against treason was very difficult. God forbid that they should attempt to restore to this law the harsh features of which their ancestors had deprived it. But the rankest treason existed in the country. After the evidence of the resolutions passed at the meetings, to say nothing of the conduct which was exhibited, would any man say that there was not something proved which was tantamount to treason? It might be said, it had indeed been said, that the laws had not been enforced. But after the acquittal of Mr. Hone, there was very little chance of the conviction of any man in Middlesex, at least in London. The defence set up on that occasion was ridiculous, as it went on the assumption, that because the libel prosecuted was seditious as well as blasphemous, its publisher must be innocent. The acquitted person (for he wished to use no harsh names) had also founded his defence on the motives of the prosecutor; but motives had nothing at all to do with the question. The consequence of this acquittal was, to license blasphemy and sedition. In the last year things had taken a turn, and it became doubtful whether prosecutions would not have been more successful, as it had been found that juries were ready to do their duty in the case of that miserable wretch and execrable offender, Carlile. Still he was of opinion that the existing law was insufficient; but he would not now detain the House longer upon the subject of the public press, as that part of the question would come again before the House. With respect to the Seditious Meetings bill, the old law was very severe—at least, as it had been explained, it admitted of a very severe interpretation. But the old law was indefinite. Meetings such as were now held had never come into the contemplation of the framers of the old law; such meetings could not have then come within the purview of any man's imagination. This was evident by the letter from the magistrates of Manchester. The existing law was difficult to be understood, as appeared by the communications from those, and from other magistrates, for they could not ascertain whether a meeting was illegal where no overt act of plunder and no breach of the peace had been committed. Then came the question, whether the present bill was calculated to remove the difficulty. But into this he would not now enter, because that would be forestalling a future discussion. He did, however, believe the bill to be necessary, and he hoped that it would be rendered immediately efficacious. The evil, it had been contended by his hon. and learned friend, was local. In what sense could it be said to be local, when the diffusion of seditious writings was universal, comprehending the capital and the most populous districts, and districts where the people were most easily brought to bear upon one subject. However, he admitted that if it could be established that the evil was local, it was a question deserving consideration, whether the bill ought not to be confined to the counties that were disaffected; and lieutenants and grand juries be authorized to extend it to their counties if required. His hon. and learned friend had said, that this was a permanent remedy, applied to evils which were transient. If they were transient, they must be so, because the cause was transient. He thought distress the cause, and believed that, if distress were banished, disaffection would be, if not extinguished, diminished to so contemptible a size, that the law could cope with it, or that it would be unworthy of attention. He did not believe that any part of the people, living as they did, under the freest and noblest constitution in the world, would rise against it, if not under the deepest distress. This applied to all those who were now in a state little short of open rebellion. He begged here to ask those members who were connected with the manufacturing districts, who themselves, or whose friends had capitals employed in manufacture—he begged to ask them whether there was any prospect of the distress being speedily cured, and whether they did not believe it would continue for many years? If so, the bills ought to be coequal in duration to the distress which occasioned them. But, to fix upon a period of five or seven years, would be more harsh than to take an indefinite period. He did not know what plan the noble lord had in view as to this point, but he hoped that the measure would be adapted to the exigency, both in extent and in duration. But that was matter of opinion. But if the measure were made local, as he greatly preferred, it would be implied on the face of it, that it was also temporary. There would be an implied pledge on the face of the bill, that it would be continued only while the counties to which it was confined required its operation. His hon. friends had talked of a system of coercion. When they spoke abstractedly of a system of coercion, he was at a loss to understand their meaning. Every penal law was part of a system of coercion. He supposed they meant the application of force beyond what was necessary to put down an intolerable evil. He agreed to that construction of the term, but that construction did not apply to the measures now proposed. He agreed, at least he certainly would agree, to most of those measures, because he viewed them as no other coercion than the preservation and putting down of evils which could not be prevented or put down by any other means, and which threatened the safety of the state. He agreed with those who favoured conciliation, so far as to wish to see that sort of conciliation, which was never to be discovered in the measures of his majesty's ministers. The first step of conciliation which ought to be adopted was, an inquiry into the proceedings at Manchester. It was a most important duty, as well as a part of wise conciliation, to inquire promptly and impartially into proceedings which involved the rights and liberties of the people. The second step was economy. No real economy had ever been attempted by ministers. Conciliation in every shape appeared to be banished from the ministerial vocabulary. The very word they never used. According to them, the people were always wrong, and were never to be conciliated. From the course they were in the habit of pursuing, the measures now about to be placed in their hands would lose much of their effect. Popular meetings were so spoken of, that a paltry desire to insult the people seemed to influence government. The lives of the subjects would, he really believed, be endangered, and the execution of the laws impeded, if ministers would not adopt conciliation, and abandon their system of exasperation and insult. Another part of conciliation was parliamentary reform. He would not now enter upon that question, although he was willing to enter upon it on a proper occasion, and to support it. He did not go so far as his hon. and learned friends in the belief that this measure would have a very great effect in conciliating. He did not, however, agree with the hon. and learned gentleman who had last spoken, that to concede reform, would be to succumb to the radical reformers. If the House were unanimously to unite, as he wished to God they would, in putting down rebellion, then they might, without losing sight of their dignity, safely proceed to an inquiry, the result of which would perhaps do away some of those abuses which at present weakened and defaced the legislation and administration of the country. While he supported the measures now proposed as really necessary, he must say that those measures would be less efficacious and more inoperative in the hands of ministers, than they could be in any other hands. The noble lord might smile, and suppose that he wished him removed only because he wished his right hon. friend in his place. He could assure the noble lord, that he should be very sorry to see his right hon. friend in his place, because he was sure that his right hon. friend, by becoming the minister of the crown, would become less popular. He believed that his friends, considering the frailty of human nature, would be less useful in administration than they were when united in opposition. But he more particularly objected to the execution of the measures now proposed being confided to the present noble secretary of state for the home department. He knew not what induced his royal highness the Prince Regent to intrust the home administration to that noble lord in such a crisis. He knew no title which that noble lord possessed, for our domestic government, except an unblemished private character. In his hands authority was regarded with contempt, and the unsparing exercise of his authority only increased insubordination and disaffection. He said so with regret, because a better or a more affectionate man in private life he did not know. But in the present crisis he deprecated the noble lord's return to measures which would greatly increase the danger of the state; and wished to see his place filled by some one else of the noble lord's own party.

Mr. Macdonald declared, that he felt much difficulty in rising to reply to his hon. and learned friend, the solicitor-general, both because his hon. and learned friend had spoken so ably, and because he had carried the House along with him by the enthusiasm of his eloquence. But, difficult and painful as he felt this task, he should feel it more difficult and painful to refrain from expressing his sentiments on the present important occasion. His hon. and learned friend, travelling in his speech with the greatest rapidity from London to Glasgow, could see nothing in every face that he met but treason and sedition. To the apprehensions of his hon. and learned friend on this subject he could not subscribe. If the bill immediately under consideration were of the character of the Training bill and the Seizing for Arms bill, he should have no hesitation in reposing confidence to ministers to that extent, but he could not consent to entrust them with powers which appeared to him to be inconsistent with the general interests of the people, and with the integrity of the constitution. In his hon. and learned friend's speech, in the speech from the throne—in the very circumstance of parliament's being brought together at that moment, there was involved this most important avowal, namely, that all the experiments hitherto resorted to—that all the restrictions already passed with regard to the rights of the people, and more especially, as his hon. and learned friend had expressed it, the suspension for a twelvemonth, of those rights, without which, no British subject could be considered a free man—that these had all failed in staying the progress of the evil, or in restoring that which ought to be a common object to all of them—the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the country. It was confessed, that since the adoption of those measures, the evil had, instead of diminishing, gone on continually augmenting. Surely there was here enough to make them pause. But instead of that, ministers now came down determined to persevere still further, and such was the fatal progress of their violence, that having arrived at our present state (and there could be no worse symptom than the complacency with which the proposition was received), we must proceed still further. The House were asked to impose a tax on the press, in order to give the means of paying 12,000 additional troops in this country; and hand in hand with that proposition was another for the suppression of public meetings. Was it meant by this latter measure to prevent meetings of the description of that which had turned out so fatally at Manchester, and which, in the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, was an illegal meeting? That might be effected by a declaratory law. But the measure now before them, went to deprive the people of this country of a privilege, without which there would have been no House of Commons sitting there at that moment,—the privilege of meeting to petition, or at least, to reduce the exercise of that privilege to the limits of a parish vestry room. If they had arrived at such an extremity, they ought at least to look to the magnitude of the sacrifice. Let it be ingenuously acknowledged. The dreary road they were travelling year after year, seemed but to lead to this proposition—and the speech of the noble lord came very near it—that the character the feelings, and circumstances of the people of England had undergone so essential a change, that the ancient system of government hitherto followed in this country, was now become insufficient. This was the question, disguise it as they pleased—this was the question they were all called to put to themselves. If, however, the progress of time, and the alterations of society, justified and demanded those violent changes, or encroachments rather, on the constitution, how was it that the same men who introduced and urged those encroachments opposed any change in the state of the representation which the same progress of time and alterations of society had rendered altogether unequal to its original intention? The speech of the noble lord in introducing the proposed measures was strongly impressed upon his mind. It would not be readily forgotten by any who heard it. Perhaps that speech, in words, tone, and manner, had not received so good a comment as from a noble lord, the member for Northallerton, whose speech reflected, in the opinion of all who heard it, the highest honour on that noble lord, and impressed them with the highest opinion of his talents. The noble lord who introduced the measures before them, had supported those melancholy measures—for melancholy they were in all their aspects—by stating his view of what was passing, not only in this, but in other countries. If they followed the example of the noble lord, and looked into other states, what would they see but a tremendous system adopted for the purpose of overawing the inhabitants of every country by standing armies—one great conspiracy for overturning by standing armies, and the court of inquisition, of which the head-quarters were at Metz, the last remains of European liberty, and establishing a universal military despotism? The noble lord the secretary for foreign affairs, could not possibly have been guilty of more flagrant indiscretion; for he could hardly fail to know how much an expression of that sort contributed to propagate a calumny which had been so industriously propagated in this country, that all these measures were part of a system adopted in connexion with foreign cabinets; although, as an honest man, he was bound to say, that he believed a grosser calumny could not be uttered. It was of importance that the disorders should be put down; but it was of still more consequence that they should put down the disposition to disorders. Inquiry into the late proceedings was actually necessary, and he was rejoiced that one had been called for by his noble friend, the member for Northampton; and he could hardly yet believe that the House, in rejecting it, meant to content itself with the brief collated and compiled by the secretary of state himself, against whom the very situation of the country furnished a prima facie ground of accusation. The theory of himself and his friends was this, that the cause of the existing disaffection was distress. The theory on the opposite side of the House was, that the distress was incidental, and that the disturbances generally proceeded from an abstract love of political discussion. His theory, and that of his friends, was borne out by the evidence of the magistrates in the disturbed districts, and by numerous other circumstances. The opposite theory was borne out by nothing. Coercion might still be persevered in, but it would fail. What did ministers say, but that they would go on persevering in their system of coercion, extensively, generally, and for ever? He, and those who thought with him, on the other hand, said, “Stay your hand, except in spots where a strong pressure may be necessary, and conciliate the people generally.” But it had been said, what was meant by conciliation? He wished to institute an effective examination into the whole system of taxation—to inquire into the foundation of our commercial and manufacturing system—to pare down the expenditure of the country to the last shilling; and farther, he would concede to the desires of the sensible people of this country among the middling and lower classes (for they were the best allies of the state) all in the way of reform, that was not absolutely inconsistent with the safety of the constitution. If they failed in their attempts at conciliation, and fail they could not, except the people of this country were rotten at the core, which he could not believe; but if they failed they lost nothing, and if they did not fail they gained every thing in putting themselves absolutely in the right, and acquiring the support of every honest man in the country. But he not only differed from ministers as to the remedy, but he differed from them also in their estimate of the danger. Without the aid derived from the distresses of the country, that small band who had been so long on the stage, would really be nothing. That band, if let alone, would soon be seen cutting each other’s throats, and endeavouring to debase, if it were possible to debase, each other. Without leaders, without means—for their military chest was found lately to contain only 4*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*—and without the hope of foreign aid, which was always looked to in the insurrections of former times, they had very little chance of enlisting any from the other classes of society; and their only hope of doing so must be founded on the enactment by the legislature of such measures as those now proposed. Admitting, as he did, that these men were only a contemptible body, he did not still deny, that they ought to be put down, and their efforts counteracted; but he denied that parliament would be justified in passing any new laws upon this subject, unless it were first fully proved, that the laws now in force were found insufficient. He had yet to learn that they were so. He challenged any man to say, on his honour, he believed the existing laws had been effectually executed. Let the House look back to the nature of the prosecutions during the last three years. Sometimes the grounds for prosecution were frivolous, frequently they were equivocal, and sometimes, which was worst of all, they exposed the government to the charge of hypocrisy. He would also invite his hon. and learned friend the solicitor-general to look to the dark and malignant libels which he had so properly described as provoking to assassination, forgery, and other crimes, and which had been suffered to go forth with impunity, and then say, if he could, that the laws of the country had been duly enforced. When it did happen that a prosecution had been instituted by some strange fatality it was made to assume the appearance of persecution. Where government ought to have punished a knave, they created a hero; until at length they brought the existing laws into such contempt, that they were now compelled to come forward to ask new ones. With respect to blasphemy, was it not admitted on all hands, that there were laws in existence against it, and what obstruction had been experienced in carrying them into execution. The only instance in which it had been prosecuted proved what ought never to have been doubted, that juries would do their duty. The one work which was prosecuted, and justly prosecuted, was sold at such a price that it was not reasonable to suppose it could get into the hands of the lower classes; but was not the fate of the publisher of that book sufficient proof that if such publications were brought before a jury, ample justice would have been obtained? He hoped that any thing which fell from him on this occasion, would not be understood as disrespectful to the Christian religion: he meant nothing of the kind; for he believed that the Christian religion was the true basis of all moral and social order—that upon nothing better or safer could all our institutions be founded—and he believed further, that the people had no relish for the impious trash which had been published, and that the known alliance of Hunt, the leader of the democrats, with Carlile, the chief of the infidels, had done more to open the eyes of the people to the objects of both, than all the acts of ministers put together. He was not disposed to make rash or angry charges; but he did charge ministers (and as God was his judge, he did so without envy, hatred, or malice) with having highly exasperated the public mind, and aggravated the evils of the country. He did impute to them, that they had given false statements of the commerce and manufactures of the country—he did say too, that from the commencement of peace up to this moment, there had been no retrenchment of the public expenditure, but what was wrung from them; and not content with refusing to yield any thing to the distresses of the people, some of them had even insulted that distress. He appealed to the hon. member for Bramber, who had inveighed with so much eloquence against parties, if, with this conviction on his mind, he should be justified, were he, on such a statement as that which they had received, at once to throw into the hands of his majesty's government additional powers which he was conscious must be abused. For these reasons, he did call on the House of Commons to pause, for they might depend upon it that the proposed measures would not be of a stationary nature. They might be assured that the 12,000 additional troops voted this year, would be twice 12,000 ere long, that the additional tax on certain productions of the press, would soon be followed by a prohibition of them—and that the few remains of the right of the people to meet, still left, would be soon annihilated. But he would ask, when all was done, what must necessarily be the effects of such proceedings? Why, continued fear and distrust on one side, and a feverish discontent on the other. He considered the silence with which these measures were already looked upon in the country, as an awful foreboding. It might well be said,

“Inde domum.”

It would indeed be melancholy to see a once free Englishman retiring into a corner, and glancing all around him before he ventured to deliver his opinion on a common passing subject. Would such a state of things make the sovereign happy, and the people content? No; suspicions and ill-will would be constantly rising between them, and the generous feelings which once united them would be no more. Then might the prince say to his ministers, “Why have you robbed me of the affections of my subjects? Why have you made them indifferent about my welfare or their own? Restore me the lost energy of my people. It is true they were sometimes clamorous, sometimes turbulent, but always Englishmen. Restore them to me such as they were, and I care not for their temporary excesses. Tell me not of their disaffection. When the shores of my kingdom were menaced, did they not advance by tens of thousands, and by hundreds of thousands to defend it? when the heiress of the throne died, was there a dry eye among them? and were not these proofs of patriotism and loyalty?" When the day should arrive that language like this should be called for (and arrive it would, if the present course were persisted in), it would be found too late that the glory of the greatest and happiest nation of the earth had passed its meridian.

Lord Lascelles, as he had been referred to as ascribing the existing disaffection to distress, wished to explain what he had said on a former meeting. After the last prorogation of parliament, he stated mischievous men to have gone forth in the country, to inflame the minds of the ignorant. The existing distress had produced such effect on their minds, that the machinations of the disaffected were more successful than they would otherwise have been. This he believed, but he had never said that the whole of the disaffection arose from distress. The distress had first collected audiences to listen to the doctrines of sedition preached to them, and by constantly hearing these doctrines, the people had at last become partisans of them.

Mr. Davenport said, he would support the measures before the House, because he thought there never was a period when that House was more imperatively called upon to adopt strong measures to put down the disaffection which existed, and which, if not checked in time, would destroy the deluded people themselves, and subsequently the trade of the country. Advantage had been taken of the distress which prevailed to inflame the minds of the poor; but it was not in the districts where distress most prevailed that the people had been most clamorous. He reprobated the seditious and blasphemous publications which had lately issued from the press, and called upon the House, by putting them down, to defend the peace, good order, and religion, of the country. He valued the rights of the people as much as any man, and he would not give a vote which could in any degree infringe on those rights, if he did not think circumstances required it.

Mr. Fazakerley admitted the danger that existed, and could not see any reason for refusing to grant more extensive powers to administration to meet the evil. Property was no longer safe, the ordinary operations of business were interrupted, and he much feared that even the public institutions of the country could not withstand the attack with which they were menaced. He apprehended, however, that if parliament proceeded, without limitation, to the enactment of still more restrictive laws, it would be defeated in its object, and that the confidence which should subsist between it and the public, and which was already impaired, would no longer have any existence. It should be remembered the evil happily was local. With this recollection at hand, he had no doubt many would join him in saying to ministers, "take even this bill with all its extensive powers and imperfections, but let its enactments be confined in their operation to the peculiar districts tainted with sedition and irreligion." These enactments it might be necessary to enforce for the present, in five or perhaps six different counties at the utmost, with a provision, however, introduced in the bill, that should it be considered necessary, in consequence of a representation made by the lord-lieutenant or the county magistrates of the disaffected state of any other county, the secretary for the home department, as was formerly the case in the troublesome times preceding and subsequent to the Irish rebellion, might proceed to proclaim the said county under the operation of this act. Thus far he would go, but he could not consent to have a measure permanently applied to the whole country which was only required by the conduct of a small portion of it.

Mr. Crompton observed, that he felt it his duty to exculpate that part of the county of York, denominated the North Riding, from the charge of disaffection, which had been levelled indiscriminately at Yorkshire in general terms. He had been long connected with it, and he never had heard of the existence of political disaffection or irreligion in that district. Under these circumstances he should have preferred local measures of restriction.

Mr. Peel wished to give his opinion on one or two subjects, which had been so often discussed in that House, that he should fear to offend by the mere repetition, if he did not feel it of some importance that he should speak on them, having been prevented from doing so by indisposition, which had kept him from the House since the night on which it first met. The circumstances on which he would offer a few observations, were those connected with the meeting at Manchester on the 16th of August. He was particularly anxious to offer a few observations on this subject, as he was connected with that part of the country by ties of birth and early acquaintance; but at the same time he should observe, that there were no ties which could prevent him from taking an impartial and disinterested view of the transactions in question.—He had no connexion with any of the gentlemen who had acted as magistrates, and his acquaintance with any of them was slight. But from the means of information which had been afforded him—from his conviction of the motives on which the magistrates acted, and of the dangers which threatened Manchester, and his knowledge of the unjust calumnies by which the magistrates had been assailed—he felt he should be abandoning his duty if he did not endeavour to make them all the compensation which an humble individual was capable of making to them for their wrongs, and bearing his testimony in favour of their services. Any man who formed his judgment of the conduct of the magistrates merely with reference to what passed on the 16th, had taken a very narrow view of the case, both as to the danger which then threatened the public, and as to the services which those magistrates then rendered to the public. To arrive at any thing like a just opinion on the case, reference must be had, not to that day alone, but to what had occurred in and about Manchester for months, and, he might add, years before, and to the nature and constitution of society in that part of the country. By such a view alone could any one fairly judge of the conduct of the magistrates, of the precautions which they had taken, and he would say, of the success with which those precautions had been attended. It was true, that the parties who called the meeting of the 16th, professed an intention of petitioning parliament. It was true, that the people collected together under this pretence marched into the town with bands playing God save the King. It was true, some of their banners were inscribed with the words “tranquillity,” and “order”—and it was true, that the chief of the demagogues inculcated order and sobriety. But was any man infatuated enough to think that such pretences as these ought to have lulled the magistrates into security, or induced them to relax their preparations? Let any man consider the situation in which the magistrates were placed; let him consider the information which they had received, the knowledge which they possessed of the state of feeling in Manchester and its neighbourhood amongst certain classes, and from that let him judge of the conduct which they had pursued. He would appeal to the report of the secret committee of the House of Lords, presented in 1817, for the state of Manchester at that time, and which state the magistrates must have fully borne in mind. Here was the opinion of as respectable a body as it was possible to select in the country, and he should presently read it to the House. There had been, in 1817, two meetings in Manchester professing the same object as that which was held on the 16th of August. At the first of these, which was on the 1st of March, and which was attended by about 10,000 persons, the monstrous proposition was put and carried—that the assembled multitude should divide themselves into bodies of ten persons each, with a separate leader, and that, in that state, they should march to London, to present their petitions. But the character of the second meeting was infinitely more dangerous; no man could contemplate it without horror—not so much from the fear of internal commotion, as of the destruction of all moral and social order. Now, what did the Lords’ report say of that meeting? “It was on the night of the 30th of March that a general insurrection was intended to commence at Manchester. The magistrates were to be seized, the prisoners were to be liberated, the soldiers were either to be surprised in their barracks, or a certain number of factories were to be set on fire, for the purpose of drawing the soldiers out of their barracks, of which a party stationed near them for that object were to take possession, with the view of seizing the magazine. The signal for the commencement of these proceedings was to be the firing of a rocket or rockets, and hopes were held out that 2,000 or 3,000 men would be sufficient to accomplish the first object, and that the insurgents would be 50,000 strong in the morning.” Why, with such a document before them, would any man assert that the magistrates were not justified in taking the precautions which they had done?

Suppose they had acted otherwise, should we not have heard of a strong case against them for their supineness? Suppose they had not interfered, and that violence had ensued, with what eloquence would it not have been urged on the other side, that they were the cause of all the disturbance. In his conscience, he believed, that it was impossible for men under such circumstances to have taken better measures or more wise precautions for ensuring the public peace than those magistrates had done. He declared on his conscience, that in his opinion, not only were they justified in doing what they did, but that benefited by subsequent experience, were the same case to occur again, it would be impossible for them to proceed in any other manner. When he said this, he begged it to be understood, that no man more deeply deplored the loss of lives which took place on the 16th; but were he to enter into a comparative estimate of the two evils, the suffering the meeting to proceed tranquilly or the loss of lives, he would say he believed on his honour that the loss of lives was the less evil. Was it nothing that such meetings should continue and produce their accustomed consequences? Were the intimidation and terror nothing? He had heard it asked, why had not the magistrates prevented the meeting? He in turn would ask, how could they prevent it? How would hon. gentlemen, who asked such a question, have advised the magistrates to act? Thousands of men were advancing in bodies, with banners, marching in regular order, under leaders, as yet peaceable he admitted, from the various towns about Manchester, from Middleton, from Rochdale, from Oldham. Were they to send two or three constables to 5 or 6,000 men to tell them that they had been invited to a public meeting, but it would be inconvenient for the public peace that they should attend, and that they had better stay at home. If they had done so, would it have been effectual? or would it not rather have tended to bring the civil power into contempt? Those bodies of people had committed no act of violence in their approach; would it then be said that a body of military should have been sent to disperse them? Or, if that had been done, and they (the military) had been overpowered, what might have been the consequence? If one of the detachments sent against those large bodies should have been overpowered in the collision, the consequences of the impression on the public mind in Lancashire would have been most fatal. With respect to the part which ministers had acted on this occasion, he conceived that they would have been guilty of a gross dereliction of their duty, if they had acted otherwise. Not only were the ministers praiseworthy in delivering to the magistrates the thanks of the Prince Regent, but it would have been the most signal proof of their unfitness to hold their situations, if the only recompence for men who had devoted their whole time and labour to the preservation of the peace, had been to depart from the ordinary course of proceeding to their prejudice. Was it not as reasonable as it was accordant to practice, that persons who were qualified to perform such important functions should be believed on their statements till there was reason to suspect them? On what ground was the commander in an action thanked by his sovereign? was it not on his own statement? The duke of Wellington when, for instance, he stated in his account of the battle of Talavera, that he defeated the enemy—that he had rescued his army from imminent peril, was he not to receive the thanks of his sovereign? Was he to be told by the ministers—“We hear that marshal Victor, who is opposed to you, has sent a very different account of the matter to Buonaparte—the gentlemen of the opposition are prepared to find fault with you, and military critics will tell us that you committed blunders, and therefore we must suspend our thanks until an inquiry into the fact has been instituted.” If such conduct was pursued, we should not have such generals as the duke of Wellington, nor men of independent fortunes, who, in spite of the allurements of foreign travel, or the pleasures of the capital, of their own ease, devoted their time to the preservation of the peace in towns in which they had no personal interest. If in the honest discharge of their duty the magistrates were to be thus treated—if the first act of ministers should be to find a true bill against them, why, the result would turn out, that instead of an unpaid and active body of magistrates, the local administration of justice would be confined to men who were now so much talked of—he meant stipendiary magistrates. He would appeal to the civil commotions in this country, he would appeal to the history of the civil commotions of France, and he would ask, what on those occasions had been the effect of ill-timed rigour, and what had been the effect of ill-timed concession? The fatal effects of the latter had been written in blood; and fatal indeed must the consequences be to this country, if government were to be deterred by popular clamour from the performance of its duty, and be induced to withhold an expression of its approbation from a course of measures which the circumstances of the times so fully warranted. He had said thus much from the strong feeling of obligation which he thought was due to the magistrates of Manchester, to whom was to be ascribed the rescue of that part of the country from the most imminent danger. He would now proceed to the discussion of the subject which was more immediately before the House. He had listened to the speech of his hon. friend opposite with all the attention which the prepossessions of early friendship would naturally excite; and he professed that he was exceedingly surprised, knowing the ability which he had upon all occasions exhibited, to find that throughout the whole of that speech there was not an argument, or an attempt at an argument, to show that the measures which were under discussion were not necessary. Judging from the speech of his hon. friend, he was bound to say that he anticipated his vote in favour of the motion; for he had not only not diminished the danger in which the country was placed, but had unfortunately magnified it. He had stated that the consequence of raising 11,000 men would be to render it necessary to raise double that number in the ensuing year; and had added, that the state of the country afforded a ground of impeachment against one of his majesty's ministers. How this proposition was to be supported he confessed himself at a loss to imagine. But there was one part of his hon. friend's speech for which he could not account, and that was how, after his sarcastic remarks upon the meetings at Glasgow and York, he had found so speedy a conveyance to the inquisition at Mentz. Upon an examination of the papers which had been presented to the House, he thought the necessity for the proposed measures must be evident to any one who had taken the trouble to read them. In adverting to these papers, there were two classes of men presented to their notice. The first of these were the lovers of peace, good order, and tranquillity: but there was another class of his majesty's subjects, whom, he apprehended, there was no individual in that House, who was the sincere advocate of the rights of the people, would support. He would ask any man whether he could read those papers, and forming his judgment upon them, and upon facts which were perfectly notorious, he could draw any other conclusion, than that there had been a great abuse of popular rights, and such an abuse as was calculated to bring down destruction upon the constitution? He did not found this observation upon anonymous information—he drew his conclusions of the dangers of the public peace, and of the dangers of the rights and privileges of the people, from documents which were to be found in these papers, and which were sanctioned by such men as lord Derby, lord Fitzwilliam, and the duke of Hamilton. Any individual who read those documents could come to no other conclusion, than that the danger of the country was extreme, and that it was absolutely necessary to adopt some immediate and powerful measures to check that danger. Now, with respect to the attempts which were made to make the danger appear ridiculous, he would only beg leave to refer to the case of the meeting described by lord Fitzwilliam, on Hunslet-moor. At this meeting some thousands of persons, men, women, and children, were collected together, and there, as was stated in the letter of lord Fitzwilliam, were again assembled the same itinerant orators who had been attending in other places. At that meeting, so collected, seventeen or eighteen resolutions were unanimously voted, and he would beg the attention of the House to the sort of statements which were thus disseminated among the multitude of men, women, and children who were present. In the first place it was resolved, that the debt of the country amounted—to what sum? No one felt, or lamented more, the pressure of this debt than he did,—but surely the evil was sufficient of itself without being enhanced by the inflammatory exaggerations of itinerant orators, and yet those persons stated to those who stood around them, that the debt of the country amounted to no less a sum than 100,000,000,000*l.*! and it was added, that this enormous burthen was attributable to the depreciated state of the paper currency. But the resolution which followed was more ridiculous, and, if possible, more wicked; for it was intended to create dissatisfaction and distrust towards those persons who represented their interests in parliament, upon a subject altogether disconnected from party feelings, and to bring into contempt or suspicion even the most disinterested exertions of the House for the amelioration of the people. It was this—"That the saving-bank scheme, which was instituted under a pretence of benefitting the working classes, when nearly three-fourths of them were out of employ, is an insult to common sense and real understanding, and ought to be considered as what it really is—an engine to work the last shilling out of the pockets of a few old servants and retired tradesmen, to enable the Bank and borough-mongers to pay the fractional parts of the dividends, and to create a sort of lesser fund-holders of those who know no better than to make a deposit of their hard earnings, to fill the pockets of those who are draining them of their last shilling." He would ask the House what could the persons who unblushingly made this statement have in contemplation? He would ask whether such proceedings was not one of the most miserable abuses of popular right which it was possible for the imagination to conceive? Another resolution was, "that as soon as an eligible person would accept the appointment, another meeting should be called to elect him as representative of the unrepresented part of the inhabitants of Leeds." Could this meeting, or meetings like it, be said to enlighten and enlarge the mind of the community? and were not evils of the greatest magnitude to be apprehended, if they were permitted to be repeated? But he called upon the House not to suppose that the evil stopped here; he only called upon them to listen to what lord Fitzwilliam said in another part of his report. His lordship said, "The resolutions passed were numerous and long, but I have not their particulars as yet, the managers not having yet dressed them up to their own liking for print, which I suppose they will do in the usual way on such occasions, without any very scrupulous attention to what was proposed and passed by the meeting." That was to say, that they would not scruple not only to mislead the people in the first instance, but to misstate in print, and to misrepresent the actual resolutions to which the meeting had come. Could any man alive see this without at once acknowledging the dangerous results to which it must lead? And would it be said that to place restraints upon such nefarious and abominable transactions, would be to infringe despotically upon the people's rights? [Hear, hear]. But when he considered the probable consequences which would result to the public peace from similar practices in the neighbourhood of Manchester, he could scarcely find words adequate to express his apprehensions. When he heard gentlemen talk of invading the rights and privileges of the people, he would ask whether there were not other rights to preserve than those which were connected with those popular meetings? When they talked of public rights, they should not forget that there were such rights, as the rights of property and of freedom, the right of exercising opinions freely, and of acting in conformity with those sentiments of loyalty which the true principles of the British constitution were meant to inculcate and to uphold. He should like to take any impartial stranger: and to describe to him the British constitution, the rights which it created and preserved and its practical operation on the happiness of the community. That stranger, of course, would not regard any fanciful theory, or the boasted balance of the three powers—monarchy, aristocracy, democracy; he would demand in what way was secured the lives, the persons, the property, the freedom of opinion of the subject, in short all those rights which it was absolutely necessary to the public good to maintain. He would place that stranger in some spots he would fix on near Manchester, and ask him what he thought of the practical operation of the British constitution? Let the House look to the details which were in the papers before them, and they would find a melancholy abundance of proofs of the sort of conduct which practised by those misguided men: they would see that, according to their construction of the British constitution, no man was entitled to exercise the right of allegiance, or entitled to protection, if he presumed to think differently from themselves. He again begged to state, that he did not make these observations upon anonymous information. Let the House look for instance to the examination of Francis Murray; they would find that he with three others had left Manchester on the day preceding the 16th of August, and that he proceeded to an open spot at some distance, where he found 1,500 men exercising in military array, and formed as he had described it, in solid squares. This man was invited to join those persons, and upon his declining an immediate alarm was given that he was a spy. He endeavoured to escape, but was pursued by a body of these desperadoes, by whom he was captured: and how in this man's person was the liberty of the subject respected? He was actually obliged to go down upon his knees, and forswear his allegiance to his sovereign, as the price of his life; for he was not even protected from violence, having been shamefully wounded and maimed. But what was the melancholy appeal which this man who was not employed by the civil power (though where would have been the criminality if he had been?) was obliged to make to these advocates of constitutional power,—to those whose meetings were considered as no abuse, and those whose conduct it was said was not calculated to produce danger to the state? This British subject, in the possession of his liberty, guilty of no offence, entitled by the constitution to the free enjoyment of his own opinions, what sort of appeal was he obliged to make to this singular assembly? Did he say he was a British subject, and appeal to equal rights? He knew too well the temper of those into whose hands he had fallen. He said, and his appeal was, though a simple, a melancholy and forcible one, "For God's sake treat me as I would be treated by enemy. If I were flying from the French, and they, as an enemy, were to take me prisoner, they would grant me quarter; let me implore you but to extend to me a similar grace!" This was the language which a free born Englishman was constrained to address to his brother Englishmen, at a time when he was guilty of no illegal act, in order to obtain a cessation of torture. He would ask any man in that House if this was what was called the liberty of the subject? Rather, was it not one of the evils against which the British constitution did not guard, but against which it ought to be made to guard? Lord Derby too, to whose report an hon. gentleman had referred, and who, from his known political sentiments, might be considered a most impartial witness, what did he state? And here he could not avoid paying a tribute of gratitude to that noble lord for the manner in which he had acted—for the firm and effectual steps which he had taken to preserve those institutions upon which the prosperity of the nation could alone depend. What did this noble lord state? Knowing the spirit of loyalty which pervaded the respectable inhabitants of this district, he endeavoured to raise an association for the protection of the public peace, but in what language was he constrained to report the result of that effort? He says, alluding to the formation of an armed association, "I find a difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number of officers, even but for one battalion; but every entreaty has failed to induce the men to come forward." He would ask, was this a state of things consistent with the safety of the constitution? Were the loyal and the disloyal to be put upon the same footing? He would ask whether it was possible, in this state of things, when men were assured that great numbers of the disaffected were meeting to drill as soldiers, and to acquire a knowledge of military manœuvres, that the loyal inhabitants of the country would come forward? Was not the knowledge of such a fact calculated to produce the strongest intimidation? Look to the duke of Hamilton and Brandon's letter, what did he say? His grace said, that he had no doubt of the spirit of loyalty existing to a great extent; but he added, that "to the natural difficulty attached to the situation of the farmer, &c., in this country, there appears now a novel one, proceeding from the alarm excited by those who compose the various and numerous meetings in this district of the country." In other words, that the people literally stood in a state of intimidation, and were apprehensive of avowing their sentiments, lest they should be subject to the attacks of a stronger party. Was this the possession of the freedom of opinion? Gentlemen should consider what would be the consequences of this system of intimidation. It was not the upper classes upon whom this feeling would operate; they were in a situation to look to themselves; but let them consider the temptation to which those to whom the same protection was not extended, he meant men of moderate property were exposed. Would not they from the principle of self-preservation join that party from whom they had most reason to feel alarm? It was not in human virtue, it was not in human firmness, to stem the torrent. Let the House reflect how great a danger was to be apprehended from the fear and despondency of the loyal. Let them think how many would rather dissemble their conviction than avow their fears, and amidst increasing enemies, and more dangerous threats, would join the ranks of those among whom alone they would find security. For the conduct of all these persons, for every man become disloyal for want of protection, they, the House would be responsible. But let them once assure the loyal part of the population of support, and thousands would at once come forward and avow themselves, who would otherwise be compelled silently to yield to a superior force. He came now to a part of the subject upon which he must dwell with more serious apprehensions. His hon. friend had asked to what the change and distress of the people were to be attributed? He had no difficulty in avowing his conviction, that in those districts which were called manufacturing districts, a change had taken place in their manners, and habits, and feelings, and he confessed that he found it much more easy to point out the causes of those disorders than to devise the means of preventing them. His hon. friend had made some allusion to the state of the representation, as being in some measure the cause of the changes which he had described; but he would recall to the recollection of his hon. friend, whether, when the nation was threatened by foreign invaders, the people did not flock in millions to the standard of their country, ready to sacrifice their lives in its protection. Was the state of the representation altered since that period? The hon. gentleman had talked of the distress which prevailed, being attributable to his majesty's government, or rather misgovernment. If this were the cause, distress must be the same every where, for the government was general; and yet it was an established fact, that distress existed only in particular quarters, while all the rest of the country was in a state of general happiness and tranquillity. They found disorders prevail in a distant county to a great extent; but they found Ireland, they found the south of England, they found the north of Scotland generally tranquil; and they found certain districts only, which had been subject to disorder for many years, in a situation of alarm. Then ought they not to look for a cause for this alarm to something different from what had been stated? They saw in those districts a manufacturing population, different in their habits, and different in their relations, as far as regarded landlord and tenant, from the population of any other part of the country. Being more populous, they naturally called for a more effective civil power; yet their civil power was more ineffective. They saw people collected in large towns, and a jealousy existing in conferring the appointment of magistrates upon individuals who employed those people,—if those individuals themselves, did not from their occupations, feel a reluctance in taking upon themselves so troublesome an office. When they saw also the great alternations which took place among the lower orders of prosperity and distress; when they saw the constant vicissitudes to which they were exposed; when they saw their imprudence in not laying up in times of prosperity against times of distress; when they saw, too, that when they had employment they only worked for two or three days in the week, and devoted the rest to dissipation; and when they recollected all the influence which a change in the situation of affairs, of fashion, or of speculation might produce on the state of these individuals, it could not be denied that they were peculiarly open to the mischievous designs of those demagogues, who of late had been so actively engaged in taking advantage of their temporary difficulty, and impressing upon them a belief that their difficulties were irremediable, except by a change in the representation. For these evils, as he before said, he thought it was much more easy to find out the cause than to suggest a remedy. Another reason at this time afforded an additional facility for promoting the views of the seditious—and this was, the state of information to which the public mind had arrived from the more general dissemination of education. He did not mean by this to say one word in opposition to education, or to the more speedy extension of knowledge—there were no greater evils than the evils of ignorance—but let them take care that the greatest blessing was not converted into the greatest curse of the people. Upon the whole, he was of opinion, that the measures which were proposed should be applied to the country generally, and not to particular districts; for he was satisfied if an opening were left any where, it would be only affording an additional inducement to circulate in places yet uncontaminated, that poison which had operated so effectively and so mischievously in the manufacturing districts. He made his choice between what he considered two evils a farther restriction on valuable rights, and general anarchy and confusion; and he felt it his duty to attempt, by supporting the measures before the House, to prevent the disorders which now afflicted the manufacturing districts from spreading over the whole kingdom.

Mr. Smyth perfectly agreed with the right hon. gentleman who had just sat down, as to the magnitude of the danger by which the country was threatened, nevertheless he was not willing to infringe on any of those liberties which we had hitherto enjoyed. He also thought, that the popular assemblies so well described by the hon. gentleman, and so mischievously conducted by itinerant orators, ought to be suppressed. For this purpose he was willing to assent to any proper measures: but he would take the liberty of saying, that it was the incumbent duty of that House, in whatever measures they might think it advisable to adopt, to confine themselves strictly to the degree of danger which existed, and not to legislate beyond the danger. He had read the bill now before the House, and he thought the remedy which it proposed, (if remedy that could be called which was itself a mortal disease) ten thousand times worse than the evils it was intended to suppress. This bill appeared to him to be characterized by any thing but wisdom, and in many respects to be decidedly objectionable. He alluded particularly to the clause which tended to enact, that if in a quarter of an hour a stranger did not withdraw himself from any meeting, in half an hour that meeting, however salutary and necessary it might be, should be dispersed as illegal, and its chairman and orators would become liable to the penalty of transportation, that clause which referred to the course which was to be adopted, if persons attending meetings did not withdraw, upon proclamation being made to depart. This was a clause which was calculated to produce extremely injurious consequences; inasmuch as it might affect ignorant persons, and in all events left the decision of the character of the meeting to the caprice of a single individual. Another reason why he thought this bill was not strictly applicable to the state of the country was, that the evil which it was meant to correct was professedly local, while the remedy was universal. He complained however, principally, that the whole of the code of coercion proposed, neither struck at the root of the evil, nor reached its cause. It was necessary that they should first clearly see what were the causes, before they ventured to legislate upon their existing effects. The first cause he conceived to be the distress arising from the stagnation of trade. The second, the seditious and blasphemous publications, and the speeches of itinerant demagogues. The third, the conviction which prevailed among the people that were not duly represented in that House; and the fourth, the vexatious system pursued by the present government in maintaining an enormous peace establishment, and imposing, last session, three or four millions of new taxes on an exhausted people. Unquestionably, there did exist a great distress and much wretchedness in the manufacturing districts of this country, occasioned, as he apprehended, by a declining trade, and by the inactivity in which commerce had long languished. That distress, it was the peculiar misfortune of the case, was aggravated by the sensations excited by those seditious and blasphemous publications which were there circulated, and by those speeches which were there made by itinerant orators. Yet the spirit of disaffection, he must contend, was not owing to the disposition of the manufacturing districts themselves, but to that system of measures whence it took its actual rise. Undoubtedly, nothing could be more abominable than the practices of those men to whom he alluded—men who heightened the distresses which they affected to deplore, and embittered the sufferings they would pretend to relieve, by superadding the poison of sedition and impiety.—There were also other and efficient causes of the present distress. It had been invidiously attempted to prove that the middling and lower classes were alienated from the higher classes of society. Pregnant as this insinuation was with mischief and discontent, it was one main cause of the existing distress. But there were, moreover, inherent defects in the constitution of that House itself. The measures adopted by the House, as at present constituted, were as good as the House could be expected to frame: they were as wise, as benevolent, as just, as salutary, as that House, as it now existed, could perhaps adopt. The main argument by which those who approved the present state of the representation, defended it, was that it "worked well." This was a good argument with those who approved of all the measures of the House of Commons; but it was no argument to those who disapproved both of its constitution and its proceedings. When he looked to the state of the country, and asked what was the effect of the various legislative measures that had been adopted, he felt justified by facts as well as theory, in strenuously recommending a reform in parliament. There was also a fourth cause of popular discontent; a cause of which, although he did not expect to find many honourable gentlemen who would agree with him upon the subject, he did not less doubt the existence; and that was, the irritating and most vexatious system of measures pursued by his majesty's ministers. Let them look at the enormous, the unreasonable peace establishment, to be maintained by the country in its depressed and exhausted state; and then, without recapitulating those immoderate expenses of different departments, which must be fresh in the memory of every person who heard him, he could not help alluding to the large grants of money which had been made to the royal family; and to the unwarrantable suspension of the Habeas Corpus act. Had he not himself, during the last session of parliament, vainly protested against the imposition of between 3,000,000*l.* and 4,000,000*l.* of new taxes, during the present aggravated season of public difficulty? Unfortunately the existing discontent was rather increasing than diminished. From the means of information which he possessed, and from all that he had heard in the House, he was not yet satisfied in one point, upon which he should be most happy to be convinced—that the magistrates of Manchester, during the fatal transactions of the 16th August, had not exceeded in their conduct that propriety and forbearance which they were bound to observe. Yet the thanks of the Prince Regent had been conveyed to them with what was well and truly termed, "breathless haste:" and he had remarked with inexpressible astonishment, that, up to this day, not one word had fallen from his majesty's ministers, in compassion for the sufferings of those who were injured upon the occasion in question: not one word of that sympathy and condolence, which one should think it was natural for every man to entertain upon the subject. In the allusion which has been made to the Yorkshire meeting, lord Fitzwilliam had been described as having stood trembling in suspense for a hearing. This was utterly untrue. His lordship was received with the most respectful, but unbounded and enthusiastic applause, and it was impossible that any one who had witnessed the meeting could have given such an account of it. It was not true, then, that the lower orders were alienated from the higher. The contrary indeed was proved by the consequence of this act of ministers, as it showed the ardent feelings with which the people were ready to rally round lord Fitzwilliam, on finding that government regarded him as an enemy, because he acted as the friend of popular rights. What an impressive lesson did this occurrence furnish as well to the members of the government as to the higher orders of society! No one attempted to deny the existence of the evils which afflicted the country, but as to what was the proper remedy for those evils there was a general and strong difference of opinion.—Therefore to ascertain that remedy was, in his judgment, a very proper subject for inquiry. Such inquiry should indeed take place, and he was convinced that it must one day or other be instituted. The longer it was delayed, and that reform was refused which was obviously necessary, the more discontent and mischief he feared was likely to arise. He deprecated the language of the noble lord opposite, in ascribing mere party motives to those by whom his measures were opposed, for such language was but too well calculated to encourage the notions that were so sedulously propagated, that all the members of that House were actuated by mere party motives. Such an imputation was, he was persuaded, quite unfounded, and he was sorry to see it countenanced in any degree by the language of a minister of the crown; for it was highly material to maintain the character of that House in the estimation of the country. With regard to those seditious publications which he begged to observe by the way, had not now arisen, for the first time, he was fully willing to concur in any measures to repress them, provided such measures did not trench upon the liberty of the press. But the great remedy would be, that the House should inquire into the expediency of effecting a parliamentary reform; a remedy which could not be administered without a proper and concomitant change of system, a change not existing in any one particular act, but in the general tone and character of the measures pursued by ministers. Unless there was such a change in public measures, unless conciliation went at least hand in hand with coercion, the public discontent would not be diminished, and the distresses which they were so sensible of, and which they so deeply deplored, instead of ceasing, must go on increasing from day to day.

Mr. Abercromby said, that upon so important a subject as the one before them, he must explain his reasons for the vote which he meant to give. From all that he had heard, after most attentively watching the progress of the discussion in one of the most diffuse debates at which he was ever present, he collected that there were three parties, entertaining distinct opinions upon the bill under consideration; one consisting of those who agreed with the noble lord, and thought that it ought to be immediately adopted; the second, of those who entirely opposed it; and the third, of those who thinking something was necessary to be done; yet thought that the bill should be neither general nor permanent. To the third party he himself inclined, and therefore his vote for the second reading of this bill should be conditional—namely, that its existence and operation should be temporary and local. It was perfectly impossible to hear those, who said that the disorders (out of which arose this measure) were not local, without feeling how completely they were contradicted by the facts of the case. It was quite impossible to look at those facts, or at the papers upon the table, and say that those disorders really extended beyond the counties which were strictly and properly called the manufacturing districts. Every one knew their relative proportion and extent; and it was equally impossible therefore, at the same time, not to be aware how large a portion both of England and Scotland was excluded from that description. From the statement of the right honourable member for Oxford it distinctly appeared that there were causes for discontent in the manufacturing districts, which it was desirable to remedy, and which could not possibly exist elsewhere. The right honourable gentleman had, no doubt, endeavoured to impress the House with an apprehension that the discontents of the manufacturing districts might extend to other quarters; but how could the alterations or vicissitudes of trade, by which manufacturing districts were so liable to be affected, operate in other places that were not in any degree concerned in manufactories? Was it not monstrous then, to extend universally throughout the country, those measures of restriction which were fairly applicable to the manufacturing districts alone, or to render laws permanent which were calculated only to meet temporary causes, for such the distress which they alleged to be the great source of the present discontents was deemed to be by the advocates for those laws? It was indisputably the duty of wise legislators to endeavour to guard even against the remotest evil consequences which might result from their measures. His hon. and learned friend, if he would allow him to call him so, the solicitor general, had observed, that this bill did not propose truly to interfere with the rights of lord lieutenants or sheriffs, or grand jurors, to call public meetings, or with the power of a certain number of magistrates to do so. What was to be expected from lord lieutenants and sheriffs the country very well knew; and that magistrates should call parochial or public meetings for popular purposes there were, in his view, very serious reasons to doubt. In fact it appeared to him that there was ground to apprehend from the operation of this measure, something like the corruption of the very fountains of public justice. If the measure were temporary, he should not entertain such an apprehension; but if it were rendered permanent, what a temptation would thus be held out to lord lieutenants to pack the magistracy, in order to serve the purposes of party. He could appeal to the noble secretary for foreign affairs, as to the condition of the magistracy of Ireland, in consequence of similar measures in that country. Such a bill as the present would, he feared, offer a strong motive for subjugating the magistracy to the absolute will of the minister. He spoke this at a time when an act had been recently done by his majesty's ministers, selfish, most purely selfish, unjust, cruel, vindictive, illiberal, and destructive of all independence of character and station—he meant the dismissal of lord Fitzwilliam. The dismissal of lord Fitzwilliam afforded a signal example to all lord lieutenants who ventured to oppose the will of ministers. What, then, was likely to be done with the magistracy, under the nomination of such officers, if ministers deemed it material to reduce that body to subserviency? and that might be the case, if the measure under consideration were rendered permanent, could hardly be doubted. Therefore, on this ground, if there were no other, he would object to the proposition for rendering this measure permanent. He could not, indeed, as a cautious legislator, allow himself to move one step beyond the necessity of the case, and therefore he would not assent to have this measure either permanent or general. It had been uniformly the rule of all considerate legislatures, not to found a permanent law upon any temporary alarm—yet it was attempted to press this measure forward with such a degree of precipitancy as was scarcely ever known in the history of parliament. This he could not help observing, while he was ready to admit the existence of the danger alleged on the other side, and the necessity of providing an appropriate remedy. But the remedy proposed exceeded the nature and necessity of the case; besides, it was due to the merits of this case, and to the voice of the country, that some inquiry should be gone into before the measures brought forward by the noble lord were passed into law. He concurred with those who had observed upon the danger belonging to the immense meetings which had lately taken place in this country and in Scotland. The alarm created by such meetings was no doubt an evil of a serious nature against such alarm to the feelings and the property of the peaceable and well-disposed, he thought it the duty of parliament to provide—but that provision need not be carried beyond the districts where the evil existed, or the alarm prevailed. The meetings to which he alluded ought, he decidedly thought, to be put down; but this object might be accomplished without interfering with the permanent rights and privileges of all the people of England. A very different course of conduct was, he felt, due to the people of this country; for the distress which they suffered was such as to call loudly for relief—and the more so, as that distress was incurred by their efforts to supply the demands of the government. The fact was, that the great misfortunes of the people arose out of the conduct of the government, in calling upon the country to extend its efforts beyond its strength. Hence the public taxes and the public debt had been so enormously increased—hence the poor-rate had become so grievously oppressive, while the administration of that rate was too generally and perhaps too justly complained of by the poor, for whose relief it was raised. The country was pressed upon by a crowd of calamity which admitted of no palliation, and with regard to which a complete inquiry should be instituted in order to satisfy the people of the disposition of parliament to consider their wants and to redress their wrongs. He was most anxious to maintain the authority of parliament and the laws, and that was best to be done by consulting the wishes and interests of the people, and not by attempting to put down opinions by force. Such an attempt was indeed most monstrous, for all history showed, that neither the provisions of the law, nor the power of the sword could suppress the freedom of opinion. Whatever parliament could do for the amelioration of the condition of the people, he hoped it would endeavour to do; and that while it provided for the suppression of the tumultuous, and the correction of the disaffected, it would contrive to afford some relief to the industrious poor. At all events he trusted that parliament would take measures to secure the due administration of justice; and that the law, which was meant for the protection of all should be administered alike to the rich and to the poor. Upon the conditions, and with the reservations which he had stated, he should vote for the House going into a committee on the bill.

Lord A. Hamilton said, he was about to tender his vote for the motion, not in any confidence in his majesty's ministers, but from ocular demonstration of the actual necessity of some legislative measures, and upon the grounds and conditions which had been so ably described by his hon. and learned friend who had just sat down. If he were asked the causes of the existing state of things, and of the dissatisfaction unhappily prevailing among the people, he would state, distress. The first cause, the second cause, the third cause, was distress, and the utter inability of the people to obtain adequate subsistence from any application of their labour. No man could condemn more than he did the large and tumultuous meetings which had of late so much alarmed and disturbed the country. But as the evil of those meetings was comparatively partial, and the cause he hoped but temporary, he could not accede to the adoption as a remedy of an universal and permanent measure. There were some districts which no doubt were in a very disturbed condition, but then there were others, to the loyalty, peace, and order of which he could bear unqualified testimony; and he could not, therefore, agree to any abridgment of the rights of the one, because it was necessary to impose some restriction upon the other.

Mr. Coke felt it proper to submit a few observations to the House, in consequence of what had fallen from his hon. and learned friend on the floor with respect to the probable condition of the magistracy, should the present measure become a part of the permanent law of the land. He meant as to the question whether, in the event of any lord lieutenant, or sheriff, refusing to call a county meeting, five of those magistrates, who were generally nominated by the lord lieutenant, were likely to do so. Some circumstances had come to his knowledge which he thought it necessary to state, in order to put the House on its guard upon this subject. It happened, he was sorry to say, that there had been of late years several contested elections in Norfolk, the consequence was the excitement of an angry party spirit throughout all classes, and the lord lieutenant of that county not being on the popular side of the question, was of course decidedly hostile to his (Mr. Coke's) principles and connexions. That nobleman, some time ago, was pleased to exclude from the commission of the peace, some gentlemen of most unexceptionable character, and whose landed property in the county entitled them to the distinction, but who happened to belong to the whig party. This extraordinary proceeding was represented to him (Mr. C.) and he was solicited to apply to the nobleman alluded to upon the subject. His answer, however, was, that he would not condescend to make any such application, but that he would refer the case to lord Eldon. To lord Eldon he did accordingly refer, and from that noble lord he met the reception which he expected from a just man and a gentleman. Lord Eldon, indeed, after observing, that it was not at the discretion of the lord lieutenant to exclude gentlemen from the commission of the peace, as that power belonged only to the lord chancellor, promised that the names of the gentlemen alluded to as they were those of proper and fitting persons for that office, should be inserted in the commission for Norfolk, which was done accordingly. In consequence of this example, a gentleman connected with the whig party being afterwards asked, whether he wished the lord lieutenant to put his name in the commission replied, "I will not make any application to the lord lieutenant upon the subject, Mr. Coke will take care of that." But should it become a material object with ministers to appoint only persons of particular opinions to the magistracy, under a lord chancellor, of different principles and character from lord Eldon, could it be for a moment doubted, that the apprehensions of his hon. and learned friend on the floor, as to the probable suberviency of that body, would turn out but too well founded. With respect to the language of the hon. and learned the solicitor general (which no doubt was meant as consolatory) that notwithstanding the adoption of this bill, lord lieutenants and sheriffs truly would still have the power of calling public meetings, who, he would be glad to know, had ever heard of a lord lieutenant calling a public meeting, and who had not heard that the most respectable requisitions for public meetings had been frequently refused by sheriffs? Upon the conduct of any sheriff who refused such a requisition, he thought it unnecessary to make any comment, but for himself he would say, that were a requisition signed by respectable gentlemen, presented to him as a sheriff, he should feel it his duty to comply with such requisition, however he might differ in political opinions from the gentlemen by whom it was subscribed, because it would be contrary to his principles in any case to interfere with the right of private judgment, or to impede the exercise of free discussion. The practice, however, of ministers had been, to his knowledge, for forty years, of quite an opposite description, and therefore he could not consent to increase the powers of men who acted upon such principles, particularly where he conceived the existence of such powers, not at all necessary. Looking, indeed, at the papers on the table, and to matters of universal notoriety, he thought the demand of ministers for those extraordinary powers quite unwarrantable, especially, satisfied as he was, that the meeting at Manchester would have gone off as quietly as that at Hunslet moor, and as many others of the same description, if it had not been interfered with by the officious agents of authority.

Lord Folkestone expressed his surprise and regret to hear his hon. and learned friend and his noble friend declare their intention to vote for the motion before the House, upon the condition that the bill should be temporary and local, while they heard the hon. and learned solicitor-general and the right hon. member for Oxford state the resolution of ministers to render it permanent and universal. But it would seem from what his hon. and learned and his noble friend had said, that they had not read the bill before the House. From that bill it appeared that while its advocates professed so much respect and regard for the right of petitioning, the exercise of that right must become impracticable, for any efficient purpose, from the number of restrictions meant to be imposed upon it. The hon. and learned gentleman who opened the debate, had described the measure as still leaving untouched the right of meeting to as great an extent as was necessary for an expression of public opinion, and for conveying to the throne or the legislature the wishes or the grievances of the people. The bill provided, said the hon. and learned gentleman, for a county-meeting, if called by the lord lieutenant of the county, by the high sheriff, by the grand jury, or by five magistrates. As to the lord-lieutenant, it was the first time he had ever heard of his calling county-meetings; as to the sheriff, why, there were instances lately of that officer refusing to call meetings upon the requisition of numerous and respectable bodies of freeholders. The grand jury, as formed by the high sheriff, might partake of his party spirit, and it might not be possible to procure the consent of five magistrates, degenerate as the magistracy might become, and appointed by the Crown as they always were. Was it not probable, then, that all those parties might become disinclined to public meetings, and thus deprive the county of all means of expressing its opinions on public measures? Upon the fair, or popular, or impartial exercise of such a right, it would, indeed, be absurd to calculate, especially from the course which ministers appeared determined to pursue. For they had proclaimed to the country in the dismissal of lord Fitzwilliam from the lord-lieutenancy of the West Riding of Yorkshire, that the only road to office—that the only tenure of authority was in unconditional subserviency to ministerial opinions. “But,” said the hon. and learned gentleman, “if all this fail, the people can still exercise the right of petition by district meetings,” for the hon. and learned gentleman was cautious not to go the length of saying parish meetings during the whole of his speech, though such meetings were contemplated in the bill. Even those limited assemblies were, however, to be subject to the most vexatious regulations. The inhabitants were not to be allowed to meet where they chose, when they chose, and how they chose. The justice was to have it in his power to alter the time and place of assembling, fixed upon by the requisitionists, to appoint another time and place of meeting, when and where half the parish could not attend—in a room for instance which would not admit a tenth part of those who had a right to be present. Nay, more; the justice had it in his power to send one of his emissaries into the meeting who did not belong to the parish or district, one of the noble lord’s spies for instance, whose presence or language might make the assembly illegal. The meeting on this might be ordered to disperse, and after a quarter of an hour all their proceedings would become illegal, their resolutions would be annulled, and they themselves would become liable to transportation. Under such regulations, restrictions, and penalties as these, were the boasted privileges of Englishmen to be exercised! He (lord Folkestone) would not support the bill as it now stood, in order that it might be afterwards modified. So objectionable did he feel the principle of the bill to be, that he could not agree with his noble or his hon. and learned friend in believing that any alteration of the provisions could change its character, and for his part he should oppose it altogether. He had the strongest objections to it, both in itself, and as making part of an obnoxious system. The noble lord, who had on Monday night opened his plan, would not allow him to consider this measure insulated; and the hon. and learned gentleman, who had this night played second fiddle to the noble lord, took a similar course. He would not, however, follow their example. He would not go into the other measures with which the present bill was connected: "sufficient for the day was the evil thereof," and there was enough in this single proposition to sicken the House for one night. He felt it necessary, however, to allude to what had fallen from the right hon. member for Oxford, whom he did not then see in his place; and as the subject to which he was about to advert was important, he regretted his absence. But he must previously observe, that the more these proceedings were discussed, the more strongly was exemplified the propriety of the vote given by 150 members of that House on a former night, in favour of an inquiry into the events at Manchester. The very account of those events given by that right hon. gentleman differed materially from the account given by the noble lord, and both were at variance with the statements as disclosed in the correspondence from the magistrates at Manchester. The version of the noble lord was contradicted in several important particulars even by the hon. and learned the solicitor-general, and his noble friend, the member for Lancashire, in his statement differed from both. He had since read the account of a Mr. Philips, in a pamphlet which he had sent him (though he was unacquainted with the individual), and he found, that that account differed entirely from all the rest. Now, he would ask the House, ought any bill founded on statements so vague and contradictory, to pass till inquiry took place, and the present uncertainty was removed? Was it fit, in the present state of the question, ignorant as he was, and as the great majority of that House must be, of the actual facts, to proceed to the adoption of permanent measures of legislation, alleged to be founded on the notoriety of circumstances with the particular nature of which the House was uninformed? He, for one, professed to know nothing of the state of that part of the country to which the proposed legislative measures were intended to apply. He believed it to be very much disturbed, and would readily agree that something ought to be done; but, in his present state of ignorance on the subject, he could not judge what measures were best calculated to restore tranquillity, and he was sure that many other members were as little informed as himself. How could they, then, proceed to legislate, while they were thus in the dark? "But," said the ministers of his Royal Highness, "the case is urgent, and some remedy must be immediately applied." This did not appear. The meetings had been mostly discontinued. But allowing the case to be urgent, why did they not propose an act which should continue in force for three months, during which time a full inquiry might take place? Though the noble lord boasted of his majority on the address, and on the motion of Tuesday, as decisive against inquiry, still he (lord Folkestone) was persuaded that inquiry must take place. The country would never be satisfied till the statements which were abroad were ascertained to be true or false, or till further information was obtained. The right hon. member for Oxford had described the state of the disturbed districts as most lamentable, and in one part of his speech had made an observation which he was afraid too plainly indicated the sentiment by which the Manchester magistrates were actuated. He had said, he conceived that it was better that the blood shed at Manchester had been shed, than that the meeting of the 16th of August should have taken place, and should have been allowed quietly to disperse. Strange, indeed, must be the state of things, when such a sentiment was uttered in such a quarter. He did believe, however, that it was a sentiment on which the magistrates of Manchester acted. He did think he saw, from the papers before the House, an internal evidence, which went to prove that it was the object to produce the very result which attended the meeting of the 16th of August. The right hon. gentleman had asked, whether a few constables could have met the different columns as they marched into the field and have stopped their progress. He (lord Folkestone) saw nothing impossible in this. A proclamation, warning the people not to attend a meeting, had prevented one on the 9th, and he saw no reason why what had succeeded on the 9th should have been ineffectual on the 16th. That the meeting on the 16th was illegal, was a point maintained by the magistrates in their own defence; and if it was illegal, why did they not tell the people so, especially as they saw that they had attended to their previous warning? But he believed that it was not the object of the magistrates to prevent the meeting, but to produce the result which had ensued. They had seen a demagogue arrested at a public meeting in London, and they wished to imitate the vigorous example.

In the letter of Mr. Hay it was stated, that when they saw the different parties pouring in, the magistrates felt alarm, and received the depositions of several persons who swore that they conceived the town in danger. Did they take any steps on [the first information? No, the time was not yet arrived: they did not conceive the insurrection begun till Mr. Hunt arrived. Their design, therefore, seemed evidently to take him at the risk of all the blood that might be shed on the occasion. In confirmation of this their intention, he might state what he had heard from a gentleman of undoubted credit—that it had been said at Buxton on the 14th of August, that Hunt and the other orators would be seized on the 16th, in the face of the meeting. Did not all this demand inquiry? And were we, without inquiry, to pull down the pillars of the constitution as would be done by this bill, and take away the right of guarding by public meetings our most precious privileges all over the kingdom, merely on the allegation of an unexamined local evil? He had already said that something ought to be done, but let the measure be of the same character as the evil—let it be limited to the disturbed districts, and, if made temporary, he would even agree to a measure of a stronger nature, if the House would pledge itself, after the restoration to a better state of things, to proceed into an examination of the causes of the existing evil. The House must perceive from the accounts of the various gentlemen who had spoken, that parts of the country were actually in a state of disorganization. Property, it was said, was at stake—loyal men were alarmed from coming forward—persons refused to be enrolled as special constables—and, strange to say! the existence of this state of things, nothing short of complete anarchy, was admitted by the very persons who, in the same breath, decided against the necessity of any inquiry by parliament. He doubted the truth of the representation, but at any rate it was a fit subject for inquiry. The bill, as it stood at present, was totally inapplicable to the required purpose. It comprehended equally in its penal regulations the innocent and the guilty; applied as much to the districts where the greatest tranquillity prevailed, as to those which were represented to be in the greatest disturbance; and was irreconcilable with the spirit and usages of the constitution. No alteration in a committee could remove his objections; he conceived it better at once to throw it out; and if the noble lord pleased, he could introduce one less objectionable in its principle, and more calculated to meet the particular evil.

Mr. Peel, in explanation, said, that however mistaken by the noble lord, he thought he had qualified his expressions respecting the meeting at Manchester sufficiently to guard himself from the suspicion of not feeling as deeply as any hon. gentleman could for the calamity of that day. The noble lord had certainly quoted his words correctly, but he appealed to the House, to believe, that though he had in words accompanied the observation with no qualification, yet it was far from his feeling to give utterance to any expression that bordered on inhumanity. He never under-rated the evil attendant on the dispersion of the Manchester meeting and the only reason why he thought it better than if it had taken another course, was that if that meeting had not been dispersed another would have taken place, and a collision might have ensued between the military and the people, in which much more blood would have been shed. He was anxious to state that such was his sense of the transaction, lest his expressions might be misrepresented.

Lord Folkestone said, that when he quoted the words of the right hon. gentleman, he by no means imputed to him any improper feeling. But he must be allowed to state, in answer to the right hon. gentleman's explanation, that as to the probability of a more mischievous result at Manchester from future meetings, in other places second and third meetings of a similar character had taken place, and no blood had been shed.

Mr. Wilmot said, that being fully sensible of the dangers which had given rise to the measures proposed, he considered those measures as calculated to preserve the liberties of the people, instead of infringing on them. There was, he said, a material distinction between liberty—a rational liberty—and licentiousness; for every physical good in the world, if carried to an extreme, would become an evil. The very air we breathe, the heat that fructifies the earth, the light from Heaven became noxious if unmodified; even our virtues might, by their excess, approximate to vice, nor is it otherwise with liberty. And when we now see her frantic

Mr. Wilmot said, that being fully sensible of the dangers which had given rise to the measures proposed, he considered those measures as calculated to preserve the liberties of the people, instead of infringing on them. There was, he said, a material distinction between liberty—a rational liberty—and licentiousness; for every physical good in the world, if carried to an extreme, would become an evil. The very air we breathe, the heat that fructifies the earth, the light from Heaven became noxious if unmodified; even our virtues might, by their excess, approximate to vice, nor is it otherwise with liberty. And when we now see her frantic and infuriated, shall we, instead of restraining her, rather place a poignard in her hand to perpetrate her own destruction. The speech of the noble lord who had just sat down, he could not say was judicious. The noble lord had talked of the unwillingness of lord lieutenants, of sheriffs, of grand juries, and of magistrates, that meetings should be held. But, were the objects of such meetings as had recently been assembled legal. Did any man in the House venture to say that they were? With respect to the observations that the noble lord had made upon the meeting at Manchester, and upon which the right hon. gentleman had given so satisfactory an explanation, he would venture to say, that those observations were in some points not quite correct. The noble lord had said, that the magistrates might have prevented the meeting; and he contrasted their conduct on that occasion, with their conduct on the occasion of the projected meeting of the 9th of August, which meeting was illegally convened. The meeting of the 16th was legally convened, but became illegal; for it could not be pretended these were not illegal adjuncts, the banners, the order, the threatenings, to say nothing of the possibility of concealed arms. It certainly would not have been irrational if such a suspicion had been entertained. His conviction was, that the meeting was founded in treasonable designs, and that the magistrates must not only be acquitted of tyranny in the exercise of their discretion, but that there was not even a prima facie case of presumption that they had acted wrong. To put them upon their trial would be utterly unjust and unwise. The measures now proposed were not, he contended, an abolition, but only a limitation of right. The circumstances of the country called for a permanent system of legislation upon the subject. Did any body advocate the principle of those meetings? If such a man existed, it could only be in the person of the individual just returned from America who had dug up the unhallowed bones of the blasphemer, and had brought them to this country for the purpose of creating a phrenzied feeling in favour of his projects, and, like old John Zisca, who desired that his skin should be made into a drum to rouse his countrymen, he wished to stir up impiety and disaffection, by the exhibition of this mummary to the irritated population of this country. It might not be useless at the present crisis, to point out what were the tyrannical and oppressive opinions which this man Cobbett, once entertained; which were such as no one who sat in that House would venture to express. He would refer to an expression used by one of the greatest ornaments of that House and of the country—the late Mr. Burke—but which every man who looked with due feelings upon the poor must deprecate. That gentleman had applied to the lower orders the appellation of “the swinish multitude.” But the person to whom he had just alluded had gone still further. The hon. member here read an extract from the writings of Cobbett, which not only applied the term “swinish multitude” to the lower orders of the poor, but expressed a hope, that the Gadarean devil would enter them, and drive them into the sea. To such a man it was that the common people lent a willing ear; one, who had no other object in view but his own aggrandizement. The hon. member said, he was satisfied that the existing evils resulted, in great measure, from causes beyond the power of the legislature to remove; and that the remission of any taxation which the gentlemen on the other side could suggest, or any change in the representation, would not remove any of the present distresses. The hon. baronet who represented the city of Westminster was the only person in the House who ever advocated the principle of universal suffrage as the panacea for all the evils of the state; but that honourable baronet had subsequently revoked, at least, he had not persevered in, his opinion. The ability which the hon. baronet had manifested in his various speeches on parliamentary reform, reminded him of the answer of Cicero to Marcus Crassus, when the latter asked Cicero, why, having formerly praised him he was now disposed to abuse him? “I did praise you,” said Cicero, “to show my ingenuity in making a good speech upon so base and execrable a subject.” The point now to be considered was not so much whether the bill was abstractedly favourable or not to the liberty of the subject, but whether the House, striking the balance between two evils, would adopt it as the less. He thought the present circumstances of the country were somewhat similar to those of the year 1797; for he found in the records of that day a passage peculiarly applicable to the present situation of affairs. The hon. member then quoted the following passage from a speech made by Mr. Henry Fox in the year 1737: "When the tides of popular fury, Sir, begin to beat against the servants of the Crown, it has been so in all ages, that if they were not timely checked, they soon grew too strong for any barrier, either of law or duty, to oppose them, till in the end they bore down sovereign authority itself. The pillars of this House, Sir, were never shaken, nor was this constitution ever ruined but by the cowardice and treachery of those who ought to have been the protectors and guardians of both. While we were united among ourselves we had nothing to fear from what was acting or plotting abroad; but if we shall now betray irresolution and weakness, if we should neglect to inflict a wholesome severity while power is in our hands and justice on our side, have we not every thing to fear from those who will undoubtedly assume courage from our timidity, and grow insolent upon our lenity?"* He considered that he should be consulting the best interests of the country by voting for the bill. He was anxious to preserve that constitution which had long been the admiration of the world, and which had furnished all the liberties that America had to boast. That constitution ought to be preserved at the hazard of a temporary sacrifice; and, feeling that, he should most cordially give his vote for the second reading of the bill.

Lord Milton could not agree with the arguments which had been advanced in favour of the bill by his hon. friend, who appeared to him not to be sufficiently acquainted with the object which the bill had in view, when he said that its effect would not be the total uprooting of the most valuable privilege of Englishmen, the right of assembling to discuss their grievances, and of petitioning for redress. His hon. friend did not seem to be aware where the proceedings which were now in the train of receiving the sanction of the legislature would end.—The bill purported to have for its object the suppression of illegal meetings; but all meetings would be by it prevented, except such as it might please certain persons to assemble. His hon. friend, whose attachment to the constitution could not be doubted, was mistaken in his view of the effects of the measure, for even he himself could not, consistently with the provisions of the bill, attend a meeting at Derby; no, not even in the next parish to his residence. He would not have been tempted to address the House if he had not felt it requisite to make some observations upon what had been advanced by the right hon. gentleman on the second bench opposite, who had declared in a portentous speech, that in consequence of the increased manufactures in Lancashire, and in the adjoining counties, a new state of population and of society existed there, for which it was necessary that a new system of laws should be enacted relative to public meetings. But was it consistent on the part of the right hon. gentleman to declare, that it would be improper that the measure should have merely a local effect, and that it ought to be general in its operation throughout England? What! because a few counties in the North West parts of the country had acted incorrectly, were the inhabitants of the whole island to be deprived of their privileges? And in order to prevent the accumulations, or rather, the conglomerations of the populace in those districts, no populous meeting was to be tolerated elsewhere! Reference had been made by his hon. friend who had spoken last, to the proceedings of parliament, in 1737; but though parliament then enacted strong measures, they had been solely directed against the city of Edinburgh. Why was not that example followed on the present occasion? Again, when in the reign of Charles 2nd, a number [of persons assembled at Westminster, and several of the guards were killed, a bill was passed to limit the rights of assemblies there, but there had been no such universal measure as the present adopted. The people ought to be supported in their struggle through the difficulties which at present oppressed them rather than be overloaded with pains and penalties, when they came forward to point out the mode and the means which should be adopted in order to afford them the relief which they sought for. Parliament ought to imitate their ancestors, and try to overcome the existing evils by moderate measures, rather than lead to alienation by the enactment of pains and penalties.

Mr. Philips was unwilling to obtrude himself upon the House at that late hour, but he could not allow the question to come to a vote without stating some reasons for the decision at which he arrived. It appeared to him that the conduct of the noble lord was wholly inconsistent with his professions. The noble lord had urged all parties to unite with the government in its endeavours to put an end to the disturbances in the interior; but the moment an inclination was shown to coincide with ministers, if they would consent to make the measure in question local and temporary, he had seemed more than ever resolved that it should be general and permanent. He (Mr. Philips) begged the House to consider to what this country was indebted for the constitution of which it was so justly proud. Had it not grown out of the freedom of the press, which was now to be restricted; and out of public meetings and free discussion of public grievances, of which the people were now to be deprived? He knew that liberty, in order to be enjoyed properly, ought to be restrained; but liberty was not the private possession of a few persons, it was the possession of the inhabitants of a whole country. Some hon. gentlemen had talked of plots to burn the town of Manchester; if he had found that he was mistaken in any thing he had advanced on a former night, he would willingly have acknowledged his error; but after all his opportunities of correct investigation, he was most decidedly of opinion that no such attack was ever meditated, and that the whole project originated in the invention of spies and informers. He frankly allowed that the manufacturing districts were in a state requiring vigilance and attention, and that the most active instigators were not always the most severely distressed. But there was one material consideration of which the House ought not to lose sight, and that was, that the people in the manufacturing districts had been suddenly reduced from high to low wages; so that, in addition to their real sufferings, they had to endure the evil of the contrast between an increase of taxation, and a diminution of emolument. Upon the subject of manufacturers not being in the commission of the peace, he wished to make a remark or two, addressed principally to the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. That right hon. gentleman had said that an inconvenience had once arisen from making a manufacturer a magistrate, and that the practice was accordingly discontinued; the magistrate referred to, it was stated, had misapplied his power, for the advancement of his own interests. This was true, but it was not for the advancement of his own interests as a manufacturer, but as an owner of land, which he had sold to greater profit. The case alluded to therefore formed no solid objection to the appointment of manufacturers to be magistrates; and the House would recollect that that class of individuals possessed the greatest share of property. If they were not included among the persons eligible, the choice must be limited to a few individuals; and among them the clergy, who, it was obvious, ought not to be brought forward on occasions like that which had chiefly caused the debates on which parliament was now engaged.

Lord Castlereagh declared that, after the full discussion which this important subject had undergone, and after the frequent occasions on which he had troubled the House, nothing but a strong sense of duty would have induced him again to come forward for the purpose of making a few remarks on what had fallen from the hon. member who had just taken his seat. He should confine his observations strictly to one or two points, and he would not have spoken at all could he with candour and fairness have suffered the House to separate without stating unreservedly the impression on his mind. As to the principle of the bill, he begged the House to consider the true and narrow issue on which the vote of to-night depended. Every hon. member must give his support to the second reading who did not think the measure totally incapable of being so altered and modified in the committee as to make it suit his particular views; so that every gentleman not disputing the principle, and who thought that something ought to be done in the present state of the country on the question now before the House, would give his vote in favour of the objects ministers had in view. Thus nobody would be pledged as to the details, which could be modified as the House in a future stage might deem expedient. The point to which he wished to advert, and which, indeed, had induced him to rise, related to the appeal made to ministers to assent to two propositions—the one for making the bill local, and the other for rendering it temporary. On these terms some hon. gentlemen had expressed a willingness to conciliate, and had invited ministers to join in that conciliation. He could assure the House, that though much had been said in the course of the debate, which was very little in the spirit of conciliation, and although ministers had been charged with being nothing less than the authors of the existing distresses (so that he had been induced to express a determination to meet the difficulties of the times without the concurrence of the other side), yet nothing that had passed could have prevented him from accepting the invitation, could he have been satisfied that such an acceptance would be consistent with the public interest and national security. First, as to rendering the measure local, he would remind the House, that as far as the wisdom of parliament had been collected, it had not been the practice to pursue the same line of policy with regard to Great Britain, as had been adopted towards Ireland: the judgment of the legislature was, therefore, in opposition to the proposal. Referring back to the year 1796, it would be found that the disturbances of that period had grown out of one meeting (that at Copenhagen-house), and the measures to meet the evil were framed accordingly. In 1801, though popular assemblies in the country had been more prevalent, yet they took their origin in the same way from one source; and in 1817, when a system of meetings was established, it had been founded upon a single portentous convention in Spa-fields. Still parliament did not confine itself to acts merely local; and there was therefore no precedent for such a mode of treating the question. Now as to the reason of the case, and the question what it was prudent to do in matters of such importance, he must say, that though on a former occasion he had been excessively anxious to congratulate the House on the tranquil state of Ireland, and of the agricultural counties, yet on the other hand, it would be acting on a principle of more confidence than wisdom, if in all cases it were to be said that this visible tranquillity was a proof of real quiet, and that the district would not be visited by calamities which raged in other situations. He entreated hon. gentlemen to recollect what was the apparent situation of much of the disturbed district. When parliament last separated, the general surface of the country was tranquil; at least there prevailed a visible tranquillity; but very shortly after another temper was manifest. Appearances, under such circumstances, were not to be trusted to, and the contagion spread too fast to suffer them to rest in security. As to the West Riding of Yorkshire, the letter of lord Fitzwilliam was evidence that the noble lord did not consider that the public peace was there in any degree menaced at the time that he wrote to government. But what was the fact? Lord Fitzwilliam had scarcely reached Lymington, to which he retired, when the meeting took place on Hunslet-moor; and that single occurrence had such an effect upon the whole of the West Riding, that there was not a single town within its limits that did not afterwards witness a scene of the same radical and tumultuary description. Was parliament then to circumscribe its remediable measures, and limit them to stop an evil which was so likely to outstrip any bounds? He put it to the noble lord opposite what had been the effect of one or two of those numerous meetings in the part of the kingdom with which he was particularly connected—of those meetings that carried such terror into the minds of the loyal and well-disposed in the west of Scotland. Had such a measure as now was offered to parliament been in existence, would his noble relation have been placed in the difficult situation he had experienced; or would any persons have refused to put their names to the declaration that had been drawn up? Could not the noble lord, with his influence and property, have raised armaments for the preservation of the peace of the country (which he afterwards found impossible) but for that one meeting in particular which had struck more terror into the minds of the good, and disseminated more discontent among those easily corrupted, than any subsequent steps could efface? The law must be efficient to cope with the extent of the mischief, and not nugatory as a subsequent application. What had happened in Yorkshire was repeated near Newcastle. Immediately previous to one of the most malignant meetings near Newcastle, at which not less than 700 armed men were present to resist the civil power, ministers received the most positive assurances from gentlemen of the county, that they could safely answer for the good disposition of the people. The result of that single meeting was, that terror was spread in every quarter, and all efforts to arm the loyal in defence of the laws and constitution were abandoned as unavailing: such was the dismay, that those who had previously given in their names for enrolment, could not afterwards be induced to come forward. Was the House, then, with such facts before it, prepared to try an experiment—to let its measures halt tamely behind the mischief, and not arrive until the greater part had been completed? Admitting that the agricultural districts were at present in complete security, was it to be denied that into many of them manufactories extensively intruded? Besides, agriculture was not altogether exempt from distress: if it did not now feel it, it might do so at some future period; and distresses in other parts of the kingdom might extend their baneful influence into those at present free from infection. Look, then, what would be the consequence of making the measure local? In the first place, it could not be carried into operation until after a tedious and dangerous process which the law would render necessary, were the measure to have a limited operation, and to be extended, as in the case of Ireland, on the requisition of the magistrates. The case must first establish itself—the magistrates would next have to communicate with the government—its answer must then be received, and farther time must be allowed before the remedy could get into operation. In the interval, how many radical meetings might be held, and how much alarm spread throughout the surrounding country? He farther submitted, that this was precisely the description of evil which the legislature ought to deal with on the general principle, without leaving it to the local magistrates. The practice of parliament at former periods confirmed this opinion: the nature of the evil had always guided its judgment, and of course the general tendency of the prevailing corruption was to extend itself into other districts, and that silently and darkly, until it was prepared to work its full effect. In his view, therefore, facts, reason, and policy, all united to induce the House to pass a general, and not a local measure. With regard to the second point, whether the bill ought or ought not to be permanent, he had stated his view on a former night, that, fairly considered, the measure ought not to be regarded as an invasion of the rights of the subject. No embarrassment was thrown in the way of the exercise of the undoubted right of the people to petition the Crown or either House of parliament, and a great portion of the policy of making the measure permanent arose out of the peculiar character of the meetings? It was quite clear that nothing could place the subject in a more disadvantageous position, with respect to the right of petitioning, than not knowing distinctly how he might exercise that right without being exposed to the visitation of the law; it was also obvious that nothing could be more important to the best interests of the country than to relieve magistrates from such a difficult situation as those of Manchester had been placed in on the 16th of August. Could any discretion be more delicate for magistrates, than for them to be called upon to decide what circumstances attending a meeting gave it that character of illegality which justified them as a matter of duty and prudence in dispersing the meeting? He was prepared to maintain, that the bill did not at all affect the right of petitioning, excepting that it afforded the subject the advantage of a clear and indubitable rule by which he might exercise it. Would the House wish that the state of things which existed in Yorkshire should be extended to other situations? If so, this bill might be rejected; but was it not most lamentable, when magistrates were obliged to submit to the terror of such meetings as had been there held, because they considered it a less evil than risking an endeavour to disperse them? Was it not most lamentable to see lord Fitzwilliam, a man of such undoubted character and loyalty, rejoicing at the close of the Hunslet-moor meeting, that it had been attended with no worse consequences? A collection of 30,000 persons were there assembled, and the most unqualified treason was the subject of discussion; yet lord Fitzwilliam wrote to government, stating his great satisfaction that the meeting had dispersed quietly. Such was the state of the country. Was there any object more likely to be of advantage to the subject who meant bona fide to exercise his just rights, than to show him how he could exercise them without the possibility of being interrupted? The principle of the measure was no more than this—that where a meeting was not thought proper by the constituted authorities, it must be held within certain limits, to afford security against the danger of numbers; and it was rather singular, that in this country, down to a very late period, the only meetings known were those called by the constituted authorities. A noble lord had hinted his suspicions, that if the assembling of a meeting depended on the magistrates, they might be packed by the government: but he (lord Castle-reagh) put it to the good sense of any man, whether, supposing the sheriff refused to call a meeting, five gentlemen out of the whole magistracy of a county could not be found to assemble the people? An hon. gentleman had objected to the conduct of the lord-lieutenant of the county of Norfolk, and the manner in which the complaint was made was certainly somewhat objectionable: if, however, such exclusion had taken place, and had been remedied in the manner specified, did not the fact furnish conclusive evidence that there was an appeal, and that that appeal would not be made in vain? Returning, however, to the disturbances, he begged to ask, whether any hon. gentleman really thought that the mischief had taken little root, or that persons at the head of it were likely to be diverted, or converted by such a measure as the noble lord had hinted at, for two, three, or six months? In his conscience, he believed, that if parliament were to do that, it would be far wiser that it should have attempted nothing. The remedy must be applicable to the evil; and as the evil was of a permanent nature, so must be the remedy. Would not the designing and disaffected watch the moment when the restriction should be removed, and renew all the miseries they had now created? By giving permanency to the measure, it was not put out of the power of parliament at any future period to repeal or modify it. He was the more earnest upon the subject, because he could not conscientiously persuade himself, that there was any thing in the bill that was inconsistent with the true liberty of the subject. On the contrary, he believed that it was the best safeguard of the constitution, and that it would secure Englishmen in the exercise of a valuable right, in the manner most compatible with their own and their country's interests. Sure he was that parliament would be disposed to give the measure that degree of permanency which would enable it to cope with the danger: if temporary, it would not only be futile in itself, but would hold out to the leaders of treason and rebellion a motive to manage their dependents and husband their force until when the bill expired it would be too strong to be resisted. He had thought himself bound in candour to offer these remarks, in order to show that ministers had not altered the view which they originally took of the question.

Lord Folkestone explained, that when he spoke of a bill for two, three, or six months, he meant it only to last until the inquiry had been concluded; and then he should be disposed, if a case were made out, to intrust ministers even with a stronger measure.

Mr. Beaumont expressed his unwillingness to intrude upon the House, but he was desirous of correcting an observation made by the noble lord. The noble lord had stated, on the authority of the mayor of Newcastle, that 700 armed men marched to the meeting from a neighbouring village. The fact however was, that having used every endeavour on the spot, to obtain evidence; he could not find a single person who could state that he had seen any arms upon that occasion. He did not state this as a matter of triumph to any party, and he meant to vote that the bill should be committed; but before he gave his final sanction to any measure, he must have full assurance that it was calculated to remove the evil. He trusted that as the whole of the country did not appear to be in a disturbed state, the bill would be made limited in its operation. He was perfectly willing to admit that the abominable doctrines which had of late been circulated with so much assiduity, were calculated to plunge the people into every mischievous excess, and were subversive of every thing valuable in the country; but he was persuaded that the evil did not proceed altogether from the restlessness of the people, but was principally attributable to the great distress which existed. Whether or not that distress proceeded from misrule he was not prepared to say.

Mr. John Smith said, he could not agree to the bill as it at present stood, but if the noble lord, and the gentlemen who supported him, would consent that the measure should not be permanent, he would not oppose it. If it were passed for three, or even for four years, it should, with the exception of one or two clauses, receive his support. But, unless ministers could show that the causes which called for it were of a permanent nature, how could that House be justified in legislating permanently? During the last twenty years, he had observed a great deal of commercial distress; and he had uniformly remarked, that in proportion to the existing distress was the political dissatisfaction expressed by the people. The existing distress he knew to be most extensive and severe. On this subject he had received information from a gentleman whom he would not name, but who was well known to many of the individuals who heard him, and whose brother had been a distinguished ornament of that House. In a letter which that gentleman had written to him, he said, "The cause of the whole of our distresses in Scotland may be stated in two words,—empty stomachs!" The hon. member said, he believed that the want of employment, and the consequent want of bread, in various parts of the country, created that distress, which had ultimately produced acts of insubordination. If those causes could be removed by this measure, he would agree to it; but he would not consent to a permanent bill of this kind, unless its beneficial effects were demonstrated, and the strongest necessity shown for its adoption. He regretted most sincerely, that when laws were framing for the coercion of the people, no attempt was, on the other hand, made to improve their condition. Something of the latter kind must speedily be done; and a measure of the sort under consideration would appear with a better grace, if accompanied by some measure of relief. He should have been very glad to support government on the present occasion; but he could not agree to a bill, which was to deprive the people of their rights for ever.

Mr. Brougham rose amidst cries of question from the ministerial side of the House, and calls equally loud from the opposition benches for him to proceed. He said he did not mean to trouble the House at any great length on account of the indisposition under which he laboured; but, at the same time, he could not pass over the speech of the noble lord opposite, without pressing on their attention the important points which it contained. It now appeared, in the appropriate language of the hon. member for Northumberland, and of an hon. gentleman who had recently sat down, what sort of conciliation they were to expect from the noble lord. They now knew what value to put upon his declaration, when he said, that if gentlemen on his (Mr. Brougham's) side of the House showed a disposition to meet him half way, he would endeavour to render that meeting joyful by approaching them. But now it appeared that he would not give them the slightest token of conciliation. His conciliatory nature would only concede to the country and the constitution those points which he stated when he originally submitted his measures to the House. He would not impose a censorship on the press; he would not make it punishable with death to attend at a meeting in a neighbourhood to which an individual did not belong, and where a spy might be ready to give information of the circumstance; nor would he destroy the liberty of the press! These were his concessions—these were all the favours which the country were to expect from him! The noble lord in the first instance took advantage of the precedent of former times, which he contended was with him; but when he found that it did not answer his purpose with reference to existing circumstances, he immediately flung his precedent overboard, and relied on his general argument. He considered this measure to be no abridgment of the constitution, to be founded on legal and constitutional views, to be consistent with the principles of liberty, and to afford the best security for the rights of the subject properly understood. On these points he was at issue with the noble lord, and the hon. member for the university of Oxford: he denied the correctness of the argument, and the whole of the grounds on which it rested; and if the House would permit him, he would point out the reasons on which he founded his opinions.

The abuse of the right of petition by persons assembled in public meeting was the foundation of this measure. That right, he had observed, was never so highly prized as when it was about to be destroyed; and he always listened with prophetic terror to the praises so sweetly sounded on its worth and value: for, from experience, he could say, that when it was to be suspended for a time, and not as now, to be destroyed for ever, those praises were always the forerunner of that event—as they were now, the prelude of the eternal abrogation of the people's rights. Those rights, it seemed, were brought into disrepute—a sort of stigma was cast on them by certain foolish and wicked practices, which had been adopted at public meetings. He did not wish to deprive the noble lord of the benefit of this one fact; he did not wish to misrepresent or to mistake it; for he himself did, to a certain degree, concur in the propriety of that sentiment. As a firm friend to the right of petitioning, which he would praise, not for the purpose of overthrowing, but for the purpose of protecting, defending, and continuing in its purity, he, too, deeply lamented the proceedings which had been alluded to. He was not less aware of the folly and wickedness of some of the speeches delivered at those meetings than the noble lord was; but he could not, on that account, acquiesce in a total subversion of a great popular right. He feared, indeed, that the too frequent use of that right had an evil tendency, by making the people extremely careless and indifferent about its exercise on great public occasions. It was known to all persons who were in the habit of attending public meetings, that where in one instance great numbers, appeared and active and animated discussion took place, it was found difficult for some time after to procure another meeting at which equal zeal would be manifested. He also disapproved of the system on which those recent meetings were conducted. He broadly disapproved of the array in which men were marched from place to place. It pointed to any thing rather than to the beginning of a deliberative assembly. He also objected to the large amount of numbers which were collected on these occasions. If 60 or 70,000 persons must meet, if the population of a place allowed such a mass to assemble together, it must always be attended with danger, and therefore he disapproved of it. With respect to the display of banners and the introduction of music, he did not see the danger which many persons apprehended. Some of the inscriptions, he admitted, were reprehensible, and therefore ought to be discouraged. But as to the use of common flags—even those inscribed with “liberty or death,” of which so much had been said, and which differed essentially from “equal representation or death”—and the introduction of music, he never saw them otherwise than the concomitants, if not the promoters, of mirth and good humour among the multitude.

Having admitted thus much, he thought it would be much better for the people if those abuses were not practised—if those irregularities, without utterly destroying this right could be prevented or checked. He could not, however, agree with the noble lord and the right hon. member for the university of Oxford, that because at one meeting a violent speech was made, and at another a violent resolution was proposed; and still less could he admit, that because an individual made use of language and disseminated sentiments at one time which were repugnant with those published by him at another; that, therefore, all public assemblies, all meetings of the people, were to be put down for ever. The hon. and learned gentleman then read to the House the resolutions which were passed at Hunslet Moor: one of them declared that saving banks were a fraud, instituted to pay the fractions of dividends: and another described the national debt to amount to 100,000,000,000*l.*; but was it to be gravely told to them in that House, because resolutions most absurd and ridiculous, and on the part of those who proposed them, most mischievously designed, were submitted to certain assemblies, that, therefore, the people should in future hold no meetings at all? Did not the House know that good resolutions had often been passed at popular meetings—resolutions from which that House, in times of peril and exigence, had derived the greatest benefit, and would again, if the people were fairly treated, and the occasion called for it? He was afraid that there were places of high character (he would not mention one which he had at that moment in his eye), which if this strict rule of justice, by which the right of meeting was suppressed for ever, were to be adopted, would not be exempted from its operation. He knew a place where resolutions had been agreed to, and by a great majority, which were as inconsistent with arithmetic as those which the hon. member had quoted—resolutions as absurd as those agreed to at different public meetings, although not so steadily persevered in; he recollected a resolution which declared that a pound note was actually equal in estimation with 20 shillings; this was agreed to in one week, and three weeks after, the same assembly passed a law, making it highly penal to give less than 20 shillings for a pound note. A few years after, however, he found the parties who agreed to that measure, coming back to the standard of common sense, and negating the principle contained in the original resolution [Hear and laughter]. Good God! then how far must they go if the passing resolutions containing absurdities in arithmetic, or errors with respect to constitutional rights, were to be deemed a sufficient cause to destroy all popular assemblies? In the place to which he was alluding, they were one day voting, that two and two made five; and the next day bringing back the amount of these two figures to its natural value. He was going to say that these contradictory resolutions were unblushingly, but he would assert unwittingly and unthinkingly passed by large majorities: he was however told, that these mischief-makers (for so some of them were) did not submit their resolutions to the people in the form in which they afterwards appeared. Lord Fitzwilliam, it seemed could not get those passed in Yorkshire immediately after the meeting had taken place, because they were not dressed up for appearance before the people. How did this fact tell for the purpose of the argument? The resolutions which were now in the hands of members, were those which had been dressed up, and non constat, that they were the resolutions of 20,000 persons who were asserted to have agreed to them. They were in fact the resolutions of those who dressed them up, and who doubtless, did so in order to give them a greater sting. This was an argument against the bill. The reason assigned for introducing the bill was, that a vast body of persons assembled at Hunslet Moor, and agreed to a series of resolutions which rendered it dangerous for them to meet; and it now appeared that the resolutions exhibited were only the work of a few demagogues.

Training and military exercise, except for an innocent purpose (and that purpose he conceived it was incumbent in the person accused to prove) was, by the existing law, a high misdemeanor, and when coupled with a conspiracy against the state, assumed a highly penal character. But, without that circumstance of aggravation, the simple fact of 500 or 600 persons training, not innocently, was a misdemeanor, and if they trained at night, with any sort of offensive weapon, it undoubtedly became a misdemeanor of a very serious character. If the law were defective, with respect to that offence, let it, by all means, be rectified. To so fair a proposition he could not object. But, he asked how could that training be connected with another bill, not against that offence, but introduced to prevent the people from discussing any point that affected their interests either in church or state? He was very far, indeed, from thinking that there was no ground for alarm; for seven or eight months his opinion had been, that there was ground for apprehension. In the districts which were disturbed, great distress it was admitted did prevail; and that that distress had given rise to acts of an extremely reprehensible nature, all must allow. But he would entreat gentlemen to pause before they assumed, that those acts were as large and general in extent, even in what were denominated the disturbed counties, as the evidence garbled, and anonymous as it was, asserted. He was well persuaded that it was an arduous task to undeceive those who fancied they were threatened with a great danger! but it was much better that he should discharge his painful duty, at present, rather than move an adjournment of the debate: although, after the uncompromising statement of the noble lord, some gentlemen might think that necessary. He knew that although in private life the man who allayed alarm, was hailed as a consoler, it was not so with the man who endeavoured to open the eyes of the public to their safety, and who was generally considered not a comforter but an enemy. He should walk charily, therefore, in that path. But he could not forget several instances, in which great public alarm had been proved to be wholly unfounded; and he especially referred to the alarm in the year 1812. The report of the other House of parliament in 1812, on which the legislative measures then adopted were principally founded, among other terrific statements to show the altered character of Englishmen, gave an account of the murder of Mr. Horsfall, accompanied by the circumstance that, after having been fired at by four men from behind the wall, he fell from his horse, when he was immediately surrounded by a ferocious multitude, who hailed the event with savage exultation. This statement was made on the authority of A. B., C. D., E. F., and other couples of the alphabet, backed by the declaration of the most respectable magistrates, men of unimpeachable credit, and who, he was persuaded, believed all, because they thought that they knew all. It had its effect on the House of Lords as it had previously had on his majesty's ministers. The committee of the House of Lords were not allowed to examine persons. He did not say that that committee was packed, although the members of it were nominated by ministers; but the bag of evidence submitted to them was packed. Let the bag be packed, and let the examination of witnesses be prohibited, and whoever might be the members of a committee, the result of their investigation must necessarily be the same. For seven months the alarming fact thus stated in the report of the committee of the House of Lords was believed, and every man who doubted it was treated with the utmost contempt. Away went parliament to work on legislative measures. In the fulness of time, however, the truth came out. At the special commission in York, seven months after the report, it was made evident, that so far from the body of Mr. Horsfall having been surrounded by a ferocious multitude, hailing his murder with exultation, it was with great difficulty that a single man was found to assist in carrying it to a neighbouring apothecary's! He did not doubt that something like the case existed at present. Undoubtedly he did not mean to deny all the statements that had been made of the causes for alarm, but he was persuaded that they were grossly exaggerated; and he owned that he felt some solace in not thinking so badly of his countrymen as did some other persons whom he could name. The hon. member for Northumberland had contradicted the statement of the 700 men said so have marched with arms into Newcastle from a village three miles off. The fact was, that the mayor of Newcastle, for whom he (Mr. Brougham) had a great respect, merely said in his letter, "if my information be correct," &c. A circumstance that convinced him of the inaccuracy of the statement was, that to his knowledge there was not a village within six or seven miles of Newcastle that could turn out 700 men capable of bearing arms.

It was asked how could lord Fitzwilliam suppose that there was no danger, (and this, by the way, was thought one of the finest arguments "ad hominem,") when it was known that at one of these meetings the partition of his property was pointed at? Now, to tell one half the truth, was just as useless as if an individual joined to it one half of another story. What would the inference be, if it appeared that it was Mitchell who made this proposition? [Hear, hear]. Yes; Mitchell, whose name was never mentioned when the circumstance was stated. If he, and he alone, made that proposition, and if it was the only suggestion of the kind that was ever offered at any of these Yorkshire meetings. What was the argument good for? What did it really prove?

He should now mention another misrepresentation—a misrepresentation that came from that part of the public press which, day by day, insulted the distresses of the people; which treated them with contumelious indignity, with unbearable insolence, which poured on them all the abuse that the malignity of man could devise, and in doing so, displayed all the asperity of office, without its dignity. These censures came from individuals, who were much lower than those to whom they applied them; because low birth seeking to exalt itself by cringing to those in power, was infinitely more mean and despicable than low birth when coupled with honest industry. These low panders of the government of the day—these backbiters of the people—these offenders against all decency, when they spoke of the great body of the nation, disseminated the grossest misrepresentations. To them the dismissal of lord Fitzwilliam was confidentially made known, and the event appeared in one of those channels of spurious intelligence, (unfortunately not spurious on that occasion) before the act which was praised as a vigorous and wise proceeding was known to the noble lord himself. They had, without the shadow of foundation, brought earl Fitzwilliam and the people in perilous contact; by them the public were told, and confidently told, that acts approaching to treason took place at the meeting at Hunslet-moor; that arms were brought thither, that resolutions encouraging resistance were proposed and adopted, and then it was gravely stated, that some of those who attended the meeting waited on lord Fitzwilliam, and shot him dead on the spot! [Hear, hear!] He stated this to show that a system of misrepresentation was not confined to one part of the press, but was extensively adopted by another which was not only allowed to go unpunished, as blasphemous and seditious persons had been for some time, but actually enjoyed the special protection of his majesty's government. The evidence of lord Fitzwilliam was not believed with respect to the state of the country: it would be well for the House to consider on whom his majesty's ministers depended for information. Of the evidence given by A, B, C, D, and other nameless authorities, he would only say this—that a very different account was given in those affidavits in which initials were used, from that which was stated in those where the letters of the alphabet were regularly arranged in names. With respect to the training, when they had the evidence of Mr. Martin or Mr. Johnson, or other tangible persons, it was stated that it took place at half-past five or six o'clock in the morning; but proceed to the spies, look to the evidence of the informers whose names are kept in the back ground, and they would tell them that the training took place under the cloud of night. The former spoke of 200 or 300 men meeting for the purposes of training; but it was beneath the dignity of A, B, and C, to descend to a number less than 2,000 or 3,000, or 700 at the very lowest who were described as exercising in the most perfect military order. The individuals who signed their names to the affidavits declared, that there was shouting, and something like military array. But A, B, and C, gave them the most minute particulars. They stated that they used clapping of hands as a substitute for firing—a circumstance that was very inconsistent with the statement of the noble lord, who said that they were “only” to be armed with pikes. These were the persons whose statements were received in preference to the rational, sagacious, and manly testimony of a long tried and most respectable nobleman of the purest character and the most unsullied honour. He would state a fact which was not to be found in those papers—a fact which, if the gentleman to whom it related had been examined before the House or in a committee must have come out in the very first question put to him. A worthy magistrate who had given evidence, was, it appeared, discharged from prison by taking the benefit of an insolvent act; and after being so discharged, two actions were brought against him for assuming the functions of a magistrate without a proper qualification. The certificate of his release was produced, which he could not have obtained without making over his property to his creditors, and consequently he could not have been in possession of an income of 100*l.* a-year. God forbid that he should insult any man on account of his misfortunes, but when a magistrate went into prison to avoid his creditors, when he there acted as magistrate to discharge others who were in prison for debt, when he himself took the benefit of an insolvent act—when he afterwards resumed his seat on the bench, and being found out, was prosecuted, and had a penalty awarded against him for acting improperly, he could not help thinking, that such a man was not the sort of person whose evidence should be taken as conclusive testimony on so important an occasion.

Now, though he thought some ground for present alarm existed, yet he considered these, amongst other reasons with which he would not trouble the House, as sufficient to show, that the alarm was carried to too great an extent. The question was, did such a degree of danger exist as required any new measure; and if so, was the bill now before the House the proper measure? He denied both these propositions. The noble lord argued, that this was a constitutional measure—that liberty, rightly understood, was not touched by it; that public meetings would not be destroyed, but purified by its operation. Yes, purified in the same way that fire acted, by the destruction of that with which it came in contact. He would show the noble lord this by pointing out to him the only way in which, after the bill had passed, meetings could be called. A county meeting might be convened by the high-sheriff, but the noble lord must allow him to say, from what he had seen during the last few months, that the high-sheriff would not be likely to call a meeting that would displease the ministers of the Crown, by whom he was selected. He would give the noble lords facts. There had been five refusals in the course of two months. Essex, Hampshire, Cornwall, ~~Wiltshire~~, and Berkshire, were anxious to have meetings, but were refused; and how were the applications overruled? Certainly more openly and less decorously than on any former occasion, and the same system would be adopted whenever the same case occurred. Let the House look to Hampshire, where the sheriff refused to convene a meeting [Cries of No, no! from the ministerial benches]. He was misinformed; but he now understood that the requisition was withdrawn. [Cries of Hear! from both sides]. But let the House mark how this made for his argument; let them consider the means used to prevent the success of the application. The means were likely to be so effectual in preventing an acquiescence to the requisition, that the persons who proposed it thought it would be most prudent to give it up. The protest against the meeting was signed by the lord-lieutenant of the county, and by many other individuals connected with government—amongst the rest the noble secretary at war (lord Palmerston) signed it; a cabinet minister added the sanction of his name to it, and to make the argument still stronger, that minister was the duke of Wellington. With all respect for the abilities of that great captain, with all the gratitude he owed him as one of the millions whom he had been the great instrument, in the hand of Providence, of saving from a cruel tyranny, a foreign tyranny, he could not help wishing that he had made the debt still greater by showing himself a friend to the liberties of his country at home, by refusing to sign that protest. He trusted if ever the day should come when, in a struggle for liberty, he might be called on to act, that he would be found to do his duty to the people as well as to the sovereign; and that he would recollect, that on the love of the people, and on the love of the people alone, the safety and security of the throne depended. Let him bear in mind—let him never lose sight of the fact—that a military minister never, in this country, from the time of the duke of Marlborough downwards, could retain his popularity, however great, however just, in opposition to the voice of his countrymen, who loved to be ruled by civil and patriotic characters [Loud cheers]. Such was the nature of Englishmen, and he trusted that such it would continue.

He begged the attention of the House to another part of the bill. It was to that which related to parochial meetings; and this was one among the many grounds which would make him object to going into the committee on the bill. In this part, the noble lord left untouched the evil he proposed to remedy; and by this part would effect what certainly he did not mean. The object was, to regulate meetings in parishes; but it did so happen that there were several small parishes in the agricultural districts, and in old commercial towns, where there could possibly be no danger from the inhabitants coming together—in places where the people were loyal, and not even suspected by the noble lord and his colleagues. To those parishes would this bill most strictly apply, and upon them would it press with the greatest severity; whilst in large and populous manufacturing parishes, where the greatest danger was said to exist, that danger would be absolutely without a remedy, as far as this bill went. In York, the inhabitants of which were not suspected of disloyalty, there were 30 or 31 parishes with a population of only about 9,000 persons for the whole. In Exeter a population of 10,000 persons was divided between 24 parishes.

The Solicitor General here observed, that in such cases the whole body could meet.

Mr. Brougham continued—Then the meeting could not take place without the consent of the mayor. He had thought his hon. and learned friend was better acquainted with his own bill. But his hon. and learned friend had better not have touched upon this part of the question in the course of his speech. But to return to the point to which he was calling the attention of the House. Those small parishes would feel the pressure of this bill, whilst in the larger ones, it could easily be evaded, or would in effect not operate at all so as to guard against danger. The bill supposed that the meetings were only assembled under pretence of discussing matters connected with church or state; but nothing was more easy for them than to say, "We'll have no such discussion at all; we have been tired with long speeches," [Cheers from several parts of the House.] He said that gentlemen might be tired of long speeches: he felt so too; but he could assure them, that in this instance his was the speech of a person who conceived he was performing a serious and important duty. But, if gentlemen did not wish to hear more speaking, they had a remedy in their power. They might act upon their profession, and retire to their homes, and he was certain they (the opposition) would not be much the worse for it. [Hear, and a laugh.] But, to return—the persons assembled might say, that they were tired of long speeches, and of the nonsense contained in them: and give up discussing political questions altogether. They might, if their intentions were so bad as the noble lord supposed them to be—and it was only on the supposition of bad intentions that this bill was necessary—they might, as was done in another country, assemble for the purpose of attending a funeral, or for a literary purpose, and discuss the dead languages, or to discuss a question of grammar; and it might be recollected, that one amongst them had written a grammar, so good indeed as to be in high estimation on several parts of the continent. They might, for any of those purposes, assemble in large numbers; and yet, there was not one clause within the four corners of this bill that could apply to them, or prevent their so assembling. They might go from one parish to another, or assemble for the purpose of going to church, or for a number of other purposes to which the bill did not allude, to the great terror of his majesty's liege subjects; and yet, provided they had not caps of liberty, or banners, or flags, or music, this bill could not prevent them. Now, either there were seditious orators going about the country disseminating their opinions, and large congregations ready to listen to them, or there were not. If there were not, the bill could not be at all necessary; but if it was believed that there were—if, after all the conflicting and contradictory statements that had been given, it was believed that such disturbance existed, as to call for severe measures—if, under any circumstances, the ministers must have a law, he would say to them, "Take one which shall apply a remedy to the evil, and not indiscriminately punish the innocent with the guilty." He gave it as his serious opinion, that it would be much better that all meetings should be put down for a time in certain districts, than that the constitution should be thus permanently violated. He implored the House to reflect before they passed a measure of which they might repent before the end of three months. He would appeal to those hon. gentlemen, if no higher feeling could influence them; he would appeal to those gentlemen who had either been abroad, or mixed with foreigners in this country, and who were on all occasions proud (too proud indeed in the opinion of those foreigners) of the boasted pre-eminence which this country held above all others in the freedom of its institutions—he would entreat them to pause before they allowed it to be said by foreigners, that the English at last had got tired of their liberty, that they had become too manufacturing a country to bear their former freedom. This, indeed, seemed to be the opinion of the member for the university of Oxford, and to him (Mr. B.), it was a new doctrine, that as a nation we had become too manufacturing to be free. Let it not be said in the nineteenth century, after all our boasted exertions, that we had become so manufacturing a country as to have lost our wonted love of freedom. Let not the sarcasm of our great enemy—that we were but a nation of shop-keepers, appear to be realized by allowing it to be said, that in consequence of the extent of our commercial dealings, we had been compelled to part with our liberty. He sincerely trusted that this honest appeal of one who spoke as he felt would not be made in vain, but would have at least the effect of inducing some members to pause and consider before they acted on this important occasion. The hon. and learned member, evidently labouring under a considerable degree of exhaustion, sat down amidst loud and continued cheers.

Lord Palmerston trusted that the House would indulge him in a few observations, after the allusion which the hon. and learned gentleman had made to his conduct on a recent occasion. He had yet to learn, that because a man held an official situation, he was thereby disqualified from giving any opinion upon, or taking any part in, questions of public interest. He had pursued and would pursue, without consulting the hon. and learned gentleman, or caring whether it met his applause or disapprobation, that line of conduct which appeared to himself to be the most proper. He, and those who had acted with him on the occasion alluded to, (in signing the counter requisition in Hampshire), had acted from a well-understood sense of duty, and in doing so, had consulted the best interests of the country; and he was sorry that others had not followed a similar course. Whatever the learned gentleman might think or say of the conduct of an illustrious individual, that opinion would not lessen the debt of gratitude which his country owed him; and he would be bold to say, that the respect of that illustrious individual for the constitution of his country was not less than that of the learned gentleman himself. If one person had a right to call on the sheriff of a county for a meeting, he could see no reason why another had not a right to sign a requisition against it. By the conduct of those who had signed the counter-requisition in Hampshire, that county had been saved from the disgrace of those unwarrantable and unconstitutional attacks that had been made on the Manchester magistrates.

Mr. Wodehouse begged leave to put a question to his hon. colleague respecting the conduct of a noble friend of his that had been alluded to by the learned gentleman. He begged to ask, whether, soon after lord Suffield became lord-lieutenant of the county of Norfolk, it had not been proposed by the noble lord to his hon. colleague, to give in a list of those gentlemen whom he might think fit to be nominated to the commission of the peace; and whether on his nomination, they had not been appointed. [Cheers from the ministerial benches.]

Mr. Coke replied, that certainly, soon after the noble lord's appointment to the lord-lieutenancy, such a proposal had been made; and that accordingly a list was drawn up and presented to the noble lord; but that none of the gentlemen named in the list had been appointed. [Loud cheers from the opposition.] He (Mr. Coke), however applied to the lord chancellor, who, after observing that he did not think Mr. Coke would nominate any person who was not fit for the commission, did appoint them all, with the exception of one hon. friend of his, a member of that House.

Sir W. De Crespigny then rose to address the House, but the noise was so incessant that it was impossible to collect what the hon. baronet said.

Mr. Long Wellesley defended the conduct of the sheriff of Wiltshire.

Mr. Brougham, in explanation, said, he had meant no personal offence to that or any other sheriff.

Mr. Maxwell hoped the House would indulge him with a few minutes, when they considered that he represented that county which might be termed the head-quarters of the Scotch radicals. He had for the last twelve months held communication with the manufacturers of that and the adjacent counties, and he found that there were three classes of people who contributed to the present alarming state of things. The first, and by far the most extensive class, was that of persons almost in a state of starvation; the second, that of persons who maintained conscientiously opinions, in his estimation, erroneous; and the last, was that of persons whom he believed to have no object but that of revolution. Under these circumstances, conciliation, he thought, should have been the first step. He concluded with expressing his determination to vote for the committee, but with an understanding that the bill should be there rendered local and temporary.

The House then divided: Ayes, 351; Noes, 128. Majority for the second reading 223. The bill was then read a second time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MISDEMEANORS BILL.]—The Lord Chancellor left the woolsack, and moved the order of the day for the second reading of the bill, entitled “an act to prevent delay in the administration of justice in cases of misdemeanor.” His lordship then proceeded to describe the enactments of the bill, which, he observed, if found liable to objection, might be subject to discussion and amendment in the committee. The preamble stated, that great delays have occurred in the administration of justice in cases of persons prosecuted by indictment, or information in the court of King’s-bench, at Westminster, or by indictment at the sessions; by reason that the defendants have, according to the present practice, an opportunity of postponing their trials to a distant period, by means of imparlances in the court of King’s-bench, and by time given to plead at the sessions. This preamble explained the ground of the delay which it was proposed to remedy. The object of the first provision in the bill was, to prevent the occurrence of delay in the court of King’s-bench; and it was accordingly proposed to enact, that no person, prosecuted either by information or by indictment found or removed into that court, shall be permitted to imparle to the following term, but shall be required to plead or demur thereto within four days. He had experienced great difficulty in attempting to trace the origin of this practice of imparlance; but it appeared to have been thought that something like the delay granted in civil actions ought to be extended to defendants in the case of misdemeanor. His lordship was, however, of opinion, that there was no sufficient analogy in the cases. The delay granted in civil actions was founded on the ground, that the defendant ought to be afforded an opportunity of talking with his adversary, and settling the matter in dispute; and also that he might have time to ascertain what his defence ought to be. In a case of this kind, he had thought it right not to rely on his own opinion, but had sought information from persons of experience in his profession, who had agreed in the inconvenience of the present practice. As the case at present stood, a defendant had a right to three rules, and if the information should not be filed nine days before the close of the term he could not be called upon to plead in that term; for the term would be expired before it was in the power of the court to require him to plead. In this state of things, the matter must necessarily go over to the next term. This unnecessary delay would be obviated by requiring the defendant to plead or demur within a certain number of days. It would be for their lordships to judge whether the number of days inserted in the clause were sufficient. It was not wished to call upon the defendant to plead instantly, but to oblige him to plead without any unreasonable delay. The remainder of the clause had reference to persons who might appear by their clerk in court, and it was followed with a provision, making it lawful for the court or any judge, on sufficient cause being shown, to allow further time for defendants to plead or demur to an indictment or information. The next clause related to prosecutions by indictment at sessions of the peace. It provided that persons in custody are held to bail within            days before the sessions shall plead to the indictment, unless a writ of certiorari be delivered before the jury be sworn. Whether this clause was or was not calculated to answer the object in view, would be proper matter for discussion when in the committee, if their lordships permitted the bill to be read a second time, and to proceed to that stage.—His lordship then went over the other clauses of the bill. With regard to furnishing copies of indictments to defendants which had been alluded to on a former night, that would be matter for the consideration of the committee. If any noble lord should bring forward a proposition on the subject, their lordships would consider how far such an arrangement was advisable. It would necessarily be attended with some expense. Having said thus much, he would again assure their lordships, that the measure which he had the honour to propose to their consideration was not one suggested by any circumstances connected with the present situation of the country. He had had it for some time in contemplation; for he was perfectly satisfied that the delays which took place in prosecutions for misdemeanor were a great evil. It might be thought necessary to make exceptions, and the propriety of introducing any into the bill would be a fit subject for discussion in the committee. In introducing this bill, he believed that he was correcting an erroneous practice which had grown up contrary to the ancient law. His lordship here cited the case of the Seven Bishops, who wished to imparle, in order to postpone their trial to a subsequent term. The subject was on that occasion much discussed, but it was decided by the judges, on reference to the practice of the court, that defendants were not intitled to imparlance, but must plead immediately. His lordship next referred to Nair's case. in 1752, and said, that a similar decision was then given. He concluded by moving that the bill be now read a second time.

Earl Grosvenor said, he would not occupy much of their lordships' time, as he did not mean to enter into the details of this bill. His view of the necessity of this and the other measures of severity was much altered since their lordships had come to the conclusion they had done the other night. He might still take the liberty of objecting to parts; but with respect to the question of adopting some such measures generally, their lordships had placed him in a very different situation from that in which he previously stood, and his opinion must be governed by his view of the state of the country under the circumstances of their lordships' decision. It appeared that they were determined to resort to no measures of conciliation, but to throw away the scabbard and depend upon the sword alone. It therefore followed, that their lordships must adopt this and other measures of severity, if they meant to preserve the peace of the country. The noble and learned lord had introduced this bill as a permanent measure, and not as one merely applicable to the present circumstances. Under these circumstances, he would have been happy to have seen provisions introduced in it to prevent delays on the part of the crown. A noble friend of his had on a former occasion portrayed in strong colours to their lordships, the evils arising from delay in prosecuting on ex officio informations. Now, when such powers were left to the attorney-general, when that officer was permitted to hold informations over the heads of defendants for any indefinite period, it was adding greatly to that grievance to abolish the right of imparlance. By this proceeding the security of the subject was greatly diminished, while the power of the crown was increased. As he had observed, however, the view of the whole which he must take, under the altered situation produced by their lordships' previous discussion, took from him the opportunity of contesting the necessity of the severe measures now in progress.

Lord Erskine rose, and opposed the motion. His noble and learned friend, he said, had intimated his inability to trace the origin of the right of imparlance. For his own part, he could look for it no where else than in the ancient law of the country, and this proposition of his noble and learned friend he regarded as a complete alteration of the law. Had any disadvantage arisen from the practice, it would surely have been felt in the lapse of time, and have been rescinded before now. In the time of chief justice Hale the question had been agitated, and there was then no diversity of opinion. That learned judge held that the traverser of an indictment was entitled to the postponement of his trial to the next term. But to show that this right had been recognised by the legislature at a very recent period, his lordship referred to an act of parliament passed some years ago, in which persons indicted for misdemeanor were allowed to traverse to the following sessions. This act was passed in their own time; and, though difference of opinion might arise in the course of years, he had expected that his noble and learned friend would have explained more fully the nature of the new lights which had operated on his mind on this subject. What had occurred in the course of fourteen years to render this change in the practice of the law necessary? When he read in the preamble of the bill, that "great delays had occurred in the administration of justice," he must say, that these delays were given to afford time for the defence. The defendant was justly entitled to them—entitled to them by law. The noble and learned lord stated, that he had consulted persons in the profession of the law acquainted with the practice. He wished his noble friend had stated what was said by the different persons he consulted. His noble and learned friend had stated, that exceptions might be made to the operation of the bill; but whatever exceptions his noble and learned friend might be willing to admit, were so many objections to the principle of the measure. This bill, their lordships were informed, had not originated in the circumstances which had given rise to the other measures before the House; but he must confess, that when he saw the table covered with other bills tending to abridge the rights of the people, he thought it a very singular coincidence, that this one should be brought forward at the same time. He conceived the origin of the delays granted in cases of misdemeanor to be the wish to preserve an analogy with the law of treason, which had rendered the law of this country celebrated through the whole civilized world. The protection of human life which that statute afforded was the glory of England. In cases of misdemeanor, as well as of treason, how hard would it be to send an individual to trial unprepared, amidst the effervescence of opinion? The delay made the charge undergo a salutary quarantine. Their lordships might recollect the case of a man who some years ago had attempted the life of the sovereign. An application was made to the court, to appoint counsel for this man, and he (lord Erskine), then at the bar, was applied to. He asked lord Kenyon if he ought to accept the charge, and that learned judge gave his opinion in the affirmative. When they were proposing to take from defendants advantages which they possessed, their lordships would do well to consider the indulgence which the law allowed in this and other cases of treason. The defendant was allowed a list of the names of the jurors, with their description, and the places of residence. There was given to him a similar list of the witnesses, that he might know who were to appear against him. Finally, he was allowed his right of challenge. All these rights were enjoyed in the case to which he alluded. The defence of the man was insanity, but his trial and the extraordinary circumstance which gave rise to it, attracted the eyes of all Europe, and gave still more celebrity to the wisdom and humanity of British law. This feature of humanity to the accused was, however, now about to be defaced; but, upon what ground? Had not former times experienced as great agitations as were felt at present? Had not the influence of the passions been as strong, the extent of discontents as great, formerly as now? It was not proposed to diminish the power of the attorney-general. Let, then, the accused retain the few advantages still left in his possession. The delays were allowed by the ancient law of the land, and were consistent with fairness and justice. But it was said the court had the power of allowing further time to plead, on sufficient cause being shown. From what he knew of the practice of the courts, he could look to little advantage to the defendant from this clause. When the delay to which the defendant was entitled by law was exhausted, it was not probable that the court would grant a further postponement, unless some strong case could be made out, such as the absence of an important witness; and this was what the court could now do without this bill. His great objection to the measure was, that while it wrested from the subject an important and valuable privilege, it left the attorney-general in full possession of all those grinding powers which were the subject of general complaint, and which ought long since to have been taken from him. Their lordships, in looking at the diseases of the country, differed in opinion as to the remedy, in the same manner as persons differed in treating a sick man. Some would blister and bleed him; others wished to apply only emollients and medicines of the mildest operation. Both parties were equally the friends of the patient, but his safety depended on the choice which might be made. In his opinion, in the present situation of the country, the mild treatment was the best. As the law now stood, if the attorney-general did not choose to bring on a trial, the defendant had no means of compelling him; but in all cases where the king was not prosecutor, this indefinite delay could not take place. Was not this difference a fit subject for the consideration of their lordships, when they were passing such a bill as the present? It was said, that to alter the law with respect to the power of the attorney-general, would be innovation. But then, why begin innovation? And why, when it is begun, let it be all on one side? If you wish to make changes, let them be equal to both parties. Looking at this bill, coupled with the others on their lordships' table, he felt himself bound to give it his decided resistance.

The Earl of Liverpool, in rising to support the motion of his noble and learned friend, did not mean to go into those technical considerations which, on such a subject, must be necessarily referred to. He agreed in some respects with the noble and learned lord who had last addressed the house. Although not competent to enter upon a discussion of the legal part of this question, he felt disposed to make some general observations on its main principle, and the effect which it was intended to produce. That principle seemed to him clear and intelligible. He was convinced that, if their lordships did not pass this measure, they had better at once declare that every kind of blasphemy and sedition was to be tolerated in future. It might be fairly concluded, that to justify any innovation upon the ancient law of this country, some strong case of necessity ought to be made out. He was also willing to admit that, supposing the law to be erroneous in theory, yet if no practical inconvenience ensued from it, it might be unwise to alter it upon speculative views alone. But, if he was not grievously mistaken, the ancient law was favourable to the principle of this measure. It seemed to him, that no analogy could be discovered in a state of law, which permitted little or no delay, in cases of treason, murder, or felony, but allowed it in misdemeanors and bailable offences. Persons charged with the higher crimes were in most instances put immediately on their trial, whilst, in those of a lesser description, a delay might be claimed, extending sometimes to the period of a year. Such delay, if granted at all, appeared to him likely to prove less injurious in cases of superior atrocity, because in them the person of the offender was secured. But, in cases of libel, the offence might be repeated (as their lordships must well know had been frequently done) day after day, and hour after hour, before the party accused could be brought to trial. All this mischief would be prevented by a more seasonable prosecution. An instant trial might afford an adequate correction to the evil. By the present measure it was also provided, that whenever any special reason could be assigned, the courts of law should have authority to interfere, and to allow the party further time. He agreed that they ought not now to consider themselves as legislating de novo. He should be the last man to propose or recommend any additional restrictions on the liberty of the press; for he regarded it as one of the best securities of public freedom. But that it stood in need of some regulation, would, he thought, be denied by no man who had attended to that mass of licentiousness, of wickedness, indecency, and profaneness, by which it had recently been contaminated. When doctrines contrary to every principle of religion and morals were openly promulgated, the law

ought to be made effectual for its own purposes. Could the imperious necessity of applying some remedy be controverted? Could the progress of this formidable evil be arrested without some proceeding of this nature? The House had been engaged in a great deal of discussion with respect to public meetings, and the dangers arising from them: he believed, however, that no remedy, even in relation to those dangers, would be so effectual as the present measure. Still he was ready to admit, that the choice of a remedy might be a matter of difficult consideration; but the existence of the evil, and the importance of some remedy, was obvious and indisputable. It was that about which all men could at once see and judge equally well. He asked for the support of no man to this proceeding, who did not acknowledge the present evil. If that were acknowledged, could it be maintained that it was fitting that the law should continue unaltered? It was with reference to that evil, that his noble and learned friend had introduced this bill. The question was, whether they ought, in the case of those offences to which he had alluded, to extend to parties accused the favour of traversing or imparling for entire months. He agreed that the measure was an innovation, and that the House was bound to require evidence of a strong necessity. Was there not, then, sufficient evidence of this description in the actual circumstances of the country, and in all those practices which notoriously prevailed? His majesty's government had been asked why more prosecutions had not been instituted. He could only say, that the answer to that question was of itself a strong argument in defence of this proceeding. No effort had been left untried during the last twelve months to bring persons charged with blasphemous and seditious libels to justice. It had, notwithstanding, been found impossible in the present state of the law to obtain more than one conviction. If, then, there did exist a lamentably great and pressing evil, he trusted the House would not be indisposed to adopt some measure of this kind. The noble and learned lord who preceded him, had objected to it on the ground that it took away an advantage from the subject, whilst it left untouched the power of the attorney-general to file ex officio informations. But he (lord Liverpool) was desirous that this latter question should be tried on the same principle. Did any positive inconvenience arise from the exercise of this power? The attorney-general was invested with this discretion—a greater discretion, he admitted, than belonged to any other individual; but it was exercised under a responsibility to both Houses of Parliament. If any strong case of abuse in the administration of this power could be brought forward, he, for one, should be willing to consider the propriety of withdrawing it; but he could see no reason for going into such a discussion, when, for the last thirty years, through the whole duration of his political life, from the time at least when his noble and learned friend on the woolsack was appointed to the office of attorney-general down to the present, the only blame or public complaint had been, that the prosecutions were not more numerous. With this experience then, that there was no ground of accusation or suspicion that this power had been improperly directed against the subject, he could not but feel adverse to the introduction of any provision respecting it into the measure under consideration. There was no charge of abuse, but the error, if there had been an error, was entirely on the contrary side. He could not assent, therefore, at this moment, to any proposition for altering the law in that respect, and trusted that he had shown sufficient cause for the measure immediately before them.

Lord Holland declared that he felt some very decided objections to this proceeding. He did not consider himself competent, any more than the noble earl, to look at it in a technical point of view, but should endeavour to state the general nature of his reasons for opposing it. The noble earl had argued this question in a way not very respectful to his noble and learned friend. A great part of his speech was filled with reflexions on that ancient law by which the subjects of this country had hitherto been governed. The noble and learned lord on the woolsack had not uttered a single word on the necessity or intended operation of this measure. He had, therefore, as it appeared to him, received a severe rebuke from the noble earl who had last addressed the House. The wisdom of our ancestors, about which they had often heard so much rant, was at length represented as inadequate. Our boasted constitution was now, at least in some of its parts, described as absurd in theory, and ineffectual in practice. Some of its most important regulations were to be renounced. It had, however, been truly stated by his noble and learned friend, that these laws had been fully revised and re-considered, at the time of our glorious Revolution. They had then been approved by some of the wisest and most excellent men that ever sat in parliament. Among them was lord Somers, who, taking for his guide the opinions of sir Matthew Hale, went still farther, and condemned proceedings by information. He thought proceedings by indictment a safer and more constitutional course. The noble earl had rebuked his noble friend, and traduced the constitution; but he had not shown that blasphemy and sedition might not be punished by the law as it now existed. It had been urged, that the offence of the libel had frequently been repeated before trial, but every one of these additional acts of publication might be already prosecuted. Such acts were, moreover, always referred to in aggravation of punishment. Another difference between the noble earl and the noble and learned lord on the woolsack seemed to arise from a fact mentioned by the latter, and which was that this measure had been long in his contemplation. The noble earl on the other hand had treated it as a part of the present budget—as called forth by an immediate necessity, and not as a subject of calm dispassionate judgment. If the House, therefore, could have the benefit of another speech from the noble and learned lord, he had no doubt that the statement of the noble earl would be repelled. Could it be gravely maintained that we had hitherto lived under a state of law that was not adequate to the punishment of vice? They had been told that the attorney-general was a responsible officer; so he apprehended were all persons in public situations. The noble earl had said, that if any system of abuse could be shown to exist in the exercise of that officer's discretion, he would willingly go into a consideration of his powers, but that no such abuse had even been alleged. Upon this point, however, he must beg to refer them to a bill which he had wished to introduce some few years ago, and the object of which would have been to take away all ex-officio informations. It was not satisfactory to him to be reminded, that the attorney-general was liable to an impeachment. He had stated upon the occasion before alluded to, what he could have proved, that there had been an increase of twenty to one criminal informations in proportion to the other modes of proceeding. He could also have established something further, namely; that out of twenty filed, only one or two had been prosecuted. The House had frequently heard of the dangers to be apprehended in touching the sacred ark of the constitution. It was a common argument, that it was better to resist inquiry than to innovate upon any ancient law. Here, however, it was proposed to repeal a branch of the law favourable to the subject, and which appeared to him to have been enacted in the same spirit as many other of our free institutions, and which, in his conscience, he believed had often saved this country from being deluged with blood. It appeared to him to involve the same principles as the law of treason, and to have been passed on account of that inequality which was supposed would always exist where the subject was prosecuted by the Crown.—The noble and learned lord had confined his observations to a technical view of this question, and he must confess he had heard with astonishment, that, framed as the measure was, it had long been under his consideration. The very title appeared to him to be loose and inapplicable. The noble and learned lord's legal knowledge had not often been equalled, and certainly, never surpassed; yet he had utterly failed in making the House understand what the extent and nature of the delay was for which this proceeding was to afford a remedy. How were misdemeanors of this kind usually prosecuted? He believed in the court of King's-Bench, by information or by indictment at sessions of Oyer and Terminer. There were two species of information; the one filed by the attorney-general upon his own mere authority; and the other granted by the court of King's-Bench, upon cause shown. By which of these modes of proceeding was the greatest delay incurred? Upon criminal information filed, there was a right of imparlance granted to the ensuing term. This was granted as an indulgence upon application, and was matter of usage on the first process. This was not the case, he apprehended, upon an indictment; for although the party might there traverse;

it was only by mutual consent and arrangement. Now, he should have liked to have heard from the noble and learned lord, in what cases these delays occurred most frequently. He had looked into the bill in vain for the opinion of the noble and learned lord on that point; and, indeed, he must say, notwithstanding the great legal knowledge of the noble and learned lord, that a more clumsy, a more disjointed, or a more unintelligible bill, never was drawn up. What would the late earl Stanhope have said of it? Nothing, certainly, would have given him (lord Holland) greater delight than to have heard the eloquence of that noble earl on such a bill as this. Assuming a falsehood for its foundation, it went on to assert that which was not the case, even supposing the first assumption true. After having had the advantage of being assisted in framing it by all the learned gentlemen in the employment of the Crown, the noble and learned lord had said on the second reading, that the preamble must be altered. If the noble and learned lord, with all the legal assistance of which he had had the benefit, had been unable to make the bill intelligible, how were its provisions to be understood by those whom it was to affect? This reminded him of an anecdote which he had read of a great man, who had been a member of that House. He alluded to the earl of Shaftesbury, the author of the "Characteristics," and who was one of the purest and ablest writers that this country ever produced. He seldom mixed in the affairs of the world; but when the bill for allowing counsel to persons accused of high-treason was introduced, he came forward in the House of Commons (for he was then lord Ashley), and for the first time in his life attempted to address the House in support of the measure. Eloquent however, as his writings were he was so overpowered by the emotions which the numerous assembly around him excited that he lost the train of his argument, and was unable to proceed. "Sir," said he, "if I who rise only to give my opinion on the bill now depending, am so confounded that I am unable to express the least of what I proposed to say, what must the condition of that man be, who, without any assistance, is pleading for his life, and under apprehensions of being deprived of it?" The noble and learned lord, in one of his speeches on this momentous occasion, after stating all the evils that arose from the present practice, had expressed his regret that the assizes were not more frequent. There the noble and learned lord argued well; as he always did when he was willing to do so; and he (lord Holland) was of the same opinion on that subject. But it was surely lamentable, that after two years preparation, they should have crammed down their throats a morsel like this, which, with the assistance of so many eminent lawyers, the noble and learned lord could not render palatable.—The noble lord then proceeded to quote several parts of the preamble, and contended, that it was shown in the bill that the delays complained of arose from defendants being allowed time to plead after indictment.—After what he had shown of the nature of this bill, it was manifest that its title was grossly deceiving, it professed to be a bill to prevent delays in prosecutions for misdemeanors, but it did not say one word of the greatest delays—those which occurred in proceedings by ex-officio informations. By the wise provision of those great men who lived at the time of the Revolution in 1688, and to whose authority their lordships often referred, improper delay could not occur by allowing the accused time to plead, because, in prosecutions by indictment, the defendants were obliged to enter into recognizances, which they must forfeit, if they did not appear to plead. But in proceedings by ex-officio informations, the attorney-general had the power of punishing a person accused, though not convicted of a libel, by keeping a prosecution hanging over his head for life. He did not say that this had been done by the present attorney-general, or his predecessors; but this he would say, that there were at present forty informations depending, some of which had been hanging over the parties accused for one, two, three, four, five, and some for ten years. And this must surely be admitted to be a shocking state of the law. He would not at present enter into the views which he entertained respecting the danger said to exist in the country—a subject on which he differed, perhaps, from many noble lords who had stated their opinions to the House. Whatever might be the extent of the danger, he thought it was owing, in a great measure, to the distrust of the people in parliament. If their lordships' went on to increase that distrust by passing measures such as the present, they would, by shaking their confidence in parliament (which he thought the greatest safety of the constitution), inevitably increase the evil. He could not hope that his opposition would prevent the bill from passing, even in its present state; but if it were so altered as to legislate on both sides, by preventing the delays which occurred in prosecutions by ex-officio informations, as well as in those by indictment, he should perhaps give it his feeble support on the third reading.

Lord Lilford began by making some remarks respecting the apprehensions which lord Holland seemed to entertain of giving too great an influence to the Crown, and those which the earl of Liverpool held with respect to the absolute predominance of the people. For his own part, he was equally jealous of the absolute authority of both:

“Justum et tenacem propositi virum
Non civium ardor prava jubentium, Non vultus instantis tyranni, Mente quatit solida.”

The noble and learned lord, when he first proposed this bill to the House, had told them that it was not suggested by the exigencies of the present time; and he was much pleased to hear that declaration. There was no doubt that the subjects of the realm had reason to complain of legislative enactments, made to meet temporary exigencies. When he looked over the Statute book, he found the laws enacted for temporary purposes extremely numerous. In his view of the case, experience showed not only what was true, but also what was expedient. It was or it was not true, that by the present practice a long interval elapsed between indictment and trial, during which many innocent persons were compelled to stand in the situation of criminals; whilst others, who were not indeed criminals but certainly culprits, stood in the situation of innocent persons. It had been said, that the reason of the noble and learned lord for introducing the bill was, to expedite trials for seditious and blasphemous libels. Now, the only question was, whether this was a sufficient reason for disturbing the law of the country; and as he believed that the delay which the law at present permitted retarded the course of justice, on that view he should support the bill.

The bill was then read a second time.

SEIZURE OF ARMS BILL.] On the motion of lord Sidmouth, the House resolved itself into a Committee on this bill.

The Earl of Darnley moved, that the clause authorizing officers to enter houses in the night-time to search for arms be omitted. He would ask the noble lord whether a person opposing an officer in the administration of his duty, would be guilty of murder if he should occasion his death? He conceived that all the purposes of the bill would be equally answered by confining the power of searching to the day-time.

The Earl of Blessington wished to put a question to the noble lord, before he proceeded to make any comments on the information which he had received. This bill, he understood, was intended to affect Ireland as well as this country. Now, they had been told, that all was quiet in Ireland, and therefore the extension of the bill to the people of that country could only tend to irritate them. The bill, in his opinion, had been rendered necessary, not by those persons whom he would call subjects, but by the conduct of those who were intrusted with the government of the country. He therefore begged to be informed by the noble lord, whether it was in contemplation to extend the provisions of the bill to Ireland. He might remark before he sat down, that formerly when a similar law was enforced in that country, the arms which had been taken away from the people were never restored? He trusted that would not be the case in the present instance.

Lord Sidmouth answered, that the bill applied only to certain counties in England which were expressly named. It certainly gave a power to the magistrates in any part of the united kingdom to extend its provisions, if necessary; but at present it was confined to certain counties in this country, and the noble lord would surely not say, that if it was necessary to apply it to other parts of the kingdom, the executive government should not have the power of so applying it. With regard to the amendment proposed, the noble lord had said, that by searching in the night-time great inconvenience might arise to individuals against whom information had been given of having arms in their possession. There was no doubt of this; but the safety of the state was paramount to any considerations of individual convenience. Was it to be permitted, that persons who were said to have arms in their possession, were to be allowed time from sun-rise to sun-set to conceal them? But the noble lord had asked, if a person opposed force, and killed the officer, whether he would be liable to an indictment for murder? The only answer he could give to this question was, that a man might be accused of murder, whether it was committed in the day-time or the night-time. This bill, it should be observed, had a provision, which was not in the act of the 52nd of Geo. 3rd, namely, that a search could only take place on information given on oath; and that being the case, he would ask, if they ought to sacrifice the whole bill by removing the provision to which the noble lord objected?

The Duke of Sussex perfectly coincided in opinion with the earl of Darnley on this subject. He did conceive that a great deal depended on the manner in which this law was to be put in execution. When they could carry the law into effect, without offending the private feelings of individuals, or making an attack on public feeling, that course should be adopted. The noble lord had said, that if this provision were omitted, it would not, in some cases, be in the power of the officers to act on the information they had received for ten or twelve hours afterwards. But if they had the power of getting that information secretly, they might surely conceal the circumstance from the party informed against for a short time; and thus, by delaying the search till a seasonable hour, they might avoid giving that offence which the present provision must inevitably give. It was surely most offensive for a man to be disturbed in the first hours of his slumber; and, though he was anxious to avoid saying any thing that could inflame the public feeling, he must declare, that were he disturbed in such a manner, he should certainly be ready to inquire if such a proceeding was legal.

The Earl of Blessington, in explanation, said, he should not state his authority for believing that it was in contemplation to extend this bill to Ireland, although he had good authority for entertaining such belief. In consequence, however, of the noble lord's answer, he should not insist on offering any remarks on the subject; he thought the alarm in this country was in a great measure unfounded, and he must protest against any intention the noble lord might have of making the people of Ireland suffer for it.

The Earl of Rosslyn asked, whether the clause which made the possession of arms of a particular description prima facie evidence that they were intended to be used against the state, was so guarded as not to apply to common arms, such as guns, pistols, &c.; and whether, as no oath was required to justify the seizure of the one, the necessity of an oath might not be evaded with respect to the other.

Lord Sidmouth said, that the clause expressly mentioned pike-heads or spears, as the description of weapon that should be considered prima facie evidence of the evil intention, and seized without information upon oath. The common weapons which might be kept merely for purposes of defence, were regarded in that view, and an oath of the supposed purpose for which they were intended was required, before they could be seized.

The Earl of Rosslyn thought it hard, that the man who had in his possession pike-heads or spears without any design against the government, should have no protection against the breaking open of his house in the night.

Lord Erskine did not think that the noble lord was in earnest in bringing the bill before the House. The preamble of it proclaimed the existence of a widely spreading and dangerous conspiracy, in the truth of which he could not coincide. Application, according to the bill, was to be made to a magistrate for a warrant, when the applicant might state, that he believed that arms for an improper purpose were in the possession of another, without however stating any facts. The magistrate would not be at liberty to refuse. Thus some poor man, who with his family might have retired to rest after his labour (if indeed any man could venture to go to bed at all after the passing of this act), might become the much-injured victim of malevolence and oppression. The onus probandi was thrown on the poor man, who would be forced to answer a rule to show cause why the door of his dwelling should not be broken open in the middle of the night, and his family almost tortured, in order to gratify the malignity or the cruelty of any other person. But he might apply for the restitution of the weapons which should be seized from him: and he, like the ghost of Hamlet in armour, might ask at the quarter sessions for his property, and there be compelled to pay heavy expenses. The bill was of a nature which no one could assent to who thought of its consequences. All these things tended to increase the distrust and irritation in manufacturing districts; and if people were disposed to emigrate, he saw no choice between London and Constantinople, unless the preference were in favour of the latter. In London we once had the best laws, which were gradually changed for the worst, and in Constantinople the worst laws, in which no alteration could be made but for the better.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that the measure to which the attention of their lordships was then called, was not worse than one which had been enacted four years ago. That there were disturbances, could not but be evident to each of their lordships who had read the papers on the table. The noble lord denied the existence of a conspiracy; and yet who could doubt, after what had occurred at Burnley, where all the persons who composed that multitude, as it was admitted, were armed either with pikes, or with other weapons. For what object were the pikes and those other weapons, constructed and collected, if not for a traitorous purpose? There was a distinction, which could not but be evident from the bill, relative to the mode in which its operation was to take effect. Persons having weapons of the first description, were to be considered as if prima facie testimony had been offered against them, and they were to become liable to the penalties of the bill; but when it could be proved that the other weapons were detained for no improper purpose, the possessors of them were not to be liable to any penalties. In the former case, the possession of the weapons specified was to be regarded as having rendered the possessors subject to the consequences of the bill; in the latter, an oath was to be required before even suspicion could lay hold of the weapons, or leave their owners subject to any disagreeable result.

Lord Holland inquired if, in the first clause, there were any objection to insert "two magistrates" instead of "a magistrate?" He did not wish to press this amendment, but at all events the word "cannon" had been omitted among the weapons, as it had been stated, that a good many had been about lately.

Lord Sidmouth said that the word "gun" was to be found in the bill.

Lord Holland objected strongly to its insertion; admitting that, if an evil prevailed, it did not follow that this bill was a proper remedy; it might put an end even to some of the sports of the field; and though people in the country loved the constitution very well, they often loved the favour of an administration quite as dearly, and might give informations to answer any but useful purposes.

The question was put on the amendment, and it was negatived. Lord Darnley persevered in his amendment for omitting the words, "or by night," but the question being put, it was rejected. The House was then resumed.

TRAINING PREVENTION BILL.] Their lordships went into a committee on this bill.

Lord Holland objected both to the permanency and generality of the measure; at least, he said it would be fit to exempt from its operation school-masters who might employ serjeants to drill boys under their tuition.

The Earl of Liverpool replied, that he could not see how it was possible to frame the bill otherwise than as it now stood, if it was to be made effectual for its purposes. The bill prohibited all drilling, but it authorized lords-lieutenant to grant licences for drilling. This power he had no objection to have extended to other magistrates. It was not, therefore, to be apprehended that any of the inconveniences alluded to by the noble lord could arise from the bill as now constructed.

The bill was then read, clause by clause, in the committee, and the report was ordered to be received on Monday next. Their lordships were about to retire, when

The Earl of Strathmore requested the attention of their lordships for a few moments. He was anxious that the bills which were now passing should be carried into execution with all possible speed, and with the desired effect. He understood that the statement he had last night made of the numbers who associated in a part of the country with which he was connected, had just been called in question, and denied in another place. He could assure their lordships that that part of the country was much disturbed. What he had said last night of the numbers of the disaffected was rather below than above the mark. In confirmation of this statement he would refer to a noble duke, the lord-lieutenant of the neighbouring county to that in which he lived, whom he saw in the House. The laws which their lordships were enacting were not, in his apprehension, stronger than the necessity of the case required: he even doubted whether they would be sufficient for meeting the evils which they were intended to repress. Not a moment should be lost in putting them into execution, and most happy should he be to find that they affected their purpose without having recourse to more vigorous measures. There was not a man in the House more unwilling than he was to restrict or to suspend the constitutional rights of the people without the necessity.

The Duke of Northumberland said, he had had no intention of obtruding himself upon the attention of their lordships; but having been so pointedly called upon, he could assure their lordships that the statement of the noble earl was not only strictly correct, but rather short of the real fact. By a return which had been made to him, upon the accuracy of which he could rely, the number associated in the several collieries amounted to 16,600 persons. He understood that all these had arms. He had since understood, and they had themselves said, that in the district between the Tyne and the Weir, and extending to Carlisle, there were 100,000 men with arms, ready to rise and unite together.

Lord Redesdale said, he had that morning received a letter from Newcastle, which enabled him most fully to corroborate, as from the latest accounts, the statements which had been made by both the noble duke and earl.

The Earl of Strathmore said, he had just received intelligence that two of the most worthy magistrates in the county had been compelled to abandon their homes, through apprehension of the danger which threatened them. They were now actually residing with their families in the town of Newcastle. For his own part, he felt what was due to himself and the repose of that part of the country, and the moment he had heard of this transaction he had given orders to have his dedimus made out; and he could assure the House he would be found on his post in the hour of danger.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

IRELAND — ARTICLES OF UNION.]

Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald said, he wished to put to his right hon. friend a question of considerable importance to Ireland, respecting the repeal or continuance of certain duties, which, by the act of union, were to be collected for twenty years after the passing of that act. They were duties imposed on articles imported into Ireland, being of British produce or manufacture. In the present situation of Ireland, with respect to manufactures, it was of great moment to those interested, that they should be acquainted with what his majesty's government intended to do, with reference to this subject, in the present session of parliament: for in this session it must be decided, whether those duties should or should not be continued. His right hon. friend had, in courtesy to him, stated the course that was intended to be taken; but it was extremely important, that by a statement made in his place, the public in Ireland should also be apprized of his right hon. friend's intention.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite aware of the great importance of the question put by his right hon. friend. The subject was one of the utmost interest, and he was bound to say, had engaged the previous attention of the Treasury. Sufficient time had not elapsed to enable them to come to a final decision. But he must state to his right hon. friend, that a farther continuance of the duties, beyond the period to which they were now restricted, appeared to him to be unavoidable. But, whether that term would be longer or shorter, and whether it would be advisable that the measure should be one of temporary or permanent policy, it was not in his power to say.

Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald did not mean to express any opinion on the subject; but he was anxious that those persons who were interested should bring their case before parliament, when he hoped a just and liberal view would be taken of it. He now begged to put another question to his right hon. friend. When parliament separated at the close of the last session, it was in the recollection of the House, that a bill was about to be submitted to its consideration, for regulating the distilleries of Ireland. In consequence of that measure, which had reference to illicit distilleries, having been abandoned, considerable uncertainty prevailed with respect to the existing law, which affected very sensibly the agriculture, manufactures, and revenue of Ireland. Those who had large distilleries did not like to proceed, as they were ignorant of the measures that might be adopted. Those also who had no concern in distilleries, but who were interested in preserving the peace and morals of the country, by preventing illicit distillation, were anxious to ascertain the exact state of the law as early as possible. Any information on this subject would be most important indeed to the interests involved.

Lord Milton said, the subject of the duties imposed on goods imported into Ireland was one of the utmost importance to the manufactures of both countries, and he hoped that, when regulations were adopted, they would be rendered plain and intelligible. As the duties at present stood, the schedule was not sufficiently clear. Some circumstances, he understood, had in consequence taken place in the Custom-house in Ireland, the proceedings connected with which were considered vexatious on this side of the water.

Sir H. Parnell wished clearly to understand on what ground a continuance of those duties was to be supported. He begged leave to ask, whether the article of the union by which those duties were imposed had been carefully examined, with a view of fully deciding whether or not the duties could be continued beyond the period of twenty years, without an infringement of that article? At the time the union was under consideration, the question of the duties was argued and discussed; and it was supposed, that when the act of union expired, the duties must expire with it, unless the article by which they were regulated was infringed. He wished to know what the opinion of the crown lawyers was—whether or not those duties could be continued, without violating the compact entered into between the two countries?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it would be more regular if but one question were asked at a time. As to what the noble lord had said with respect to the regulations between Great Britain and Ireland, he admitted that the subject was one which ought to be fully inquired into; but any change in the system must evidently be a matter of ulterior consideration. With respect to the legal doubt that had been suggested by the hon. baronet, whether the continuance of those duties would or would not be an infringement of the act of union, he must observe that he had never heard such a doubt started before. He had always considered, that on the expiration of the twenty years, every subject connected with the country was open to parliamentary regulation. The only meaning which he affixed to the act of union was, that for twenty years a positive agreement was made not to interfere with or alter certain regulations. With respect to the second question put by his right hon. friend on the subject of distillation, he was not prepared to declare what might be done when that subject came under discussion. It certainly involved a question of great importance to the revenue and agriculture of Ireland; but he was not aware that he could at present give his right hon. friend any answer, except by referring him to the measures that were in progress last session. Every means, however, would be taken to obtain information, with a view to the correction of the evil that had been pointed out.

Sir H. Parnell observed, that as the period to which the provisions in the articles of the union extended was on the point of expiring, he trusted that such arrangements would thenceforward be made as might conduce to the convenience of the members for Ireland; that a considerable part of the Irish business would be transacted at home, so that that House might not be troubled with the proceedings of Irish vestries, and that that useless piece of pageantry, the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, might be got rid of.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a committee of the whole House on the Seditious Meetings Prevention Bill. His lordship said, this proceeding was merely pro forma. He would in the committee move, that the blanks be filled up; and on Monday he would state to the House, before going into the debate, what alterations were intended to be made in the bill.

Mr. Tierney said, perhaps the noble lord would now state what alterations were contemplated; particularly, whether it was intended that the bill should be temporary or permanent.

Lord Castlereagh said, if he gave an explanation on one point, he must follow it up by explaining several others. He therefore declined giving any explanation now. It would only give rise to a debate, for no useful purpose that he could perceive. The best course was, to render the bill intelligible, by filling up the blanks now, and on Monday he would give all farther information.

Mr. Tierney said, he was only anxious to know, whether the noble lord had altered his opinion with respect to the passing a permanent measure. He could not see how an answer to such a question could provoke a debate. The noble lord's wrath against the people, which he had so strongly displayed within the last twenty-four hours, afforded but slight grounds for supposing that he had changed his opinion.

Lord Castlereagh.—I feel no wrath against the people. I am only doing my duty.

Mr. M. A. Taylor said, he conceived yesterday, that after the debate was over, the noble lord meant to state a general outline of the alterations he intended to make; but now he found the explanation would not be given until Monday. He wished, most undoubtedly, for the convenience of himself and other gentlemen, to know the extent to which the noble lord meant to press the measure. As he would not give him that information, and as he had no means of compelling him, he would take another opportunity, when the House was apprized of the noble lord's intention, to state the light in which he viewed the measure.

Mr. Tierney gave notice, that he would in the committee, on Monday next, propose that the bill should not be permanent, but temporary.

Mr. Lambton rose, not for the purpose of discussing the question before them, but because he felt bound to state his opinions to the House and the country, in consequence of a statement made by a noble earl in another place, that there were 14,000 or 15,000 men on the banks of the Weir and the Tyne, ready for rebellion. Without in any way accusing those from whom the noble earl received his information (of whom he had no knowledge), or supposing, for a moment, that the noble earl made the statement in any other than the most temperate manner, yet, residing, as he did, in that neighbourhood, employing many of the inferior classes of the population, as he did, and representing the county of Durham, as he did, he felt himself imperatively called upon to declare, that, from all the observation which he had been enabled personally to make, and from all the information which he had derived from his agents, there did not appear the slightest reason to believe that the assertion was founded in truth. He was bound to state this, as it might otherwise be supposed that his silence implied a concurrence in the accuracy of the noble earl's declaration. He wished also to state, with reference to the assertion cited in the debate of last night, that 700 men, with concealed arms, proceeded from a village three miles from Newcastle, to the meeting near that town on the 11th of October; that he entirely agreed with the hon. member for Northumberland in saying, that, from all the information which he had been able to procure on the subject, not one of the individuals alluded to was armed. Before he left that part of the country, he took all the means in his power to obtain information on the subject of the supposed secret manufacture of arms. It had been stated to him by the foreman of a large iron manufactory, in the neighbourhood, that he considered it impossible that any arms could be secretly manufactured by the workmen there employed; for that the raw material was weighed out to them in the first instance, and the manufactured article weighed when completed. It was impossible, therefore, that they could use any of the iron belonging to their employers; and in his opinion they were too poor to purchase iron. He sincerely believed, therefore, that from the stigma of being engaged in any such atrocious practice as that imputed to them, the population of his neighbourhood was entirely free. God forbid that he should say the noble earl did not implicitly believe the statement which he had made; but he had probably received his information from persons not entitled to credit. It had been suggested to him by some of his hon. friends, that he ought to name the noble earl. It was the earl of Strathmore. Although the inferior classes in his neighbourhood were firmly and enthusiastically attached to the cause of reform, he was persuaded they entertained no hostility towards the constitution and the government.

Sir M. W. Ridley begged to be allowed to mention a few facts, illustrative of the real character of the meeting which had been held in the neighbourhood of Newcastle. He was peculiarly anxious to do this, from the general impression, that many of the persons attending the meeting at Newcastle, on the 11th of October, were inhabitants of Newcastle itself. He had been particularly requested by the inhabitants of that town to state, that there was scarcely a single person present at the meeting who was really an inhabitant householder of Newcastle. The meeting was held on the town moor, being the only place thereabouts sufficiently large for the purpose. The great number assembled, owing to the neighbourhood not being accustomed to such assemblages, excited considerable alarm. There were about 30,000 or 40,000 persons. He took it upon him to state, from the information of an individual who was present, and who saw the radicals marching in a body into the town, that they did not exceed 7,000 in number. When they reached the moor, and saw the assembly, and the kind of persons who were likely to take the lead in it, the greater part of them turned off, and went away, dispersing very peaceably. On the best information and inquiry, he was persuaded that there were no persons with arms present. He also wished to state, with reference to the other subject mentioned by the mayor of Newcastle in his letter to lord Sidmouth, namely, the turbulent conduct of the keelmen, that it had no connexion whatever with the disaffection which was supposed to exist in that part of the country. It happened about the period of the meeting that there was an unfortunate disagreement between the keelmen and the ship-owners. He had little doubt that the meeting was fixed by the leaders for the 11th of October, in the hope that they would be joined by the unemployed keelmen. It was highly creditable to the keelmen, that those who did attend the meeting were influenced only by curiosity, and took no part in the proceedings. He had that morning received a letter from the secretary of a society, calling itself the society of "Political Protestants" in that neighbourhood, a part of which he thought himself bound in justice to read. It could scarcely be necessary for him to observe, that he believed the principles of such a society were most mischievous, and that he was determined to do all that he could to put such principles down. But as the letter to which he had alluded disavowed any arming on the part of the reformers, he would read a passage from it, which was as follows:—"We challenge our most inveterate opponents to say that we have in a single instance evinced a spirit of disloyalty. Our meetings have been open, and we have occasionally had the honour of the company of the officers of the police. Our books and papers are to be seen by all who choose to look at them. As to the accusation of our having concealed arms, we are persuaded that his worship, the mayor of Newcastle, has been misinformed on that subject. We are not quite such fools as some persons take us to be. We know that it is the right of every Englishman openly to have arms, and we also know, that to conceal arms is illegal. If, therefore, we wished to have arms, we should buy them openly, and hang them up in our houses. Our object is not revolution, but reform." Of course he could not pledge himself to the truth of one word which he had read, but he had thought that justice to the persons in question required that he should state their own character of themselves.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that whether the 700 men who marched to Newcastle from a neighbouring village were armed or not, was immaterial. What had fallen from the hon. baronet was perfectly sufficient to show that there were abundant grounds for apprehension and vigilance. That a meeting of between 30,000 and 40,000 persons had assembled, of whom 7,000 formed a regularly organized body, was a fact on which comment would be superfluous.

The House then resolved itself into the committee. The blanks in the bill were filled up; and the House resumed.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.] Lord Castlereagh brought in a bill "to make certain publications subject to the Duties of Stamps upon Newspapers; and to restrain the Abuses arising from the publication of blasphemous and Seditious Libels." On the motion, that it be read a first time,

Mr. Brougham rose to object to this bill even in its first stage. He conceived that all the bills lately introduced into the House tended to abridge the liberty of the subject. The present bill, however, went to abridge the liberty of the press, which he conceived to be the great pillar of the constitution; he, therefore, could not let it pass without entering his protest against it. As other opportunities would occur, when he could enter into the objections which he entertained against this bill, he should not trouble the House any farther at present.

The bill was then read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL.] Lord Sidmouth rose to move the second reading of the bill for the more effectual prevention and punishment of blasphemous and seditious libels. He observed, that the title of the bill sufficiently expressed its object, and their lordships, he was confident, could not entertain a doubt of the propriety of checking, as far as possible, libels of the description against which the provisions of the bill were directed. The object of the bill was proposed to be accomplished merely by giving to the court the power of increasing the severity of the punishment which was now applied in cases of conviction for libel on a repetition of the offence. It was not proposed that any additional punishment should attach in the first instance to a conviction for libel, but that a defendant should, on conviction for a second libel, be liable, according to the judgment of the court, to the punishment of banishment or transportation. Having, on a former occasion, fully stated the nature of this bill, and the other measures connected with it, he should not trouble their lordships with any farther details at present; but should be ready in the course of the debate, to give any explanation which might appear necessary. He would only say, that whatever measures their lordships in their wisdom might think fit to adopt in the present situation of the country, they would all prove ineffectual unless means were found to check the licentiousness of the press. That licentiousness was the great source of the evil with which they had to contend, and if, after adopting the other measures, they did not agree to this, the remedy would be incomplete. The objects of the other measures, important as they were, could not be attained without this; for if it were not adopted, their lordships would still have in all its strength, that destructive virus, the pernicious effects of which, if allowed to operate, were certain and irremediable. He concluded by moving, that the bill be now read a second time.

Lord Erskine said, that public necessity, from the state of the country, had been assumed as the justification of this bill as it

regarded alike blasphemous and seditious publications; but no such thing was stated in its preamble. It was most important that circumstances which were hereafter to justify, as a precedent, so extraordinary a change in the law, should be distinctly set forth and recorded; but the preamble was nevertheless quite silent as to any facts which ought to have induced the House to assent to any measure whatsoever upon the subject. It merely asserts that "it is expedient to make more effectual provision for the punishment of blasphemous and seditious libels." But why expedient? Had it been shown that the existing laws were insufficient to suppress them? The bill also applied alike to blasphemy and sedition—objects so very different, that nothing could be more absurd than to associate them, and to legislate on them as one, subjecting them to the same punishments. The controversies of the numerous sects of Christians, however widely differing from the doctrines of the national church, were completely and rightly tolerated. Nothing in such discussions were considered to be blasphemous; but as to direct and indecent attacks on the truths of the christian religion, on which the whole constitution of the state was founded, they were severely and justly punishable by the law as it stood, and ought to be most rigorously enforced. The poor man surrounded by his children crying for bread when he had none to give them, would have no other consolation than by looking forward to the hope which christianity afforded. How cruel, then, how intolerably wicked, to disturb such pious faith, and to disqualify the people for the performance of their duty to the state. He would support, nay go before his majesty's ministers in putting down such pernicious publications: nor was there the smallest difficulty in accomplishing it. But a totally different question presented itself when new laws were demanded. The law officers of the crown had already the amplest means in their hands for the suppression of all injurious publications. This was most clearly proved in the total suppression of another species of libel formerly most destructively prevalent, and equally injurious to morals as blasphemy itself. When he came first to the bar, obscene publications, ruinous to youth of both sexes, were as openly exposed to sale in London as at the Palais Royal in Paris; but a private society, without even the aid of the great resources of the Crown, or of any new law like the present, completely succeeded in putting down this odious nuisance. The existing law he himself had found triumphant against them when he represented that body in the court of King's-bench, and they were now never seen, and scarcely ever heard of. How happened it, then, that the attorney-general, with the public purse at his command, could not accomplish what a few private individuals had benevolently undertaken and succeeded in? The reason was manifest: ministers had never properly put the law in action against them. They had contented themselves with prosecuting a few parodies published by Mr. Hone, which, however improper and irreverend, were not aimed at the religion of the country, but at his majesty's ministers and parliament; yet they failed in the prosecution from not addressing the charge and the argument to the jury upon the real, and in his opinion palpable ground of offence. They had no count in the first information charging a seditious libel, and in that which succeeded it they passed it by. In one passage, if I recollect right, it was said, "Oh contemptible Boroughmongering House of Commons, have mercy upon us your would-be constituents." Now, without meaning to approve the present construction of the House of Commons, he was confident that the juries of London would not have sanctioned that publication under the ordinary laws, and with their minds not disturbed by the suspension of public liberty. He would have reminded them that the very same House of Commons so constituted and so calumniated, had been the parent of public liberty, now suspended; that the same House of Commons so constituted and so calumniated, had passed the Habeas Corpus act, even the suspension of which was so justly alarming. That the same House of Commons so constituted and so calumniated, had passed the libel bill which gave them the very privilege which they were to exercise as a trust for the great body of the people. Why, then, were new laws to be made because government mis-directed their charge? His excellent friend, the late attorney-general, had no other course to pursue. To raise a cry for the present bills, blasphemy was made the pretext in parliament, and it was to be followed up in the courts. The Age of Reason had then long been in the most extensive circulation, but never was prosecuted or adverted to, nor any other blasphemy, till they were blasphemed themselves in Hone's parody, and then it was too late to take the matter up upon their own account, and this was a faithful history of their defeat. He knew juries too well to believe that they would not have faithfully protected the institutions of the country however they might think that they were defective—but when public liberty was suspended, public justice was in a manner suspended also. He came now to a second description of libels against which the bill was directed, but without a shadow of justification. Of a blasphemous libel there could be but one feeling and one judgment; but publications might be and often had been charged to be seditious, which were virtuous, public spirited, and useful—writings which noble lords opposite might well think offensive, but which disinterested, honest, men, ought to approve. Such publications, forsooth, even before final judgment, were to be seized by the crown and suppressed. By this bill, a verdict was a warrant for seizure and suppression, though the judgment might be afterwards annulled. The verdict against the dean of St. Asaph was in August, and under this law could not therefore have been afterwards circulated, but under the penalty of transportation. Yet he had shown the court of King's-bench in November, that taking even the verdict to have been justifiable, it was impossible to sustain any judgment on it, and he had not been ever heard in reply when the judgment was arrested. But even if this bill could nevertheless in that respect be supported, it would do mischief instead of good; the libel could only be seized in the hands of the party prosecuted, or his agent, and where they might be lying as lumber unsold, but the judgment of seizure would produce whilst in the hands of others, an extensive circulation. So much for making unnecessary laws instead of trusting to them that were of old times. There were many cases in which a subject had a perfect right to complain of proceedings of the executive government, and even of parliament itself. He had successfully defended Mr. Stockdale on that very ground, for publishing an attack upon the House of Commons, for circulating their own charge against Mr. Hastings long before the hour of trial, and yet prohibiting all answers to it; and it was a noble act of the jury, never to be forgotten, that even before the libel bill, they took upon themselves to acquit him. Had they done otherwise, that virtuous work of Dr. Logan's could not have been sold but under the pains of felony under this pernicious bill before them. The House ought to beware how they inflamed the spirit and temper of the people against the government by new and odious attempts to punish them without measure or mercy. The people of England were not to be so subdued. They were accused of cherishing plans of innovation—but if the accusation was just, why was parliament to become an innovator? Instead of new and unexampled severities, it would be wiser to consider before it was too late of temperate and practicable reforms which would satisfy the well-intentioned and moderate, and induce the partisans of wild schemes to relinquish them. Nothing was wanting to put down blasphemy and sedition but the execution of the laws. The novelty of seizure was once well exposed, and he would refer them for example to the conduct of Cromwell when Harrington's Oceana was seized before the liberty of the press was established by law. Harrington, who, republican as he was, continued faithful to the unhappy Charles, and fainted on his scaffold when he was executed, had this work nevertheless seized as a libel upon all government. Harrington sent his daughter to the daughter of the protector to ask her mediation, and seeing her child in her arms, seized it and ran away, and when she was called upon to return it, she complied, saying at the same time, "Your father had seized my father's child—give me back that as I have restored your's." This intercession was successful, Cromwell saying to her, "If my government be made to stand, it has nothing to fear from a paper shot;" and he afterwards consented to accept of a dedication. Depend on it (concluded lord E.) this new system will only increase the evils you complain of. Give satisfaction to the people, and then, instead of passing new laws on the subject of sedition, you might soon dispense with the execution of the old ones. As to blasphemy, crush it at any hour with my assent, so as the laws for the general protection of public freedom are not annulled and violated.

The Earl of Harrowby said, he had listened with much attention to the noble and learned lord who had just sat down, because he knew him to possess great practical knowledge on the subject under consideration; but after having carefully attended to all that had fallen from him, he could not see how his statements warranted the conclusion he had drawn. The noble and learned lord began by making a distinction between blasphemous and seditious libels, the justness of which no man would deny; but although every blasphemous and seditious libel, was, as such, subject to punishment by law, their lordships must have been very inattentive to what was passing if they had not observed the great difference between the libels of the present day and those of former times. He readily admitted, that there were greater shades of distinction in seditious than were to be found in blasphemous libels, which difference would require the consideration of those who executed the laws. It was certainly too much to argue, that a second libel must necessarily be punished by the severest penalty of the law. The answer to such an argument was, that the punishment was by the bill left to the discretion of the court. The noble and learned lord had contended, that the judges had at present the power of increasing the punishment on a second libel; but the subject of complaint was, that by the existing law they had not power in many cases to render the punishment commensurate with the offence. The noble lord had inferred that the law at present must be adequate to check seditious and blasphemous libels, because a society had succeeded in putting down obscene publications. It was contended, that if the attorney-general had been as attentive as that society, he would have succeeded in crushing sedition and blasphemy. This argument was, however, singularly inconsistent with another part of the noble and learned lord's speech, in which he represented the effect of prosecution to be to encourage libels. At least this was a fair inference from the argument, that the sale would be more extensive. The noble and learned lord had supposed that great injury might arise to the property of a bookseller from a seizure which might afterwards be reversed on an arrest of judgment; and, if he understood him rightly, there was little danger of this injury occurring, since the great sale which the prosecution would cause must, according to the noble and learned lord's supposition, leave very little of the property to be seized. But the fact was, that the noble and learned lord had urged no serious objection to the bill. The ground on which the measure was recommended to their lordships' adoption was, that the species and circulation of the libels of the present day differed in description and extent from all former publications. It was impossible for any constitution to escape from the evil effects of the moral taint which such publications diffused. It was argued, that the courts could now punish sufficiently; but the only penalties that at present attached to libel were fine and imprisonment. But, were these sufficient at a time when such extraordinary means were taken to circulate blasphemy and sedition through every corner of the country—when the labourer could not drink his cup of tea or coffee without at the same time partaking of the deleterious poison? Was it, then, too much to say, that a different punishment should be inflicted, when an offence so iniquitous was aggravated by repetition? Did, then, any other punishment but banishment and transportation remain to be applied? Those who gave their support to these laws were the sincere friends of the press. They well knew that the liberty of England and the liberty of the press were inseparably connected. It was because they loved the freedom of the press, that they wished to guard against the evils to which its misdirection gave rise. The freedom of discussion which belonged to the constitution of this country, those who recommended these bills were most anxious to preserve. They were not the enemies, but the well-wishers of the press, who endeavoured to correct its abuses. They were desirous of that correction, in order to render the advantages which this country derived from the liberty of the press eternal. But no free government could exist, if those (he knew not what to call them) reptiles, that at present swarmed in every direction, were permitted to gnaw the timbers of the vessel of the state until her preservation became impossible. He was convinced, that their lordships, in spite of all that had been said, would perceive that the present measure, instead of injuring, would strengthen public liberty, and that they would therefore sanction it by their adoption.

of the press, which had been so much dwelt upon by noble lords, and with regard to its proposed cure. If all that was required of their lordships on the present occasion, was a declaration that a more vigorous administration of the existing law was necessary he, for one, would join in sanctioning such a principle. But was that stated in the preamble of the bill? Was it affirmed that the law ought to be more strenuously administered? No: it was stated, that the law itself did not afford sufficient means of suppressing the evil. Upon what foundation did this statement rest? Where was the information to warrant the assertion? How and where had it been shown that the law, though duly enforced, had been inefficient to put down the mischief?—Without any such grounds of proceeding, without any explanation whatever, their lordships were called upon to pass an enactment which would alter the old, long-established law of the land, and to apply the punishment of felony to cases of misdemeanor; of misdemeanor, too, not precise and definite, but so variable that scarcely any two could agree as to the character of any specific charge.—Their lordships would certainly not be led away by any argument from those persons out of doors who seemed to think that any punishment was unfit for any evil, except what might happen to suit their own views. Their lordships would recognize no such reasoning; they felt that it was frequently one of the most important and essential, as it was one of the most delicate, questions which could occupy, a legislative body, to discuss and apportion the peculiar sort of punishment due to each particular offence. But in all such cases, it was fitting that the most ample details should be laid before parliament, in order to induce it to alter or modify the laws. Whereas, their lordships were called upon to pass the present bill without any information of the inefficiency of the existing law; nay, on the contrary, the documents laid on the table proved, that not merely no extraordinary energy, but that not even common steps had been taken to check the shocking licentiousness that had tainted the press; and that it was till December 1818, that any steps had been taken at all. Yet, in the face of these circumstances, their lordships were called upon to stamp a character on the offence of libel such as it had never borne before, and to visit it with penalties unheard of in the history of this country, and only to be paralleled by the worst precedents in Roman legislation. The praise, therefore, hitherto appropriate, which Mr. Justice Blackstone had bestowed on our law in this respect, would no longer apply: for if the bill were passed, no man could say, “that our law of libel corresponds rather with the middle age of Roman jurisprudence, when liberty, learning, and humanity, were in their full vigour, than with the cruel edicts that were established in the dark and tyrannical ages of the ancient decemviri, or the later emperors.”—He was certainly prepared to contend, that the present bill did not propose an alteration in the amount, but in the nature of punishment, by substituting for the well-known penalties a penalty of a quality totally different: one too (he alluded to the transportation to Botany-Bay), which was the very reverse of what was fit for the offence. It was even at present an objection justly urged against the punishment of transportation to Botany-Bay, that it was extremely unequal and more detrimental to one individual than another, though those affected by it were for the most part taken from one class of society; but what would be said of it, if it should be applied to offences which might be committed by men in all classes of society; frequently, too, by men of the most exemplary and praiseworthy characters in all other respects, and who, by their talents and their virtues, might be capable of making ample compensation to their country for any injury which they might have inflicted through the press? To apply such a punishment to such persons, would not merely argue an inhuman want of caution in their lordships, but a great want of policy; for he was convinced that the provision to increase the punishment of the libeller, would in fact decrease it, and be his most effectual protection. This was a view well worthy of their lordship's consideration, they should pause and see whether in fact they would not make it more difficult than ever to procure a conviction for a libel. When any complaint was now made of the few prosecutions instituted for libel, their lordships were told of the unwillingness of juries to bring in a verdict of guilty. But could their lordships hope to cure that unwillingness, by substituting for the present punishment one that would be revolting to sense and humanity; one that would disgust every man in the kingdom, and of course every jurymen who might be called to pass his judgment in such a case? Their lordships had already seen the difficulty of procuring verdicts in cases of clear and specified crime, and when there could be no hesitation as to the nature of the offence; and juries had not unfrequently (he would not say, that they had acted rightly—all must feel that they had acted naturally), arbitrarily altered by their verdict even the value of a one pound note, in order to ward off what they considered a cruel and exorbitant punishment. If this was the case where the law had defined with absolute certainty the character of the offence, what would be the result where the offence imputed was indefinite and vague? The most eminent judges had been able to give no clearer definition of a seditious libel, than that it comprehended whatever was calculated to bring the government into hatred and contempt. Such a description, it was obvious, would be thought to apply or not to any particular writing, according to the different views and various reasonings of various minds: and where such various judgments might be formed, it was evident that jurymen would exercise their judgments, and modify their sentence by a reference to the consequences which would attach to it. He would ask their lordships to look at what had been the conduct of a great master in legislation on this very subject. He supposed that none of their lordships could feel a greater desire to put down libels than the extraordinary man lately at the head of the French government. Indeed, his extreme anxiety on that point was (if he might be allowed so to speak) one of the defects of his understanding; and certainly, it was not possible for any man to use greater energy and perseverance than he did, to repress what he considered as the evil most formidable to his government. Yet the code of France, even under these circumstances, contained no such unjust and cruel provision as that of transportation for any offence relative to the press. It might, indeed, be said, that transportation was not a penalty known to the French law; but deportation was; yet no such punishment, nor any in the least degree analogous, had been applied; and the punishment of fine and imprisonment was considered to be the most efficacious to repress the evil. Yet the British parliament was called upon to pass a law which was thought too severe even under the late rigid government of France, and which was the reverse of all that was just and humane. And what, he would repeat, would be its practical effect? He was convinced that any man once convicted, would go into court a second time under peculiar advantages, which would greatly tend to weaken the due execution of the law, and thereby the respect due to its administration. That public opinion would set itself against such a severity of punishment in this country, there could be no doubt. Juries would infallibly take into consideration the consequences of their verdicts, mixed up with the consideration of the offence charged, and their verdicts would, as they were now, be guided by the feelings arising out of those united considerations. Take the case, for instance, of an hon. baronet, the member for Westminster, who was now under prosecution on a charge of seditious libel. Suppose that hon. baronet to be found guilty, and to be subsequently charged with a similar offence, could it be believed for a moment, that a jury would by their verdict consign him to Botany Bay, or that they would not give a very different verdict under the same circumstances, with the knowledge, that the finding him guilty might send him to Botany Bay, than they would with the knowledge, that a verdict of guilty could only lead to fine and imprisonment? It was with these feelings, and under these impressions, that he felt it his duty to oppose this bill: let the existing laws be carried into effect, and either they would be found sufficient, or it might be satisfactorily proved that they had failed; but when enactments like the present were brought forward of great additional security, it became their lordships to pause before they agreed to them, and to consider well, whether by these enactments they would not be in effect weakening the cause the enactments were intended to support; whether, if they were attempted to be carried into operation, it would not be much more difficult to obtain a conviction than under the present laws? and thus their whole object be defeated. There was one other part of the bill, respecting which he wished to have some explanation; the term within which actions must be commenced against magistrates, was in this bill fixed at three months, in other bills it had been six months, no reason had been assigned for this alteration; and as it appeared that three months would be scarcely sufficient for the purposes of justice, he was more anxious to have it explained, why in this instance the usual term had been departed from, no cause being assigned for the alteration on the face of the bill?

Lord Ellenborough said, that when he considered that the present bill was intended to annex a new and higher quantity of punishment to the offences against which it was directed, he should be disposed to join in the apprehensions expressed by the noble marquis, as to the difficulty of obtaining a verdict in the second case, if the blasphemous and libellous publications alluded to had extended more generally than he believed they did. But the offences, it should be considered, were those of seditious and blasphemous libels—seditious libels intended to overthrow the constitution, and blasphemous libels to subvert the religion of the country. He still trusted that the efforts of the press, industrious as they were, had not succeeded to that extent which was sufficient to alienate the minds of jurymen from the religion in which they were educated, and from that respect for the laws which it was their duty to maintain. Seditious libels were not the offspring of party views, nor connected with party politics: they were attempts to overturn the constitution, by extinguishing those feelings of attachment towards it, which he hoped still prevailed among his majesty's subjects. The noble marquis had objected that the punishment was new. It was upon that very ground that he (lord Ellenborough) supported it; for believing as he did, that the object of the persons concerned in those publications was base lucre, and their chief agent a vile malignity, he could not help thinking that some new quality of punishment was necessary to meet and suppress their efforts. He was further confirmed in this opinion, from observing that the prosecution and conviction of libellers under the existing law produced frequently the effect which the libeller himself had chiefly in view—that of extending the sale of his work, and thereby putting lucre in his pocket. He was sure when they considered what the author of a blasphemous libel attempted; that he attempted, as had been eloquently expressed by a noble lord who had preceded him, to deprive the poor man of his only hope and consolation; when they considered this, he would ask, what greater crime could be committed? What more atrocious offence could an individual be guilty of, than that of endeavouring to destroy the foundation upon which all society existed? The consolations which arose from religion, and particularly to a poor man, were the most grateful; and yet it was among this class that those pernicious libels were most generally circulated. He looked with little less horror upon those who were charged with publishing seditious libels, their object being to shake the affections of the people towards those to whom the preservation of the constitution had been entrusted, and to produce a change in that constitution, which, if it were effected, must prove utterly destructive of their happiness. Notwithstanding all these mischievous efforts, however, he trusted the constitution would still remain the envy of nations. When they considered the alterations which had taken place in the state of society for the last twenty years, he could not but think that some new regulations were absolutely necessary for the purpose of repressing the licentiousness of the press. In these observations he meant particularly to allude to the progressive increase of education. When they gave knowledge they did not give the power of exercising a proper judgment, although they might hope that power would be inculcated. He believed that where the power of reading and writing had been given, without a strong foundation of morality, instead of producing that benefit which every good man had a right to anticipate, and which all had endeavoured to accomplish, it had been enlisted into the cause of blasphemous and seditious libellers, and had thus become an instrument of real mischief. Upon all these grounds he was strongly of opinion, that some additional strength ought to be given to the laws; and he trusted, notwithstanding the apprehensions which had been expressed by the noble marquis, that we should still be the happiest and the most prosperous nations on the face of the globe.

Lord Holland said, that of all the hideous codes which had ever come under his observation, he must confess, he had never witnessed one more obnoxious than that which was then under the consideration of the House ; and as he considered it part of a system of policy which was about to be entered upon, he certainly thought himself justified on this occasion, as well as upon all other occasions in which these bills were likely to come before them, to take into his view the state of the danger to which it was said the country was exposed, and to advert to the circumstances upon which the noble viscount on the other side of the House, had recommended these measures to their adoption. He wished, however, on the present occasion, to confine himself entirely to the bill under the consideration of the House. In order to do this it was necessary to look to the grounds upon which the bill had been recommended to their lordships. But where were those grounds to be found, unless in the speech of the noble viscount, and in the preamble of the bill itself, except, indeed, in the speech which had just been delivered, and in which only a rational ground of defence had been stated ? All that could be collected from the noble viscount, and from the preamble of the bill, was, that it was expedient to make more effectual provision for the punishment of blasphemous and seditious libels. Was that alone enough to justify an alteration in the laws of the country ? Was it upon this ground alone that an alteration was recommended, which would have all the effects, all the advantages, which had been explained by the noble lord at the head of his majesty's council ? Was there no other reason for at once destroying the liberty of the press ? It was, indeed, of a piece with the ordinary description of parliamentary logic. When the minister came to take the money from their purses, he always told them what a value he set upon their property : when he offered to invade the constitution, and the law, he told them how he loved the laws and the constitution of their country, and now, when he came to tell them that he who published, perhaps inadvertently, perhaps without the opportunity of control a seditious or a blasphemous libel, was to be transported for life, he told them how he loved the liberty of the press ! But let them consider what were the grounds which had been stated by the noble lord for the adoption of this extraordinary measure. The principal ground was the great increase of these blasphemous and seditious libels. In the first place it became their duty to inquire to what that great increase was to be attributed, and whether it was not to be ascribed to the malicious connivance of ministers themselves ? Of this he could form no direct judgment ; but he was satisfied that these disgusting publications did not add to the state of the country any additional danger. If, however, any danger did result to the religion of the people, from the prevalence of these disgusting blasphemous publications, he asserted that it was wholly to be attributed to the conduct of his majesty's government, and was connected with those evil designs towards the liberty of the country, which had been since the meeting of that House, so clearly developed. He submitted, however, that the people of England were a religious people, and he would be party to no man, whether king, prince, or demagogue, who would allege that they could be made proselytes to infidelity, or that any additional laws were necessary to the maintenance of their faith. If they looked to the history of the country they would find that the people, and not those in high situations alone, had always rested themselves on the foundation of religion ; and he verily believed that much more might be done, if a change were to be effected upon the old and approved method of Oliver Cromwell, than by those doctrines of which the noble lord had said so much. But this opinion and observation upon the disposition and temper of the people of England was not only his. They had the opinion of the noble viscount precisely to the same effect. They were told, not above five or six years ago, that there was such a disposition in the people of this country to preach the word of God,—that persons of the lowest situation in life had become teachers of Christianity, and collected immense congregations—they were told that Christianity was preached not alone by the elevated and the learned, but by individuals of the most humble class ; and such was the spirit which then existed, that their floor was covered with petitions from those persons, praying for opportunities to pursue that course of religious worship which they conceived best suited to their spiritual welfare. He would ask, what had since taken place to produce so awful a change in the morals of the people as they had heard described ? He recollected, in travelling through the country at that period, that scarce a village came under his notice, in which he did not see some new place of religious worship. These erections he had always seen with pleasure; and knowing the principles upon which they had obtained existence, he could not help listening with regret to the alterations which were stated to have taken place, within a few short years. He did not believe, however, that there was any foundation for this charge; and could not help viewing with horror and indignation, the attempts which were made upon so fallacious an argument to alter the constitution. For these reasons he doubted the first proposition, that it was necessary to recommend the measures which had been proposed to the House. He meant that he doubted the extent of these blasphemous publications; and he also doubted the extent of any danger which had or could result from them. Having expressed these doubts, he next came to another important branch of the question, and that was, how the laws as they existed with reference to this subject had been enforced? It was incumbent on his majesty's ministers before they came to require an alteration of the laws, to prove in a satisfactory manner that those laws were inadequate to the purposes for which they were formed. They should prove not only the existence of the evil, but they were bound also to prove, that that evil had not arisen from misconduct of their own, and that they had not the means in their hands of putting it down. He knew not how this would be answered. If blasphemous publications had been extensively and numerously circulated, where were the prosecutions? or what course had been taken to suppress them? It had been said that juries would not do their duty in cases of blasphemous publications. It was indeed a strange perversion of human intellect, that a person, at the moment he was recommending additional restraints upon the crime of libel, should himself be pronouncing the grossest of libels upon one of the most sacred institutions of the country! It was not less strange to hear it urged that juries who would not convict, as the punishment at present stood, would be more likely to convict if that punishment was increased. But let their lordships come to the bill itself. To what did it refer? They were told by the noble lord who spoke last that he approved of the bill, because it extended the punishment with regard to seditious and blasphemous libels. This, certainly, was a clear and substantial ground for approval; but did the bill

itself make any such distinction? Did it not—and it was on that ground that he thought it mainly objectionable—extend the punishment of transportation to crimes which were indefinite in their nature, and which were open to different constructions in the different courts of justice in this country? In this bill, too, there existed an anomaly, directly contrary to the principles of crime and punishment—he alluded to that of making the master criminally responsible for the act of his servant. It had been held in crimes of this character, not merely that it was sufficient to give prima facie evidence of the crime of the master, but it had been explained on the highest authority, and had several times been acted upon, but he hoped would be acted upon no longer, that he should not be allowed to enter into any explanation or exculpation of his conduct whatever, although he might know nothing of the writing of the libel or of the publishing of the libel; and although at the moment the publication took place, he might have been actually serving his majesty in putting down a riot. He was sure it could not be the intention of any man, and more especially so candid and ingenuous a person as the noble lord who spoke last, that a person so situated should be subject for the second offence of which he was so found guilty to the punishment of transportation for seven years. But then it was said that this punishment was in the discretion of the court! This was indeed a monstrous proposition, and one to which he would never willingly accede. He would never consent to have the constitution and the liberties of the country placed at the discretion of any man, however elevated or however virtuous. He wished also to state other objections, which he thought equally conclusive. The bill increased the punishment of a crime which he already described to be indefinite. This was a solecism in law, because according to the practice of the courts, there was no malus animus. It was also to be remarked, that it destroyed all the right of evidence on the part of the accused. Another point deserving particular attention was that which applied to the evidence to be received as indicative of the first conviction. By this bill it was not the record, or even the copy of the record, that was brought forward; but it was enacted that it should be sufficient for the clerk of the peace to write a certificate of the substance and effect of the record. Substance and effect of the record! Why, he would ask, was this provision so made; why not in these as well as in other cases have the record itself? It might be said, that it was too expensive; but no expense could be too great where the due administration of justice was at stake. He also found in this measure a new term in legislation—he meant the word “banished.” He did not know, nor had he ever heard of banishment as any part of the laws of this country. Why it had been introduced on the present occasion he was at a loss to imagine.—He now called upon the House to look at the practical effect of this measure arising out of the difficulty of the definition of a libel. There was scarcely a man in the two Houses of parliament for the last 150 years who might not have been in a situation to be tried under this act. Let them look, too, to the effect which was likely to accrue to all public men, whether literary or otherwise. In speaking of men who had been considered as men of great talent and high station in this country, let them take in my lord Somers, during the years from 1679 to 1683, a time of great oppression in the courts of justice, and when the judges were extremely subservient to the administration in power. During that time, what would have been the effect of such a measure as this? Would not many passages of his speeches, dictated by integrity and sound worth, have been pronounced libels, and punished accordingly? From the time of lord Somers down to that of Mr. Burke, taking the acts of their public life, might not many men have written or spoke some opinion which would come within the definition of libel? And when they considered the fluctuation of parties, to what consequences might not those persons be exposed? Let the House consider the situation in which men would be placed who were altogether innocent; or who, if guilty, could only be accused of a venial offence. Let them consider too, that these persons were to be exposed to the punishment inflicted upon criminals of the lowest cast. Let them see also what would be the effect upon literary men, both with respect to seditious and blasphemous publications. What would have become of Milton? What would have become of Dryden, if those against whom his pen had been so effectively wielded, had come into power? Would they not have punished him for those libels, in defiance of his talent? What, too would have become of Pope and Addison, and above all, of sir Richard Steele, the author of the Christian Hero—the eloquent advocate of Christianity. Could he find security; would not Christianity itself be deprived of its warmest friend, if such a man were sent to Botany-bay? Look to the effect of this law upon men who had, in the change of parties, lost the protection of power. Would they not, amidst the animosities of political hostility, be exposed to the most dreadful consequences? Would not, in fact, such a measure be made the instrument of vengeance, instead of power?—But he considered this bill not merely in the circumstances which he had described—there were other points of view equally important. There was another class of persons equally exposed to punishment, not merely the writer, the man of ability and the man of education, but the poor vender of newspapers, who awoke them in the morning with the sound of his horn, and was alike indifferent to what he sold, whether the loyal address of a university, or the contemptible discussions of a radical meeting. Knowing nothing of the contents of the publication, and perhaps incapable of judging of those contents if he did know them, he, too, was subject to the consequences of this bill; at least to the discretion of his majesty's judges. And he here repeated that, however high he held the character of the judges of this kingdom, and there was no period at which they deserved more praise, yet he never would place in their discretion the degree of punishment which such an offender was to receive. He now came to another consideration, and that was, how far the proposed increase of punishment was likely to operate upon the crimes which it was meant to suppress? He would suppose sir Samuel Shepherd addressing the jury in the prosecution of Mr. Hone, and by-the-by he could not help remarking, that the selection of the libel for which that individual was tried was rather unfortunate; he said he would suppose sir Samuel addressing the jury, and after he had closed his case he were to say, “I have now said all I think necessary on this libel, I have proved that it has been printed and published by the prisoner at the bar, and now I beg leave to observe, that if you bring him in guilty, if ever he does any thing of the same sort again, he will be liable to be transported for seven years." Did the House think that this argument would have the effect of convincing the jury that they ought to return a verdict of guilty, instead of not guilty? If there was any force in the reasoning of the noble lord, they must suppose that this monstrous and incoherent proposition was tenable, namely, that an increase of punishment would render the conviction of crime more likely than it was before. It had often been urged in that House, that those who inflicted punishment were more likely to suffer than those by whom it was received; and if it was true, in general, that severity of punishment operated more powerfully on the humane mind, than punishment of a lenient character, was it likely that the punishment of transportation was better calculated to ensure conviction in cases of libel, than if the law remained as it was? The only argument like reason which he had heard, was from the noble lord near him (Ellenborough): he alluded to the observation, "that the present punishment was insufficient." He would not say whether this proposition met his views or not; but he considered that persons willing to endure imprisonment for the sake of gain, would not be induced from the fear of transportation to desist from their criminal practices. On the contrary he thought they would endeavour to increase those gains, in order that on being sent to Botany-bay they might be enabled to enjoy the fruits of their nefarious practices; and, therefore, the new mode of punishment, in his opinion, would not diminish the disposition to offend. [Here a noble lord on the ministerial bench was observed to smile.] The noble lord smiled—and he could trace the source of his smile—he meant to insinuate that he could not take the argument both ways; but he contended that he could, and submitted that both arguments formed a still stronger objection to this bill. His argument went to prove, that during quiet times this bill was not sufficient to suppress the crime to which it was applicable; and that in times of deep agitation it was likely to furnish a weapon of all-powerful persecution, and to turn the sword of justice into the dagger of the assassin. During peaceable times the bill would have no effect at all; while in turbulent times, it might be converted into an instrument for the persecution of innocent persons. These were his reasons for opposing this bill; but he objected to it still more, because he considered it one of those long catalogue of measures which had been introduced to the House for the purpose of invading and destroying the constitution of the country. The effects of these measures collectively, he would on some future occasion submit to their lordships: at present he should content himself with stating, that he considered that the reasons which had been assigned for altering the law of the land were insufficient. Persons guilty of a smaller crime were to be subject to the dreadful punishment of persons guilty of a greater. A new punishment, in fact, was enacted in the laws of England; and this, too, at a time when ministers themselves said, that malicious and designing men went about the country representing to the people, that they could no longer place confidence in the justice of parliament. Whether at such a season it was wise to introduce such a measure, common sense would best point out. He considered the measure altogether objectionable, and entreated the House not to give it their sanction. He hoped, when he saw the bill go into a committee, that their lordships would strike out those parts to which he had particularly alluded, and that they would save that House from the reflections which their adoption of such a bill would naturally produce.

The Lord Chancellor said, that he conceived the measures upon which his noble friend who had just sat down had commented with so much severity, essentially necessary to the preservation of the free constitution of this country; and after the manner in which that noble lord had thought proper to speak of them, it was impossible for him to remain silent. The noble lord had spoken that night in a manner calculated to disgrace the judges of this country. But he would ask the noble lord if he was acquainted with the whole law of libel? At this very moment the punishment of libellers was at the discretion of the judges, and it was at their option to fine, to imprison, or both. There had been, however, a vast change in the law on this subject within a few years past. When he had the honour of holding the office of attorney general, he was effectually opposed in his prosecutions by the noble and learned lord who had addressed them early that night (lord Erskine)—an opposition which he could not help thinking added weight in the cases in which he was himself subsequently engaged. Was it then thought of calling in question the discretion of the judges which was now so much repudiated? What then appeared to be the perfection of the constitution was, that the punishment was in the discretion of the judges, not so, according to the doctrines which had now been promulgated. But to the question as the law stood. If a man, between the time of his prosecution and his judgment, thought proper, day by day, and hour by hour, to repeat his offence, by means of his servant, his wife, or some authorized person, there was nothing to prevent him. Until a great lawyer in another place and a great reformer of laws (Mr. M. A. Taylor) had thought proper to take away the punishment of the pillory, there was some check to this species of pertinacity; but now the court could only imprison and fine, and often the fine was imposed where it could not be paid. The learned lord then alluded to the repetition of the publication of the infamous blasphemies from "The Temple of Reason," after the conviction of Carlile. It was true, he said, that each of these publications might form a subject for a distinct prosecution; but if they extended to the number of 500, or 1,000, or 1,500, was it possible for the duration of human life to afford a sufficient space for a punishment equal to the incalculable mischief which their circulation would effect? His lordship then commented upon the pernicious consequences which had resulted to society from the publication of seditious and blasphemous libels, which were dispersed throughout the country in waggon loads, at the expense of those who felt an interest in their dissemination. The act now before the House would have the effect at once of preventing this evil; for the man who sold, who gave, who lent, or who distributed in any way, one of these libels, would be guilty of a misdemeanor. He should be extremely glad to know how, by any other means, this object could be effected. The law as it existed gave no power of this description, and therefore that House was called upon to remedy the evil; and the bill before their lordships he considered in all respects conducive to that important end. He did not think because the law was made stronger, that juries would be the less inclined to do their duty; on the contrary, he had a firm persuasion that they would do their duty, as became honest and conscientious members of society. He did not mean to say that there were not particular cases in which juries might miscarry. No: one of the greatest beauties of the English constitution was, that all persons might miscarry in performing their duties; or in other words, that a great latitude was allowed them; that no power was employed to compel them to act in a particular manner. He found all the juries with whom he had had to deal anxious to do their duty. He stated this with great truth, and also with great seriousness, for this reason—because it could not long be stated with truth, if they allowed blasphemous publications to be promulgated until they produced an evil effect on the minds of jurymen. As long as their minds were influenced by the religion of the country, by the principles of that religion which their lordships professed, so long would they act conscientiously. There might be miscarriages; but when the law was explained to them, it was their bounden duty to put it in force, and he was quite sure that there would be no disinclination on their part to do so. But, suppose there was a chance that they would not act correctly; was he, therefore, if he thought the constitution in danger, if he thought the law, in its present situation, was unable to support and sustain the constitution, for the benefit of juries themselves, as well as of all the King's subjects; was he, therefore, he asked, to abstain from the performance of his duty, and to declare, that he would not be a party to those legislative provisions, in the passing of which, he hoped to have their lordships concurrence? Notwithstanding all he had heard of the general disinclination of juries to administer the law, he was not one of those who believed that such a disinclination existed. In cases of a criminal nature, to which it was his painful duty to attend, he saw no ground to excite a suspicion that such a disinclination prevailed. They were told that there were several clauses in this bill which were highly objectionable. It would be proper to debate those clauses when they came regularly under consideration; but, as he took it, the question they had to dispose of this night was, whether they were not satisfied, not of the expediency of passing this law, but of the necessity of suppressing seditious and blasphemous libels; and that, therefore, they should enact some measure? What they were to enact was another question. If their lordships thought the existing laws were sufficient for the suppression of such publications, let them say so: but if they did not, then he conjured them, by the gratitude they owed for the blessings they themselves enjoyed, as subjects of this free country, to exert their best powers to hand them down unimpaired to their posterity, if they conceived they could be preserved by wise and vigorous measures. When attempts were made to undermine religion, morals, law, property, in short every thing held most dear, he trusted they would not withhold their concurrence from this bill, which was intended to support them. The great question was, could they, or could they not, take upon themselves to say, that the present state of the law was equal to meet and to correct those evils? He thought it was not, and on that ground he should vote for the measure. His learned friend had stated to the House how he would have carried on the prosecution against Mr. Hone; how he would have addressed the jury; and how great would have been the probability of his succeeding. He was well acquainted with his learned friend's fascinating manner of addressing a jury; but, after being informed by his learned friend of the course he would have taken, he doubted much whether he would have succeeded. His learned friend cried "Hear, hear." He also would cry "Hear, hear." while he stated, that, in his opinion, sir Samuel Shepherd took a correct course. What he did in that case was, to ask a jury of the country, whether a parody, libelling a part of the religion of the country, ought not to be punished? He did not condescend to call on them to look at it as a libel on the various persons therein named. With respect to the law of libel, it was introduced after many gross offences had been committed; it was part of the law of the land, and he hoped it would never be destroyed. This he would venture to say—that it would be wisely used, if exercised to support the constitution of the country; but it would be greatly abused if exercised to destroy that constitution. In this case he was confident it would not be so made use of; and he had no doubt in his mind but that the juries of the country would fearlessly carry into effect the law of the country.

Earl Grey said, he would not stop to inquire whether the prosecution, which he thought had been most injudiciously directed against Mr. Hone, might or might not have been better conducted.

At the same time the noble and learned lord would allow him to say, that, if it had been carried on by his learned friend near him, to no hands could it have been intrusted with a greater hope of success. Feeling as sincerely as any man in that House the indecency and impropriety of reviling or scoffing at religion, still he was of opinion, that that prosecution was most injudiciously taken up, and that the verdict of the jury was perfectly right; because he was convinced, from the evidence and the arguments adduced (and the jury seemed to be convinced of the same thing), that it was not the wish or intention of the defendant to do that with which he was charged, namely, to defame and hold up to contempt the litany and religion of the country, any more than it was the intention of other persons who had published parodies on Shakspeare or other great poets to degrade or vilify them or their works. The learned lord had a little misapprehended what his noble friend had said on the subject. In stating how this prosecution might have been conducted, his noble friend's argument went, he thought, to show, that there would have been a better chance of succeeding in convicting the defendant of publishing a seditious than of disseminating a blasphemous libel. This, however, had little to do with the subject then under discussion, on which, as a matter of much greater importance, he should proceed to deliver his sentiments, and endeavour to answer, if he could, some of the observations of the noble and learned lord who had just sat down. He was afraid that he could not do that justice to the question which he wished; but that circumstance was the less to be regretted, because his noble friend near him had left him little to say in the way of argument. His arguments would, no doubt, be subjected to that sort of taunt which had been thrown out against those advanced by his noble and learned friend behind him. He would be told that they were weak and feeble. His opposition, he admitted, was generally feeble—much too feeble for what the importance of the case required, but feeble only from the defective powers of the person arguing, and not because the individual now delivering his sentiments did not think that this hideous code, as his noble friend had well described it, called not for the most earnest, the most anxious, and the most determined opposition of every man who wished well to the constitution of his country.—Part of the arguments of the noble and learned lord, he confessed, he did not well understand. He argued, first, on the position advanced by his noble friend (lord Holland), a position—which had been unanswerably stated by him—that it was a great and serious evil to be subject to the discretion of any individual. With respect to this position, the noble and learned lord proceeded to show that the judges were at present necessarily vested with a very extensive discretion. But, was the noble and learned lord prepared to state, that such a discretion was not an evil? Was it not, on the contrary, the policy of the law, and the spirit of the constitution of this country, to confine that discretion, where it could not be altogether removed, within the narrowest limits possible? If he could not prove the reverse of this position—and it appeared to him that the noble and learned lord could not dispute its correctness—what then was his argument good for? Would the noble and learned lord tell them, that the judges having at present a discretionary power to punish, in cases of blasphemous or seditious libels, with fine or imprisonment, or both; or that until an hon. and learned friend of his had had the punishment of the pillory repealed (a measure of which he highly approved), the judges having, at their discretion, the right to inflict fine, imprisonment, or pillory, or all three, on persons guilty of publishing blasphemous or seditious libels—would the noble and learned lord tell them, that these were light and trivial matters, and, therefore, that it was necessary to grant a more extensive discretion, and to subject an individual offending to perpetual banishment from the united kingdom? that he should for a civil offence suffer transportation, as if he were a common felon? that he should be chained with common felons in the hold of a transport-ship, and in that situation, be sent to a remote quarter of the globe? This was a fearful, appalling discretion to be placed in the hands of any judge.—The noble lord who sat near him (lord Ellenborough), and who gave as much promise of ability as he had ever witnessed in a first, or, indeed, in any speech in that House, had observed, that blasphemy and sedition were the greatest crimes that could be committed against society, and called for, what every man of sound principles in the country must admit such offence merited, a just and sufficient punishment. No man could doubt the correctness of this sentiment. But the noble lord spoke as if sedition were so definite and precise a crime, that it could not be mistaken. He now called on the noble lord to define to him that which no act of parliament, no lawyer, no judge, had ever yet defined what was the exact nature of a seditious libel. In his opinion, the great evil of this bill was, that, for a crime the most indefinite that was known to the law of England, a discretion was given to the judges of inflicting a punishment which was heretofore only attached to offences of a felonious character. That, it should be observed, which might at one time, be considered seditious, at another period might be looked on as a laudable act; and, therefore, in legislating with reference to the offence, they could not guard, with too many securities, against the possibility of the law being made an instrument of oppression. A seditious libel, in the common acceptation of the word, was, as the noble lord had stated, a publication which tended to disturb the constitution of the country. Now, how many publications would bear that construction in the minds of some persons, which would not be viewed in the same light by others? That which, at one time might be considered a laudable and just endeavour to stimulate the people to uphold the rights which they claimed under the constitution, by a vigorous defence of those rights from encroachment, might, at another, be stigmatised as a seditious attempt to disturb the legitimate course of the powers of government. Those publications would operate, and would be viewed, with reference to places, to times, and to circumstances. It was not uncommon to confound the interests of the constitution and the government of the country, with the interests of an administration; and in some parts of the country, remarkable for the warmth of their zeal, libels against his majesty's ministers might be considered an attempt to disturb the frame of government. In that case, a person twice convicted of such libels, would be subjected to this horrible punishment—transportation, perhaps for life, perhaps for a shorter term. This was a great, a serious evil, and ought not to be incurred, without the most decided proof of its absolute necessity. The country, it was said, was inundated with blasphemous and seditious libels. He could draw a very great distinction between the two offences. Blasphemous libels he looked upon as considerably more mischievous than those of a seditious character; but he did not think the danger to be apprehended from either was so great as had been represented. Let no person imagine that he wished to defend the circulation of such libels. He had no such object. In saying this, he meant to make no strong profession on the subject. He was merely desirous of claiming that degree of credit which every man's character and conduct in life entitled him to. Disapproving, as he did, of those publications—thinking, as he undoubtedly did, that they deserved punishment—still he was not one of those who believed, notwithstanding all the pains taken to circulate them, that they really were circulated to the extent that had been asserted. He did not think they had spread that foul taint over the morals of the country which the lord president of the council had ascribed to them. He believed, with his noble friend (lord Holland), that the people of England were a moral people, and that those who wished to obtain their confidence and favour by the dissemination of blasphemous libels would find themselves miserably deceived. He believed that, if any man entertained the desperate idea of proceeding in the object of a criminal ambition, he would effect his purpose sooner by exhibiting a fanatic and over-religious zeal, than by acting as an atheist and an unbeliever. Had their lordships no evidence on the subject? Let them examine the conduct of those persons whose designs were the most dreaded, and who stood most decidedly opposed to the government of this country. What was their conduct? What did their lordships see? Were those persons employed in actively defending those obnoxious publications? On the contrary, had they not, at public meetings, within these three days, disclaimed any connexion with those irreligious principles? Did they not feel it necessary to justify themselves, by disclaiming not only any participation in the sentiments of Paine (the recent disgusting proceedings respecting the remains of whom he would not even mention), but any knowledge of them, as they had not even read his work? If there were publications against the constitution and the government, the question was, whether the law now in being was not sufficiently strong to meet them, unless there was something in the conduct of government itself that weakened the effect of that law. He had listened with great attention to what the noble and learned lord had said on this part of the subject. He was a great authority in the law—possessing all its learning, most conversant in its practice, and capable, if ever man was, of informing and instructing others in its subtleties. And what did the noble and learned lord say? He told their lordships that he was quite confident in the correct and upright conduct of juries. Now, who believed that they had not done, and would not do, their duty? He went on to observe, that as the law now stood, every publication of a libel might be made the ground of a prosecution; and the punishment, by imprisonment on each conviction, pushed to such an extent, as to exceed the duration of any man's life. Was not that power sufficient, if the law were prudently and vigorously administered, to put down the evil? A noble lord had observed, that the desire of amassing vile lucre was the great cause of those publications. Perhaps, the baser the motive, in such cases, the more worthy of punishment was the offender. But, if vile lucre was the object of those who published blasphemous and seditious libels, could they be more severely punished than by mulcting them of the sum they had amassed? But the noble and learned lord, although he admitted that imprisonment might be visited on persons convicted, to an extent beyond the duration of human life, declared that the law was insufficient. Had it, he demanded, been found insufficient? Had libels of this nature never been published before? Had prosecutions of this nature never occurred at any former period? Had no man, prior to this time, ever published libels, in which a wish to change the constitution was apparent? From the period of the Revolution downwards, when more zeal and more ability were manifested in the mode of conducting the press than perhaps it could boast at present, when the government was not firmly established, when those extraordinary aids which were now called for might have been demanded with a greater show of reason, then their ancestors relied on the existing laws, and, with their assistance, preserved that free constitution which the noble and learned lord had so highly praised—praises which he did not hear with pleasure, because they were too certain precursors of the inflic-

tion of some wound on that constitution, the blessings of which were described in such warm language. With respect to Carlile, how long had he been allowed at his "Temple of Reason" to disseminate the poison of which the noble and learned lord had spoken? Why, he had been allowed to do so for years. But when a prosecution, properly conducted, was instituted against him, it ended in his conviction; and such a punishment was inflicted on him as must effectually ruin the man for ever. In the case of Mr. Hone, a subscription was entered into; and, God forbid that those persons who subscribed should be considered the less religious on that account! They subscribed, because they thought, as he did, that Mr. Hone was the subject of an unjust prosecution. The case was not the same with respect to Carlile. He could not procure bail before judgment was pronounced on him; and ever since he had been found guilty he remained in prison. A heavy fine had also been imposed on him; and if he could not raise it, he would remain in prison for life. Besides, he was bound over to keep the peace, in very heavy penalties. It was highly probable that he would not be able to procure the necessary securities, and until they were forthcoming, he must continue a prisoner. Was that a light power that could award such a sentence? Were punishments of this nature light and trivial? He would maintain, that if the law was duly administered, it would render completely unnecessary such an enactment as that which was now before their lordships. Let the House suppose an individual, whose anxious wish was to perform his duty to his country, and to enlighten his fellow-subjects, but who, in doing so, excited a strong feeling against the measures of government—would it be a light matter to such a man, or could any person imagine that he could exercise the right which the British constitution gave him, of canvassing great public measures, if, on a second conviction for an undefined crime, it was in the discretion of a judge to cast him amongst felons in the hold of a transport-ship, and send him for seven years to Botany Bay? Those who argued in favour of this severe measure admitted that the liberty of the press was the main stay and support of the constitution; and yet, in their horror of its licentiousness, they were ready to destroy it altogether. At the commencement of the last century, under the government of king William, this country was exposed to infinitely greater danger than any which now threatened it. Was it not known, at that time, that a most active party was willing to support the claims of the exiled family? Was it not understood, that, assisted by the French, they were preparing for rebellion? Were not plots of assassination against king William constantly spoken of? If the present ministers had then been in power, what would they have said? They would have declared that those treasonous machinations that threatened the life of the monarch demanded new and extraordinary guards. "We must," they would have said, "no longer leave the life of the monarch exposed to such dangers, nor must we leave the government open to the inroads which threaten it. It is necessary that we should alter the law of treason, and give greater powers to the crown." Was that the plan of the ministers of that period? No; in that very year, when the assassination of the monarch was agreed on, the act relative to constructive treason was passed—that valuable act which gave additional security to the subject, but which, if ministers proceeded in their present course, acting on those new and extraordinary lights that appeared to have broken in upon them, they would, perhaps, in a short time, be called on to do away. The danger of legislating in this manner was self-evident. He asked of their lordships what was likely to be the consequence of the course in which they were now proceeding? He demanded, whether, for some years back, on every new occasion, when any passing danger seemed to threaten the country, the course had not been to grant new powers to the crown and government, whilst nothing whatever was done for the people—nothing to preserve their privileges—nothing to afford additional securities for the protection of their rights and liberties? Instead of that, some additional power was regularly given to the Crown, to coerce the people, and to keep them down more effectually. What could lead more to the corruption of the law, and the utter subversion of the constitution, than so unjust a line of conduct? This was the course that had been adopted for some time past, and which might be traced in the whole code of measures sanctioned and supported by his majesty's ministers—measures brought forward, not to put down the evil of the day, but to inflame and irritate the people, and ultimately to destroy those popular rights and privileges which were once the boast of this country.—He maintained, that the measure now proposed would not check or repress the evil; on the other hand, he conceived that it would very much inflame and increase it. It was impossible it could be otherwise. The fact might be demonstrated from what took place in the course of the last summer. They could judge from the papers on their table, whether the inflammation that existed in the north of England, prior to the 16th of August, was not greatly increased after the events of that day. Mr. Spooner, in his letter, stated that the evil had greatly subsided, that the people would not hear those inflammatory speeches which they had previously attended to, and that no apprehension of a rising need be entertained. Lord Fitzwilliam, in his letter, stated that the meetings were very much on the decrease. But it was notorious, that after the 16th of August, the meetings increased exceedingly, and the spirit by which the people were actuated became much worse. The same effect would be produced by those laws which they were unwisely and ineffectually pressing forward, and against which he would most earnestly, most sincerely, and most zealously raise his voice. He felt how strongly the tide of the House set against him; he knew that it was impossible for him to stem it; but still he would perform his duty. He would not trouble the House much farther: he knew the bills must pass, in spite of all that he and his friends could do; and when that event had taken place, he felt that in future theirs must be a fruitless and unavailing opposition. He hoped the event would prove, that he had adopted a mistaken view of the subject. He trusted those measures would be found as the noble president of the council had stated they would, the best support of the constitution; and that discontent would be succeeded by returning affection, the zealous approbation, and the willing obedience of the people. This was his sincere desire, for he cherished no wish, public or private, except an anxious wish for the peace and prosperity of his country. But, conscientiously feeling that these measures were of a different character; that they had been unadvisedly brought forward by his majesty's government; and that the evils which they were meant to correct would, in fact, be increased by

The Earl of Liverpool said, that the noble earl who had just sat down had taken a view of this question which, if he could make it good, would cause this, and most of the other measures that had been proposed for their lordships consideration, to fall at once to the ground. The noble earl seemed to think, not only that the apprehensions entertained on that side of the House (indeed, he might say, on both sides of the House, with little exception) were unfounded, but he likewise appeared to consider that the special and particular danger which this bill was intended to provide against, might either be effectually met by the existing law, or might be looked on as an evil of which they need not entertain any serious apprehension. However different the opinions of the noble earl might be with respect to the present situation of the country from those held by the great majority of parliament and of the nation, he could venture to affirm, as far as his observation went, that there was no point on which his (the noble earl's) sentiments were so much at variance with public opinion, as on that which referred to blasphemous publications. He could safely assert, that amongst no rank of society, either the higher, the middle, or that part of the lower class who reflected on the subject—amongst no persons of any religious sect or persuasion, had he found a difference of opinion as to the danger of such publications, and the necessity and propriety of arresting those principles and putting down such works, if it were possible. The noble earl and other noble lords said, that he did not apprehend any danger from the dissemination of those blasphemous publications, because the people of England were a religious and a moral people. He was ready to admit that they were a religious people; but the question was, how long the lower orders would continue so, if those publications were allowed to go on? He and the noble earl saw this whole question through a very different medium; for, when he contemplated the whole subject of libel, under existing circumstances, and compared it with the state of libel at any former period in this country, he felt justified in saying, that such an evil never existed before. He admitted that, in all parts of their history, instances might be found of scandalous libels having been published by individuals. But two or three questions were connected with this subject. They must look not only to the nature of the libel which the libeller wrote, but they must also consider the effect it had, or was likely to have, on those to whom it was addressed. Of late years, circumstances which tended to raise the country to the height of prosperity and glory had occurred; but those circumstances, though highly beneficial, had also brought certain evils along with them. A greater extension of liberty than was ever before known in any part of the world, had grown with the increase of knowledge. Let the House consider what was the state of parliament fifty or sixty years ago. It might not, perhaps, be exactly regular to notice the circumstance then, but perhaps he would be permitted to observe, as it formed a very strong ground of argument, that at the period he alluded to, the doors of parliament were shut against the people, and the public did not know what was passing within their walls. What was the case now? The public were every day made acquainted with what parliament was doing, and their deliberations were made the subject of open comment—to such a degree, and to such an extent, as in some measure to influence those deliberations. Let them look to the state of the press at the remote period to which he had referred. He was now speaking practically; and he believed it would be admitted, that the great means of acquiring information and knowledge, amongst the mass of the people, were to be found in periodical publications, which were produced daily, weekly, or monthly. On a former day, when this question was under discussion, he had said, “that, for aught he knew, there might be libels in Gibbons’ History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire” but that, if there were, no danger was to be apprehended from them.” The case was, however, very different with respect to those periodical publications. Let the House compare their increase at the present day with their number fifty, forty, thirty, twenty, or even ten years ago, and they would discover that it was most enormous. When he saw cheap tracts circulated for half-pence and farthings throughout the country, applying themselves to the worst and most dangerous passions of the people; when he remarked the decidedly licentious conduct of the press, and saw the number of libels which it daily sent forth, he could not help thinking that no fair comparison could be drawn between the state of things now, and what it was thirty or forty years ago. When he looked to this important subject—when he dissected and examined it in all its bearings, he considered the prosecution of libels, at the period he had mentioned, to have been almost unnecessary, for the evil at that time must be considered as nothing when compared with the state of things which at present existed, under the circumstances that he had detailed. But the noble earl seemed to imagine because the people of this country were a religious people, they could never be polluted by such publications. He was not ready to concede that point. They had witnessed the French revolution, and had seen the evil effect which irreligious publications had had in that country. But, said the noble earl, no public man, looking for popular favour, would attain his object by the dissemination of blasphemous publications. That might be the case now, but how long would it remain so, if they allowed such an unnatural state of things to continue? It was not on the mere narrow view of liberty or slavery that he considered this question; but this he would say, that if he was asked what was the most likely thing to introduce despotism into England, he would answer, “the success of the machinations of those who disseminated these publications.” What, he asked, would be their effect? That effect had been well described by the noble lord (the son of a man for whom he had ever entertained the greatest respect) to be, the taking away from all men, dignity and morality in life, and depriving them of hope and consolation in death. Such a system went to brutalize the human mind. Why were the men who made the most conspicuous figure during the reign of terror in the French revolution, worse than those who appeared in the civil war in this country? Because amongst the latter there was ever a sense of religion; at all events, if they did not cherish it in their hearts, they were obliged to feign a respect for it. That would in any shape, or at any time, be some check on the actions of men. But the French revolution was produced by men who had no religion, and who proudly boasted that they had none—men who blasphemed their God and reviled every thing that was sacred. This was all attributed to the expansion of universal benevolence. But what was the effect of this horrible system? It brutalized the minds of the French nation—it deluged their country in blood—and produced scenes that filled the soul with horror. He, therefore, was not one of those who looked to these preservative measures—for so he would call them,—as calculated to lead to despotism. He would again assert, that, if ever this country arrived at such a melancholy situation, it would be effected by brutalizing the feelings of the people, by driving from their minds all those principles of morality and religion by which the state was upheld, and the absence of which must produce disorders and tumults that would inevitably end in the ruin of all that was dear to them as men and christians. He therefore thought that the whole question, both with respect to this and the other bills, turned on this point—whether the description of the disorders which prevailed in the country was false. If it was the remedy of those imaginary evils must fall to the ground; but if it was true, then no man could contemplate it without feeling a strong desire for the enactment of measures that might correct so alarming a state of things.—He now came to the question of the principle of the bill before the House, as this was the stage to consider its principle. The bill, then, proceeded on an idea that the law as it at present stood was not sufficient of itself to repress blasphemous and seditious libels, and it therefore enacted more severe penalties. It introduced a new kind of punishment for the offence, by subjecting the offender, on a second conviction, to banishment or transportation at the discretion of the judge. The noble earl had strongly objected to the discretionary power to judges; and he concurred with him so far as to admit, that when possible law ought to be so precise as to allow no discretion in the court by which it was administered. But in the case of libel this discretion had always existed. His noble and learned friend on the woolsack had shown that the judges always exercised in such cases a discretionary power, and that not long ago that discretion was more extensive than it would be made by the present bill. It had been said by the noble earl, that a seditious libel was an indefinite offence. He agreed that it was, and on that description founded the justification of the discretionary power intrusted to the judges. But the noble earl had mistaken his noble and learned friend on the woolsack. His noble and learned friend had not contended for larger discretionary powers in courts of justice; he had only mentioned that formerly, before the abolition of the ignominious punishment of the pillory in cases of misdemeanor, the punishment to which seditious libels were subjected was more revolting than that now proposed. A judge could at that time award fine to any amount, imprisonment to any duration, and, in addition to both, the punishment of the pillory. The latter was abolished by a bill introduced into the other House by an hon. and learned gentleman; and when it was brought to this House, he (lord Liverpool) concurred in its provisions, with an amendment which he proposed, and which was carried, still continuing the punishment of the pillory in cases of convictions for perjury. In that state it passed the House, and became a law. But how stood the case of a man convicted of libel before this bill was passed? He might not only be fined and imprisoned, but, in addition, be put in the pillory, and that not only for a seditious and blasphemous libel, but for any libel, and that, too, for the first offence; yet, when such a severe law existed, there were no complaints uttered that the liberty of the press was destroyed—that no freedom of publication existed. In his idea, the pillory was a very inappropriate punishment for libel; but was it on this account never inflicted? Yes, it was. He had himself seen a person punished with pillory for a libel. The law therefore awarded a more degrading punishment at that time than was proposed by the present bill, whose severity was so much complained of. The noble earl had adverted to former times, and had said that in those times, even when the country was in the greatest danger of civil commotion, laws were passed, not contracting but extending the liberty of the subject. The noble earl had particularly referred to the reign of William 3rd. Did the noble earl recollect how frequently the Habeas Corpus act was suspended in that reign. He (lord Liverpool) allowed that a very important statute respecting treason had been adopted in that reign by the legislature. He would not enter into any detailed investigation of the circumstances which led to that proceeding. But it was well known that the complicated and intricate occurrences of those days, rendered it very intelligible why the different parties into which the kingdom was divided, were desirous that such a favourable law should pass. The fact was, that every age had its own dangers, and that every age must meet them with its own remedy. Whatever might be the dangers in the time of William, they were very different from those at present existing. At that period, the contest related to a sovereign with a disputed title to the throne; at present, the contest was of a very different character and principle. But he had already stated to their lordships in what he considered the present danger to exist; and he left it to them to determine whether the measure under their consideration was not indispensable to avert it.—In the course of the debate much had been said of the way in which it was probable the bill would operate on juries. He assured the House that he was always disposed to speak with great caution and reserve and respect, of the decisions of juries; at the same time, he could not admit that, of the decisions of the juries, which he was not prepared to admit, of the decisions of their lordships, or of the House of Commons. He could not admit that they were infallible: twelve men, however honest, might possibly be influenced by prejudice or passion; and he could not admit, that if in the fair estimate of an honourable man's mind, he came to a decision different from that of a jury, that he was precluded from saying so. He would not enter into the circumstances of the acquittal which had that night been alluded to: he would not pronounce it to be right or wrong. But this he would say—that, whether right or wrong, it materially aggravated the existing evil. That evil, however, would not have been so great as it proved to be, had it not been followed up by subscriptions, to which, he was sorry to say, some very respectable persons were induced (by motives which he could not pretend to fathom) to contribute. To him this appeared to be a seriously unwarrantable transaction.—To revert, however, to the subject immediately before their lordships. His opinion was, that if the proposed bill was adopted by the legislature, it would have a great effect—not in preventing people from writing or publishing libels—for a much severer punishment than that which the bill contemplated, would not have that effect—but in making persons feel that a second offence might subject them to a severe punishment, and by rendering them consequently cautious.—When noble lords talked of their apprehension of arbitrary power, they should consider how much of late years the constituted authorities of the country had lost in respect. By some this had been attributed to what was called the corruption of the House of Commons. But could those who said so seriously consider such a cause as adequate to the production of such an effect? Let their lordships look at the bench of justice. All parties united in admiration of the conduct of the judges. From the accession of the present family to the throne, the judges, with perhaps not a single exception, had all proved themselves to be men of honourable and independent minds. So they were universally held to be at present. But did not their lordships observe the anti-judicial spirit that prevailed? Did they not observe, not only in the person brought before the highest tribunals for the most dangerous crimes, but in the audience, a special defiance of the jurisdiction of the country? Was that to be ascribed to the corruption of the House of Commons? Had that its root in the misconduct of ministers? Did it even proceed from compassion to the individual, in whose conduct no circumstance of aggravation was wanting? Who could observe that species of defiance of law and authority, and not say, that over that law and that authority it was the duty of parliament to throw a shield? Under all these circumstances, he was persuaded that, although discretion should be avoided if unnecessary, it was in the case of such a serious offence as that in question, but fair, just, equitable and expedient to vest a certain discretion in the courts of justice;—a discretion which there could be no apprehension would be abused; and which might enable those courts, in particular instances, to adopt proceedings eminently conducive to the public good.

The Earl of Carnarvon said, that the whole system of measures now proposed to parliament, appeared to him uncalled for and unjustifiable in the present state of their lordships information. The ministers of the Crown had told the House, that distress was the cause of the present danger, and that they expected that that distress would be merely temporary; but, they were to meet that temporary danger and distress, by permanent restrictions upon liberty. His objection to them was, that the ministers of the Crown, did not meet the difficulties of the country with appropriate remedies. When they called for new powers, they ought to have shown that they required them to answer the emergency. If they had dreaded to disclose their information, they might have said so, and called for the temporary confidence of parliament. If they had come down to that House, and stated upon their honour, that they had information which made measures of safety necessary, without being able fully to disclose that information, he would have been the first to grant them those powers; but he would not agree to alter permanently the constitution of the country on such facts and allegations as appeared in the papers on the table. To the present bill, as a permanent measure, he could not give his sanction, and he would move in the committee, that it be restricted to a short period. The law of libel was indefinite; any thing might be considered a seditious libel which included a censure, not legal, on the character and conduct of the servants of the Crown; and every such censure was not legal, except when uttered in his place by a member of either House. A letter put into the post-office, reflecting upon the conduct of ministers, and given up to the public prosecutor, might be considered a seditious libel; and, on a second conviction for a similar letter, the author would render himself liable to transportation. Was this a punishment suitable to such an offence or such an offender? Did not this law, therefore, destroy a great portion of our liberties, and, if rendered permanent, would their lordships not be accused of delivering the constitution impaired to their posterity? Nay, even a speech spoken in parliament, and reported to the world, might be construed into a libel, and the publisher, on conviction for a second offence, might be transported to Botany Bay. Would not this stop all discussion on the conduct of government, and prevent any strictures on the characters or measures of ministers, both in and out of parliament? For several years government had allowed seditious and blasphemous libels to pass with impunity. They had not put in force the existing law against them; and, having been guilty of this remissness, they suddenly called upon parliament to furnish the means of punishing libels with tenfold severity. He must vote against the present bill, although he was not, in principle, opposed to all the measures that had been introduced; some of which, at least, if enacted for a time, might be very expedient. But, affecting, as this measure did, that most valuable privilege, the liberty of the press, it should meet with his decided opposition.

The Earl of Blessington said, that before ministers visited seditious libels with such severity, they should define what seditious libels were. A noble lord had said, that any person who gave an opinion against the conduct of ministers, lent his weight to the disaffected. A peer of parliament, according to this doctrine, in discharging his duty, and fairly stating his sentiments, might, by the present bill, render himself liable to transportation. Until, therefore, he heard that it was not intended to be a permanent measure, it must have his decided opposition; and, until he heard from the noble secretary of state propositions for conciliating the people as well as coercing them, he must oppose all the measures that had been recommended by government. Anxious as he was to see the Prince Regent enthroned, as he deserved to be, in the hearts of the subject, he must again and again vote for an inquiry into the state of the country; in the hope, that at last, parliament would show the country, not only that they would protect the just rights of his majesty's peaceable subjects, but that by soothing measures (which alone ought, in his opinion, to be adopted) they would silence the general expression of discontent.

The Duke of Sussex begged to be allowed to make a few observations, in consequence of what had fallen from a noble earl on the subject of the education of the lower orders of society. He was quite sure that the noble earl did not mean any personal imputation. But, being so much concerned as he was with others, in the superintendence of the education of the poor, he felt himself called upon to defend the system of schools which had been assailed—namely, the Lancasterian system. It was a system founded on the strictest principle of religion and morality. He could vouch for one particular fact, namely, that although children of different sects were admitted into the Lancasterian schools, every Monday morning they were examined to ascertain whether or not they had been to some place of worship or other; and when it was found that that had been neglected three times, the child was dismissed. There could be no doubt that these institutions led to the increase of knowledge; and that, in fact, knowledge among the lower orders was increasing ten-fold, aye, a hundred-fold, every year. He had already told his majesty's ministers that he agreed to a part of their propositions. As to that under their lordships consideration, he protested against it in toto. He would tell them openly, candidly, and manfully, why. On an examination of the papers on the table, he saw that ministers were not ignorant of the state of the country, when parliament was prorogued in July last. If so, he put it to their lordships, whether it was consistent with the public tranquillity to allow them to separate? Referring also, to the various public libels which for so many years had remained unprosecuted, he maintained that ministers had not proved that they had made any one attempt to punish a libeller which had not succeeded. Until he was convinced that they had undertaken all they might have undertaken, he would resist additional powers. If the present grievance was attributable to the neglect of government, in the use of the powers already in their possession, he was the last man who would encourage neglect by granting an increase of power. He had stated his opinion on the present as he had done on other questions, with deference, and he trusted with the courtesy which was due from one nobleman to another.

The bill was then read a second time.

PROTEST AGAINST THE SECOND READING OF THE BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL.] The following Protest was entered on the Journals :

"Dissentient,

"Because we believe, that by a seasonable exertion of the laws, as they at present exist, the Press cannot be abused to any bad purpose, without incurring a suitable punishment.

"Because any extension of the power of punishment now vested in the Courts of Law, with respect to cases of Libel, appears to us, therefore, to be unnecessary.

"Because the offence of publishing a Libel is, more than any other that is known to our law, undefined and uncertain. Publications which at one time may be considered innocent and even laudable, may at another, according to circumstances, and the different views of Public Accusers, of Judges and of Juries, be thought deserving of punishment; and thus the author or publisher of any writing, dictated by the purest intentions, on a matter of public interest, without any example to warn, any definition to instruct, or any authority to guide him, may expose himself to the penalty of being "banished from the United Kingdom, and all other parts of his Majesty's dominions, for such term as the Court, in which such conviction shall take place, shall order; or be transported to such place as shall be appointed by his Majesty for the transportation of offenders, for any term not exceeding seven years."

"Because the fear of being subjected to the punishment of a common felon, thus suspended over the head of any person who may have been once convicted of publishing a libel, to which mere inadvertence may subject him, and against which no degree of caution can afford him complete security, must necessarily deter him from the fearless exercise of the right, which has hitherto been the proud prerogative of Englishmen, of freely discussing public measures, and endeavouring to warn his countrymen against the dangerous encroachments of power.

"Because this Bill, therefore, so inconsistent with the policy of our law, and with the practice of our ancestors, appears to us to be a most dangerous invasion of the just freedom of the Press, and to be subversive, in one of their main defences, of the rights, and liberties which were secured to us by progressive struggles through a long succession of ages, and at length asserted, declared, and as we had fondly hoped, firmly established for ever, by the Revolution of 1688.

SEIZURE OF ARMS BILL.] The bill went through a committee. On the question, that the report be received, ;

Earl Grey rose to express his sentiments upon the bill. He objected to it not only as it stood part of an obnoxious system, but as being in itself uncalled for and dangerous. It conferred upon the magistrate a power of breaking open houses by night or by day—a power which was liable to great abuse, and which might be dangerous in the execution of the means employed to carry it into effect, while it would be perfectly inefficient for the purpose for which it was intended. He objected to it likewise in principle. It was a principle of the law of England, asserted and declared in the Bill of Rights, that every man was entitled to the possession of his arms, not only for defence against the assassin or the midnight robber, but to enforce his constitutional right of resistance to oppression, if deprived of the benefit of the laws. He was anxious to express this constitutional view, as that right had been asserted and recognized at the period of the Revolution, and had been too much lost sight of since. He could not, therefore, surrender it, without the most urgent necessity; and he saw no grounds of necessity established. It had, indeed, been said, that arms had been provided for the purposes of insurrection and rebellion; but the papers on the table, which contained the only information on which he could proceed, stated nothing precise or satisfactory on the subject. Where any thing specific was stated, he found that it related to a few pikes, which had been fabricated at the desire of the persons who gave the information. On such a ground he could not surrender an essential right of Englishmen. But the scanty statements contained in the papers had been attempted to be completed by the accounts that were heard in the House. Arms, to an extraordinary extent, were said to be made and distributed in the part of the country with which he was connected; and a near and dear relative of his, it was added, had been obliged to leave his home from the fear of an armed insurrection, and to retire with his family to Newcastle, as a place of safety. That his relative had left his home he could not deny; whether from a misconceived alarm, would best appear from what he had to state. His relative had since written him a letter in which he said that the alarm was false; that the reports of the state of the country were exaggerated; but that he did not feel himself justified in neglecting to take the step that he had taken from affection to his family, whose wishes he was obliged to consult. That the principles of reform were widely diffused in that country, he could not deny: that the Radical Reformers were numerous, he believed; that their attempts to carry Radical Reform into execution would be zealous, he likewise believed; and that they had divided themselves, as had been represented, into different sections, for the purpose of receiving information and communicating with each other, was also true. The numbers were differently stated; but that they were very numerous, was a fact from which he could not withhold his belief. Admitting all this, however, he was prepared to say that much exaggeration had prevailed on the subject. The House had been told that a meeting took place at Newcastle, which was attended by 30,000 people; but the whole population of the place did not consist of more than 28,000. Allowing for the numbers that came from Shields and other places, he had been informed, that not more than 7,000 or 8,000 attended the meeting, and that they dispersed without the least disturbance. The noble duke (of Northumberland) had spoken much about arms the other day. Now with respect to arms, it ought to be recollected, that great numbers of people in the neighbourhood of Newcastle, possessed arms, without any reference to the purposes of insurrection; that many of them had received them during the war, and had retained them afterwards. But that any arms had been made for present purposes he was enabled to deny. With respect to the number of men prepared for insurrection, it had been said by a noble duke, that 100,000 were ready to rise in arms between the Weir and the Tyne; but the whole population of Northumberland and Durham would not furnish 100,000 adult males. This was a proof of the great exaggerations that had gone abroad. He did not wish to deceive their lordships; he believed that reform was demanded by a great body of the people—not by the poor and the distressed alone, but by the middle classes of society, possessed of competence, disposed to industry, and capable of discussing public measures. He would entreat their lordships, therefore, to consider, whether measures similar to the present were likely these designs; nay, during two formidable rebellions in 1715 and 1745, no such power was granted to the crown; yet the new line of succession was defended, and our free constitution successfully maintained against all these dangers. The principles of the Revolution had been too firmly imprinted in the hearts and minds of our ancestors, to allow them, on the spur of any emergency, however alarming, to hazard the existence of a right which they had so recently asserted.

“Because this law is, in its very nature, peculiarly liable to abuse. Interest, credulity, malevolence, revenge, party violence, and indiscreet zeal, may, equally with a sense of duty, contribute to call it into action; and the powers given for its execution, of breaking, either by day or night, into any house or place where information may have been received that arms are kept for illegal purposes, must unavoidably expose the persons and property of his majesty's subjects to injury and violence, which cannot be sufficiently guarded against by the provisions made in the bill for that purpose. This is not a mere apprehension. Experience proves that such effects may be expected from it. In Ireland, it is well known, nothing more contributed to irritate the people, and to provoke acts of private resentment and revenge, than the abuses which took place, and particularly the insults which were offered to women, in the exercise of a similar power.

“Because we further object to the enactments of this law, as part of a system which, in a season of unexampled distress and misery, rejecting every proposition for conciliation or concession, rests on force alone for the suppression of the prevailing discontents, and is calculated to give additional weight to an opinion, already too generally entertained, that parliament is more ready to presume against the people, and to enact laws for their restraint, than to attend to their just complaints, and to afford them that protection which they have a right to claim against every species of injustice and oppression.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

COVENTRY MEETING—PETITION OF MR. LEWIS RELATIVE THERETO.] Mr. Peter Moore, presented a petition from Mr. W. G. Lewis, of Coventry, complaining of the interruption which had been recently given to a public meeting held in that town. The petition stated that a requisition, signed by six or seven hundred resident householders of Coventry, had been presented to the magistrates, desiring them to convene a public meeting for the purpose of taking into consideration the melancholy events which had occurred at Manchester. The mayor objected to the manner in which the requisition was worded, and refused to call a meeting for such a purpose. In consequence of this refusal, the requisitionists called a meeting on their own authority, and the mayor then objected to the place. Determined to avoid giving the constituted authorities any just ground of reproach, the requisitionists changed the place on which they originally intended to have held their meeting, to a green at some distance from the town, whereby they deemed it impossible for them to disturb the peace of the town. After all this caution had been exhibited on their part, they had not the slightest anticipation that any attempt would be made to interrupt their proceedings; but, to their great surprise, in the midst of them, a body of constables burst in, and endeavoured to destroy the harmony of the meeting. It appeared that the constables were not authorized by the mayor to make this interruption, but were merely sworn in to act if necessary. The hon. member said, he was at a loss to conceive why it was thought necessary to interrupt this legal meeting of the people. No doubt could be entertained of the loyal and orderly conduct of the people of Coventry. He had, in the course of the last session, occasion to present to the House a certificate from the mayor and magistrates of Coventry, bearing their testimony to the loyalty of the inhabitants. The petition, he said, prayed for an inquiry into the causes of the dispersion of that meeting, but after an inquiry had been refused in the case of Manchester, he had little hopes of having it granted in this.

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

respect to what had been said of the state of the country between Newcastle and Carlisle, he could give no opinion, as he was not so well acquainted with that part of the country. No doubt the noble duke who had made that statement would explain it. He trusted their lordships would believe, that in the part which he took on this occasion, he was actuated by no other motives than a sincere feeling for the state of the country. His sole wish was to co-operate with those who exerted themselves for the safety of the state. God forbid that, to use the words of the poet, it should be said, "Si mens non leva fuisset Anglia nunc staret."

The Duke of Northumberland had been informed by those who were convinced of the fact, that there were 100,000 men ready to act between Newcastle and Carlisle, and that arms to a considerable extent had been purchased by different individuals.

Earl Grey said, in explanation, that there was no man who had a greater objection to the radicals than he had, but yet he must have regular proof before he could believe that there was any dangerous plan afloat to subvert the constitution of the country.

The Earl of Darnley said, that during the discussion of the bill, he had more than once expressed his dissent from the clause which authorised the searching for arms "by night." He had admitted, that in the present state of the country, some measures of security were necessary, but he must still protest against the clause, and he thought he was so well understood by their lordships, that when the clause to which he alluded was read, his amendment that it should be expunged would have been discussed. It was with surprise he now heard all the proposed alterations gone through, but still the clause to which he alluded remained part of the bill. He would not undertake to say, that the clause had been read distinctly, but it certainly was not read with an audible voice; At least he did not hear it. He should therefore now press his previously intended amendment, that the clause authorising search for arms by night be omitted.

Lord Sidmouth said, that the noble lord was mistaken as to the manner in which the bill had been read. It had been done in an audible voice, and seemed to have been perfectly understood by their lordships. The amendment of the noble lord could not be pressed now, the bill having been already perfected in its present stage. The noble lord, however, might move his amendment on the third reading to-morrow.

The Lord Chancellor said, that as far as he could judge, the clause to which the noble lord alluded, had been read in an audible voice. His lordship, however, had still the opportunity left him that was suggested by the noble secretary of state, of moving his amendment upon another occasion.

The report was then agreed to.

PROTEST AGAINST THE SEIZURE OF ARMS BILL.] The following Protest against the bill was entered on the Journals:

"Dissentient,

"Because the right of having arms for their defence, suitable to their condition and degree, is secured to British subjects by the ancient laws of these realms, is declared to be so by the Bill of Rights, and is, in the words of Mr. Justice Blackstone, "a public allowance of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression.

"Because no sufficient evidence has been laid before the House to prove 'that arms and weapons of various sorts have in various parts of the kingdom been 'collected, and are kept for purposes dangerous to the public peace.' We doubt the fact, and we distrust the remedy. If arms have really been procured for such illegal purposes, the persons engaged in these criminal designs, will have had ample notice, before this bill can pass, to remove them to places of concealment. Whilst this power, therefore, is likely to be in a great degree inefficient with respect to its professed object, it is liable to be most imperiously and vexatiously used, in cases where arms may have been provided and kept for the legitimate purposes of self-defence.

"Because in former periods of much greater danger to the crown and constitution of these realms, when conspiracies by the adherents of the house of Stuart were known to be directed against both; when preparations were making for rebellion with the assistance of France; when men of the highest rank, station, and influence in both kingdoms were deeply engaged in

untainted with their doctrines? And, considering the delay which would be necessarily incurred in gaining a proclamation of the council, would it be right to give them so much time during which they might circulate their notions with impunity? He, therefore, thought that the House would not be consulting either the interest, security, or tranquillity of the country, if they did not give to this bill a general operation. As to the policy of rendering this measure one of temporary duration, he had previously stated to the House his impression; and he was now, on further reflection, convinced of the propriety of it, because it was expedient to deprive all future meetings of the tumultuous and menacing character which they at present possessed. He had, however, no objection to pass this bill under restrictions similar to those which the House had adopted upon former occasions. When the Grenville act was passed for the decision of controverted elections, parliament was fully aware of the necessity which existed for enacting some permanent law on that subject; it did not, however, at once determine that the Grenville act should be that law, but passed it for seven years, in order that the country might have full experience of its efficacy before it was entered as a permanent act upon the statute-book. It was to such a view of the question that he had now bent his judgment. A right hon. gentleman opposite had said, that he should certainly move, that this measure should only be of temporary duration.

Mr. Tierney begged leave to correct the noble lord. He had only said, that he would make a motion to that effect, if no other member in the House was found willing to do it.

Lord Castlereagh trusted, that if either the right hon. gentleman or any other hon. member proposed an amendment to that effect, they would not limit the duration of the measure in question to too short a time; for he could assure them, that nothing would, in his opinion, be more prejudicial to the safety of the country, than to pass such a bill for an inadequate period. At the same time he would candidly inform them, that if the period which they proposed appeared to him sufficiently long, he would not object to their amendment. What he conceived ought to be the shortest period was five years, and to the end of the session of parliament ensuing immediately after their expiration. If, therefore, they should propose that period, he would acquiesce in the proposal; if they fixed on a shorter period, he should as certainly oppose it. At all events, it was his determination to take the sense of the House on the propriety of rendering the measure of a general nature; neither should he submit to limiting its duration to a less period than five years, unless he was compelled to do so by finding a majority of the House entertaining a different opinion from his own. He then moved, that the bill should be re-committed.

Colonel Beaumont maintained, that a measure of this nature ought not to be passed for so long a period as five years, but from one session to six weeks after the commencement of the ensuing session, till the danger which called for it ceased to exist. The hon. member was proceeding, when he was called to order by

The Speaker, who informed him, that if he had any alteration to propose in the bill, it must be either done in the committee, or by a mandatory instruction of the House to the committee, to take such alteration into their consideration.

Mr. Tierney thought that the most solemn course which the House could adopt would be to give mandatory instructions to the committee to limit the duration of the measure either to five years, or any other period which they might think proper to appoint.

Lord Castlereagh said, that if the instructions to the committee were of a general nature, he should not oppose them: if they were specific, he should oppose, or amend, or agree to them, as he should think good, after they were proposed to the House.

Mr. Curwen said, it was now clear to the House, that the noble lord found the bill itself so faulty, that he was obliged to propose very material alterations in it. He hoped the noble lord would proceed in the same way, and would make alterations still more important. He did not think the measure was called for by the state of the public mind; he did not think the power or the influence of those who called themselves the leaders of the radical reformers, was at all of the nature that had been represented; he acknowledged, however, that it was both important and desirable that those persons should be put down; they should not exist in a well-regulated government. He would gladly

REFORM IN PARLIAMENT.] Mr. Lambton rose to inform the House, that it was his intention, immediately after the Christmas recess, to bring the state of the representation under their notice. In order to explain the object which he had in view, he thought fit to state, that he should then move for leave to bring in a bill for the repeal of the Septennial act, and for the making of parliaments shorter and more frequent. At the same time he should propose the extension of the right of suffrage to all copyholders and householders paying direct taxes, and also the destruction of what were generally called the rotten-boroughs. In bringing the subject of parliamentary reform before the House, it might, perhaps, be requisite that he should explain his motives: he, therefore, made no hesitation in saying, that he did it because he deemed it a subject in which all classes of his majesty's subjects, and particularly the middling and lower classes, were most deeply interested; and because he firmly believed that the compliance of the House with the feelings of the people on it, would tend more than any other measure to alleviate the present disturbances, at the result of which, if they were to be permanent, no man could look for a moment without experiencing the profoundest horror.

· SEDITIOUS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] Lord Castlereagh, on moving the order of the day for the recommitment of this bill, thought it requisite to state to the House, before it went into the committee, certain alterations which he had made in the bill, and which he conceived might vary the opinions which certain hon. gentlemen had formed upon it. The necessity of the first alteration which he should mention to them was suggested by the consideration that the bill, as at present constituted, would affect certain meetings which were now held, and which had no relation whatever to either church or state. As the scope and object of this bill was not to suppress discussion, but merely to put down those large and tumultuous meetings which had of late so frequently menaced the public tranquillity, he had excepted from the operation of it the meetings held by the different trades, in order to consider any public matter of grievance affecting their interests. He had once thought of limiting the numbers attending such meetings; but as there was nothing on which it was so difficult to legislate as numbers, he should, instead of making any fixed number, as 300, the limit beyond which it would be improper to pass, say, that all their meetings that were held in private rooms and not in the open air were untouched by the present bill. With regard to that part of the bill which rendered it a misdemeanor for any person to attend a meeting who was not a freeholder, householder, or inhabitant of the district in which the meeting was held, it had been suggested to him, that a person might be accidentally there, and thus violate the law without intending it; he, therefore, submitted to the House, whether it would not be enough to make this clause apply only to those who wilfully and knowingly attended such meetings, and who refused to depart, after the proclamation for strangers to disperse had been read by the magistrates. Another case had also been put to him, that strangers might be purposely sent there; were they to be excepted from this act? By no means; if they remained after proclamation made, the parishioners might constitute themselves into constables, and carry before a police magistrate any person so staying there. It had also been thrown out, that persons having property in one parish, and yet residing in another, should be allowed to attend at the meetings of those parishes in which they had property: he had no objection to such a proposal, and therefore would allow them to attend, if their freehold reached a certain stipulated amount, and had been in their possession a certain stipulated time. He had now stated the principal alterations which were to be made in the bill, and would not detain the House any longer, than to say a few words on what had fallen from hon. members opposite, namely—that it ought to be a local and temporary measure. If it was to be made local and temporary, it would be better to entitle it a bill for propagating tumult and sedition; for if it were confined to certain counties, and was not to be extended beyond them, without either a proclamation of the council, or a recommendation of the lord-lieutenant and magistracy, could any person, who had viewed how little the radicals and their itinerant orators thought of marching twenty or five-and-twenty miles, doubt for a moment that they would transfer their meetings from the counties included in the act, to counties which were yet

untainted with their doctrines? And, considering the delay which would be necessarily incurred in gaining a proclamation of the council, would it be right to give them so much time during which they might circulate their notions with impunity? He, therefore, thought that the House would not be consulting either the interest, security, or tranquillity of the country, if they did not give to this bill a general operation. As to the policy of rendering this measure one of temporary duration, he had previously stated to the House his impression; and he was now, on further reflection, convinced of the propriety of it, because it was expedient to deprive all future meetings of the tumultuous and menacing character which they at present possessed. It was to such a view of the question that he had now bent his judgment. A right hon. gentleman opposite had said, that he should certainly move, that this measure should only be of temporary duration.

Mr. Tierney begged leave to correct the noble lord. He had only said, that he would make a motion to that effect, if no other member in the House was found willing to do it.

Lord Castlereagh trusted, that if either the right hon. gentleman or any other hon. member proposed an amendment to that effect, they would not limit the duration of the measure in question to too short a time; for he could assure them, that nothing would, in his opinion, be more prejudicial to the safety of the country, than to pass such a bill for an inadequate period. Colonel Beaumont maintained, that a measure of this nature ought not to be passed for so long a period as five years, but from one session to six weeks after the commencement of the ensuing session, till the danger which called for it ceased to exist. The hon. member was proceeding, when he was called to order by

Mr. Curwen said, it was now clear to the House, that the noble lord found the bill itself so faulty, that he was obliged to propose very material alterations in it. He hoped the noble lord would proceed in the same way, and would make alterations still more important. He did not think the measure was called for by the state of the public mind; he did not think the power or the influence of those who called themselves the leaders of the radical reformers, was at all of the nature that had been represented; he acknowledged, however, that it was both important and desirable that those persons should be put down; they should not exist in a well-regulated government. He would gladly lend his support to measures for their suppression. The bill before them would not effect that object—it would not put down the radicals; it would not accomplish the objects it had in view. He was convinced that if the noble lord had expressed in that House a favourable opinion of reform, the radical leaders, who were objects of contempt and abhorrence, would feel most affected and distressed at that declaration. The noble lord had admitted that the great body of the people were sound in their principles; why, then, should he innovate on the rights of the whole people—why should he introduce a measure which went to impair the constitution? This, he feared, was but the beginning of a system which might be carried further, to the injury and misfortune of the country. Why did not the noble lord apply those measures, which, under alarming circumstances, were found effective in other parts of the empire? In Ireland the Insurrection act gave power to the magistrates to prevent all meetings; he thought such an act preferable to the present measure. The noble lord had stated, on a former occasion, that he was anxious to conciliate the country. If he was sincere, he had now the opportunity; but that object was to be gained by measures far different from those which ministers pursued. He could not but complain of an attempt made by gentlemen from the treasury bench to implicate the opposition side of the House with the radicals. Such conduct he considered extremely unparliamentary and unfair. He could not but disapprove of the conduct of the right hon. member for Liverpool, not now in his place. He had made exaggerated statements of the public situation, which he (Mr. Curwen) could not agree to. As to the conduct of the magistrates of Manchester, he never did believe they had been guilty of the great cruelties imputed to them; but he did believe they had been guilty of great rashness and indiscretion. The noble lord had spoken the other night of the jealousy and discontent of the disaffected, and of the leaders of the reformers; but did he think that jealousy and discontent were confined to these? He could assure the noble lord, that a great proportion of the people—of the loyal and respectable people—were extremely jealous of the measures of ministers—that they doubt very much of the noble lord's veneration for the constitution, or regard for the liberties of the people. The noble lord could not doubt but that this was the real feeling of the country. Those measures had sunk deep into the public heart. Many late measures, indeed, had disgusted the country; particularly, he would say, the act of Indemnity which had passed that House—an act which was opposed to the principles of justice—which deprived individuals of redress, whose liberties and whose fortunes were invaded, and who were deprived of all means of vindicating their innocence, if they were innocent. He disliked, he said, the principle of the present bill; yet if it were limited to one year, he would support it. He would wish for a measure more intelligible—he would prefer a bill similar to the Irish Insurrection act, which would give power to the magistrates to prevent all meetings, if they thought necessary. He would give them that power for a limited time; because no one who knew the magistrates of this country could suppose that they would exercise that power unjustly. He repeated, that the danger of government was not most to be apprehended from visionary men—there was a danger of greater magnitude. The best informed, the most respectable were of opinion, that there was a power operating on that House, which did not make it the provident and faithful guardian of the public purse. They desired reform—it was expected speedily—and if the House did not grant it, he feared it would be reformed in a manner which no rational or moderate man would wish. He should lament to see any reform which would go to overturn the constitution. Distress was one of the great sources of the public discontent—distress created by taxation. This distress, no bill, no measure of coercion, would mitigate. It was impossible to continue their manufactures to the extent that they had been carried on. They should look to other sources of prosperity, besides the sources of foreign markets. When he heard the assertion of the noble lord, with respect to the distress of this country as originating from the distress of America, he was astonished. He was satisfied the noble lord would not assert what he did not think was true, but it only proved that the noble lord had not paid that attention to the real situation of the country which he ought to have paid when he made that statement. We had practised on foreign countries an un-mixed system of monopoly; but they would now practise that system against us which we had practised against them. As an evidence of this disposition, he would mention, that when government laid a duty on rape seed, the Dutch imposed a duty on rape cake, which prevented its importation into this country. If the noble lord would look into the real situation of the country, he would find that her whole resources did not exceed three hundred millions, whilst her taxes amounted to sixty millions. In such a state of things, great alterations were necessary—much of reform—much of conciliation and of wisdom to save her. The bill before the House was evidently drawn up in a hasty manner. He would state one clause of it. A person subject to the penalties of the bill was liable to be brought immediately before the judges of assize or of sessions, to be put upon his trial; he was entirely to depend upon the favour of the judge for an opportunity to produce his witnesses, and to prepare his defence. He had no doubt what the feelings of the judges would be, remarkable as they were for a tender and a pure regard for the liberties of the subject; but he asked, was this a situation in which persons charged with an offence against law should be placed. It was desirable that the executive government should have the confidence of the people, yet he felt it his duty to state, that he believed the executive had not that confidence, and that the measure before the House was not one which was likely to obtain it.

Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald expressed his satisfaction at what had fallen from the noble lord, and entirely concurred in the alterations suggested. He concurred also in the principle of the bill immediately before the House: in Ireland it had been carried into execution with effect, and without danger, though he could not persuade himself that it could be made local in Great Britain without an increase of the peril it was intended to diminish. One of the amendments of the noble lord he particularly approved, as without it the Catholics of Ireland would not have been able to assemble and approach the throne by petition. This change proved that it was not the design of ministers to interfere with the exercise of legitimate rights that did not endanger the security of the country. He might safely assert, that in no instance, for many years, had the meetings of the Catholics been attended with a display of popular strength, or any attempt to intimidate the government. In Ireland, the meetings of the Catholics had invariably been under cover generally in some of their places of worship; and if the amendment of the noble lord did not precisely meet that case, it could be more distinctly worded in the committee.

Sir Robert Wilson felt himself called upon to resist the principle of the bill, and the aggregate system of measures that were now to be imposed upon the country. He had had frequent opportunities of hearing them defended, but never successfully; and it was his conviction, from a strong sense of what was due to the good of his country, that the series of bills recently brought into parliament ought to subject the noble lord to articles of impeachment [Hear]. He repeated, that they ought to subject the noble lord to articles of impeachment, for they introduced capital innovations—they introduced arbitrary power, and subverted the real elements of the constitution. His object was not to use inflammatory language, not to excite feeling out of doors. This was a crisis when every member was bound to express his conviction strongly, that he might not aid and abet in the ruin of his country. The condition to which it was now reduced had been occasioned by mis-rule, by a total inattention to the views and wishes of the people; by a refusal to listen to their complaints and to redress their wrongs. This denial of justice, this determination not to listen but to proceed in the same wild career of extravagance, was heaping coals of fire on the heads of the people—pouring oil of vitriol into their angry wounds. The noble lord had taken credit to himself for lenity in these measures, inasmuch as he had not subjected to the penalty of death any person who persisted in remaining at a parochial meeting, though it had no riotous or tumultuous character, excepting what he derived from the presence of that individual; but he would assert that if this system was persevered in—if the government of the law was to be converted into a government of force—if tyranny was to be established on the ruins of liberty, he cared little who were to be the ministers of the Crown, or whether he himself was to be one of the first or the last of their victims. He would never relinquish the course he was pursuing; and he trusted that the people would never abandon the rights to which they were born. “Ad decus, ad libertatem, nati sumus; aut hæc teneamus, aut cum dignitate moriemur." With regard to the particular bills, he must observe that training and drilling was already an offence, and he admitted that government was bound to protect itself; but he entreated the House to look at the bill for seizing arms, for seizing them by night as well as by day, under which any individual, with whatever motive might make a deposition before a magistrate, and procure the house, the castle of a man to be broken open and entered at midnight. Suppose the constable, armed with his authority, came for the purpose, what knowledge had the housekeeper of the warrant? and for defending himself against those he considered the spoilers of his property, he might not only be tried for murder, but for rebellion. Suppose men in military uniform (for every thing was now done by the military) were to come and insist upon admission; the housekeeper, unsuspecting their real purpose, and knowing that he had nothing to fear from a search, might open his door and thus admit those who had availed themselves of this disguise to plunder his house and outrage his family. He begged to read to the House, as a contrast to the present measure, a sentence from a statute passed in the reign of William 3rd, when it was believed that the papists had designs against the peace of the country, and had accordingly provided themselves with weapons of offence. "Any two or more justices of the peace may from time to time, by warrant under their hands and seals, authorize and empower any person or persons in the day time, and with the assistance of a constable, &c. to search for arms." Such was the law in the time of king William; no search could be made but in the day; yet in the year 1819, the power was extended either to the night or day. And what was the excuse for this change—for this invasion of the rights of Englishmen? Truly, nothing, but the tyrant's plea, the plea of Richard 3rd for one of the murders he had committed:

"What! think you we are Turks or Infidels!
Or that we would, against the form of law,
Proceed thus rashly,
But that the extreme peril of the case,
The peace of England, and our person's safety, Enforced us to this execution?"

had very kindly informed the House that he did not mean to abolish the trial by jury. So it appeared; but the very mention of the possibility of such a thing showed that it had at some time or other entered into the contemplation of ministers; and every body knew that the conception of men in power were generally quickly followed by the acts themselves. It had been urged formerly by the noble lord, when the price of the stamp was raised, that it would interfere with the existence of a cheap press? Would not this new law interfere with the existence of a cheap press? Would it not prevent any man, whatever might be his talents, unless he had property also, from conducting a publication of the kind? Besides, it subjected every editor or proprietor of a newspaper to transportation on a second conviction; and men of character would not run the risk of embarking in such a hazardous undertaking. If this step were allowed, others must follow; and we should go on from invasion to invasion, until a writer was reduced to the situation described by the author of Figaro—"Provided I say nothing against the powers that be nothing against religion, politics, or morals—nothing against the court and its vices—against somebody, or any body that may be somebody, I may be at liberty to publish what I please—subject nevertheless to the provisions aforesaid." [A laugh]. He had great respect for the chief body of the clergy; their lives were devoted to their laborious profession, and were examples to the rest of the community; but the church ought not to forget that it was a church of peace and charity, not of war and intolerance; and its ministers ought not to exchange the pastoral staff for the ensigns of magisterial authority; they ought not to be employed in levying war against the people of England. He trusted that gentlemen would take care how they lent their support to such a system as was now attempted to be imposed upon the nation; they ought to recollect that it was most costly—that if persevered in, it must increase the taxes; and that, with the increase of taxes, distress and disaffection would be augmented. Let not gentlemen flatter themselves that the venerable fabric whose foundations were now assailed would last their time; and that if it fell, its ruins would only injure their posterity. Louis 14th had exclaimed, "After me the deluge;" but here danger was at hand; national bankruptcy and revolution would soon open the floodgates of popular fury, and ministers and their adherents would find no ark to which they could fly for shelter. A requisition had been circulated and signed in Southwark, and another was in progress through the whole metropolis; but the noble lord had not allowed time to ascertain the sense of the more distant parts of the country. Supposing he was able to carry his projects through by triumphant majorities, what would the people say, but that the House of Commons did not care for their opinions, or regard their interests? [Some symptoms of impatience by coughing, &c. were here expressed]. He was aware that what he was offering must be very offensive to many gentlemen, but he must do his duty; it would be most of all unpleasant to a certain class of members to whom the noble lord had alluded on a former night, when he contemptuously said, that all the pensions in the list did not amount to the wages of the radicals for a single day. True, but did the noble lord flatter himself that the people would not see through this shallow argument? Were they not fully aware of the importance of abolishing pensions when they saw that it was by virtue of them that the noble lord could come down to the House, not only without the fear of punishment, but with the certainty of triumph, to outrage privileges held sacred from time immemorial, and recognized in the Bill of Rights, the violation of which was an act of suicide on the part of that House, destroying its own power, and annulling the relationship between the people and their representatives. But one mode now remained for saving the people, and that mode was, for independent men of all parties to combine in erecting a constitutional standard, and the motto "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari."

Mr. Grenfell said, that he should not have risen but for the observations of his hon. friend who had just sat down. No person in the House heard the gallant officer with greater satisfaction than he did on any question but a political one: on those matters they were as far divided as the Poles. He had commenced by observing, that the noble lord deserved impeachment for introducing the measures now under consideration: if that impeachment were extended to individuals who heartily concurred with the noble lord, he (Mr. Grenfell) would be happy to bear his share of the crime and the punishment. [Cheers.] The gallant general had further asserted that he was not in the habit of using inflammatory language, either in the House or out of it. Had the memory of the gallant general totally failed him? Had he forgotten what had passed not long ago at a meeting in the borough of Southwark? Had he forgotten the memorable occasion when he shook hands—when he publicly gave the fraternal embrace to Mr. Hunt? [Continued cheers from all sides.] On that occasion, if the reports in the public journals spoke truly, the gallant general had asserted, that England was the most degraded country on the face of the earth. Was not that inflammatory language? Next he had maintained, that the time must arrive when the House must repent of the measures it now thought wise and necessary. If he (Mr. Grenfell) should at any time have occasion to give vent to his useless sorrow at the decision he now felt justified in making, the gallant general would be the last man he should ask to wipe away his unavailing tears. [continued cheers.] He would not follow him through his observations in detail upon the bill, but he would take that opportunity of stating, that if the measure against seditious meetings was limited to any period short of that named by the noble lord, it would be of no benefit, and the object in view would be utterly disappointed.

Sir R. Wilson said, he hoped the House would allow him to say a few words in explanation. He had never known Mr. Hunt before the meeting in Southwark; but he certainly did then give him his hand, because he conceived that he had been greatly injured, and because in Mr. Hunt's person, his own rights, and the rights of all, had been violated. He gave him his hand as a pledge that he would go hand in hand with him, to exert all his efforts as a representative in order to obtain redress. In doing so, he conceived that he did no more than his duty; but he would have felt himself disgraced if he had given his hand to any of those who had their hands stained with the blood of their countrymen, and of those who had sanctioned their conduct.

Mr. V. Blake observed, that he had given all the attention in his power to the gallant knight's arguments, but he entertained a totally different opinion respecting this measure, and others connected with it. He considered them measures for the preservation of the country against the dangers which threatened it. If amputation was necessary for the preservation of the vital parts of the constitution, he should have agreed to it: but he did not think that necessary, nor did he consider these measures as affecting any part of the constitution. Such speeches as were made in that House by the hon. knight and others near him, afforded to the disaffected an opportunity of deluding the distressed. He was perfectly sure that nothing was farther from their intention than to occasion such an evil: but however excellent their hearts might be, their heads appeared not so well suited for public discussion as they thought them. They had convulsed the country with complaints, because of the refusal of that House to institute an inquiry into the events at Manchester. It was extremely ludicrous to see them urging inquiry in such circumstances; for let them only consider in what situation they would be placed if an inquiry were gone into, and that House were to address the Prince Regent, praying that the attorney-general should prosecute certain persons. Without inquiry, criminal informations could be applied for, or bills might be presented to the grand jury, or civil actions might be brought; but if the attorney-general were to prosecute in consequence of the address of that House to the Prince Regent, he must file informations ex officio, and the accused could at once put his hand into his pocket and produce a plea in bar by presenting the letter of thanks. An inquiry would therefore be the surest way to prevent the accused from punishment, if they were guilty.

Mr. Ricardo said, he was anxious very briefly to express his opinion on this subject. He thought that, in the course of this discussion, sufficient attention had not been given to the importance of the right to be curtailed. If the people's right of meeting and petitioning consisted only in the right of meeting to petition for the removal of grievances, it was not of so much importance, and the curtailment of it was not of such serious interest. But the right was, a right of meeting in such numbers, and showing such a front to ministers as would afford a hope that bad measures would be abandoned, and that public opinion would be respected.

(VOL. XLI.)

It might be compared, in this view, with the right of that House to address the Crown. If the right of that House consisted in passing resolutions only, and if they could not follow up their resolutions by refusing the supplies, and by calling up a spirit of resistance in the country, the Crown could despise their interference. It was the same with the right of the people to petition. If they could not meet in such numbers as to make them be respected, their petitions would have no effect. At the same time, he admitted, that those meetings were attended with very great inconvenience. It could not be denied that circumstances might arise when the government should be fairly administered, and yet distress might arise from causes which the government could not control, and wicked and designing men might produce a great degree of mischief; it did not appear to him that such meetings were the sort of check which ought to exist in a well-administered government; but it was necessary to have some check, because if they left men to govern without any control in the people, the consequence would be despotism. The check which he would give, could be established only by a reform of parliament. Then, instead of petitioning, and from the worst part of the people perhaps, being the check, that House would become the best check which any government could have, and with that check the people would be perfectly satisfied. He had read with surprise the abhorrence of radical reform expressed by several members of that House. He believed there were among the advocates of that measure, designing and wicked men. But he also knew that there was a great number of very honest men who believed universal suffrage and annual parliaments were the only means of protecting the rights of the people, and establishing an adequate check upon government. He had the same object as they professed to have in view; but he thought that suffrage far from universal would effect that object, and form a sufficient check. He therefore thought it would be madness to attempt a reform to that extent, when a less extensive reform would be sufficient.

Mr. Alderman Waithman said, he felt great reluctance in addressing the House; but his duty as the representative of so conspicuous a body superseded his reluctance. He concurred in the opinions of the hon. gentleman who spoke last, so far as they went. The House were called upon, in the most extraordinary way, to adopt measures affecting the rights and liberties of the people, without giving the people sufficient opportunity of knowing what passed. It was impossible that the people could know in some parts of the country what was doing, for even the city of London had not yet been able to present their opinions to the House, though he believed the sheriffs were now at the door with them. It was three months since the events took place on which those measures were founded. If the necessity for passing such measures was so urgent, why had not parliament been called together earlier, in order to give the people abundant time to meet and to express their sentiments? It appeared extraordinary that ministers should have been so well assured of the illegality of the meeting at Manchester, as to have at once issued thanks in the name of the Prince Regent, and yet that they had not previously informed the people of the illegality. At least the time had now arrived when they ought to state the grounds on which their thanks were founded: but he was yet, after having seen the papers on their table, as much in the dark as ever. All the legal authorities in that House were unable to come to an opinion as to the legality or illegality of the meeting. In a case of so much doubt and difficulty, was it right, was it proper, to disperse the meeting in a manner which terminated so calamitously? An inquiry was called for, not merely in order to ascertain the conduct of the yeomanry and of the magistrates, but to ascertain the conduct of his majesty's ministers, and what communications they had previously had with the magistrates. A meeting had been held in Smithfield some time before the meeting at Manchester, and it was then the opinion of all the legal gentlemen, the learned gentlemen opposite included, that the meeting was perfectly legal. The whole of the measures adopted with regard to that meeting had been pre-concerted. Harrison was to be apprehended, and the military were to attack, if any resistance had been made. He knew these things perfectly; as he was the representative in the common council of the ward in which the meeting was held. At that meeting a great body had attended from mere curiosity to know what passed. If any resistance had been made, if an arm had been lifted up, the military would have been called in, and the same scenes would have followed which were occasioned by the interference of the military at Manchester. He was, therefore, of opinion, that the magistrates would not have so acted, unless they had instructions from ministers. His opinions upon such meetings were known to several members of the House. He thought them dangerous, impolitic, foolish beyond description, and particularly injurious to rational reform. His majesty's ministers could not have found more effectual means than such meetings afforded for injuring rational reform, and for obtaining such measures as those now before them. But if the example of lord Fitzwilliam had been generally followed, gentlemen of character and talents would be listened to and respected, and visionary and itinerant orators would not be attended to. That House was called the grand inquest of the nation; it was so, not merely to inquire into the concealment of arms, but to inquire into the oppressions of ministers. It might be said, there were no oppressions, for ministers were such good sort of men. But the people said there were oppressions. Let the grand inquest inquire into it. All the remedies hitherto applied had failed. The Habeas Corpus act had been suspended; but when the suspension was removed, the people were worse than ever. It was therefore necessary to inquire into the real causes of complaint. Declarations of loyalty had come from part of the people, but at the head of such declarations were always to be found persons who held places or received private favours from the government. There was no doubt of the loyalty of such men. Certainly not; and why did they profess their loyalty but in order to brand all others with a charge of disloyalty? Were two-thirds of the nation who called for inquiry and redress to be disregarded, and acts passed in that House to their prejudice, merely because one-third, and these either self-interested or influenced, made loyal declarations? He had attended popular meetings for five and twenty years, and was representative of a ward containing 4,000 families; and he could assure the House that he had found more intelligence in the lower and middle classes than certain gentlemen were disposed to give them credit for. He always thought that their notions of reform were wild and visionary, and destructive of their own object; but when they were charged with desiring a revolution, he could not refrain from expressing his astonishment at a charge so unfounded. Was it not known that sir Robert Raymond, afterwards lord chief justice of England, had advocated the same opinion? Was it not known that they had been the opinions of one, than whom a purer spirit never appeared before the tribunal of his maker? He meant Mr. Granville Sharpe. The people had read and reflected upon the subject of parliamentary reform. They understood the source of their grievances as well as any member of that House. They erred only in their estimate of the necessary remedy. It was the fashion to speak of the people as a different species—as if they were insects or worms; and every butterfly-gentleman, when he succeeded in emerging from among them, turned round and said, “I have got wings; I leave the people behind me; let their impertinence be repressed.” The object of many measures lately passed was, to break down the middle classes; and the consequence now was, that they could not afford labour and wages sufficient to the working classes. Did the noble lord suppose that his coercive measures would counteract the effects of impolicy and excessive taxation? No; the noble lord did not think it. Why did he first propose this measure to last for ever, and now propose it for five years, but because he knew that it was not sufficient as a remedy? Distress, discontent, and irritation would not thus be remedied, nor could they be thus effectually suppressed. They would burst forth like a volcanic eruption, sweeping every thing along, and destroying all in their course, if that House did not apply a sufficient remedy. If they gave this remedy to the noble lord, would he be satisfied? No; when they put down meetings (to use a favourite phrase) by such measures, they must also have 10,000 or 12,000 men added to the military force of the country. It was all a piece of trickery. It was part of a system to abolish the Bill of Rights. Because the people had shown a formidable front, and petitioned for the preservation of their liberties, they must now be driven back. But he could tell the House, that if they passed a resolution that they would take the grievances of the people into consideration, and if, as a means of doing so, they dismissed his majesty’s ministers—instead of complaints, they would have addresses of congratulation from all parts of the country. They talked of preserving the constitution: was it now found inadequate? We had rebellions and insurrections in the country, and yet the constitution survived. It had been the fashion of late to suspend the Habeas Corpus act; but the object now was to put down the constitution. If this bill should be effectual for five years, the people would never again meet like Britons. In a period of the reign of Charles 2nd, the people petitioned for the assembling of parliament, for the parliament was then with the people, and the courtiers congratulated the king upon his deliverance from parliament. It was not so now, for parliament was occupied in deluding the king, the people, and themselves. Then the House of Commons expelled sir Thomas Withens for expressing his disapprobation of petitions to the king to assemble parliament. They addressed the king against sir George Jeffries, recorder of London, for his activity in the same cause. Sir George was then in great favour with the court of aldermen, as he perhaps would be with the aldermen of the present day. There was silence for some years; but the consequence of those violations of the rights of the people was the Revolution; and if the noble lord succeeded in his measures now, the same consequence would follow. Ministers appeared to have taken that page of history for their model, so far as that was possible in the present state of opinion and of the public press. It was, indeed, still conceded, that lord-lieutenants, sheriffs, and mayors, could call meetings, but the first could be dismissed. Sheriffs might be appointed on the recommendation of lord-lieutenants, and the House knew how mayors would act. The lord mayor of London had refused to call a common-hall when three million of new taxes were to be imposed. The House was now legislating without evidence. Anonymous evidence was no evidence. The 7,000 armed men turned out to be all men in buckram. The lord mayor had said, that he had evidence on oath that fire was to be put to the city, and the inhabitants to be murdered. Why was not that evidence on the table? The lord mayor must have contributed the important information to lord Sidmouth. He could not suppose that any lord mayor would have said so, if he did not believe it. If, then, the lord mayor of London was so practised on, must not others have been practised on in the same manner? The districts that were now alleged to be disaffected contained 1,000,000 of inhabitants. Our armies were principally recruited from those districts. If they were to be so recruited again, they would willingly enter the army; for, as an ingenious writer had eloquently said, they would see "that death was less certain, and more honourable, in the army than at home." But how could such troops be relied on? When there had been danger of invasion, the cry was, "Let us all unite;" and parliament put arms into the hands of those men. But we were told, that the difference was, that now disaffection stalked abroad; that then a foreign enemy was to be opposed. But the disaffection was either entirely imaginary, or forced by distress and misgovernment. Even the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act was not so formidable as this measure, because then the people might meet; they could then have the assistance of men of talents to stimulate them to acts of energy. If this bill were to make it imperious on magistrates to call meetings, and if they were to preside, and only to see that no stranger addressed those meetings, the measure would be less objectionable. How was the slave trade abolished, but by meetings all over the country, and by individuals travelling for the purpose who got much credit for their conduct? If he were to use such language as had been used on a similar subject by lords Chatham and Camden, against lord Loughborough for preventing the remonstrance of the city of London from being received, he should excite such a storm as would oblige him to sit down, and perhaps call forth the rebuke of an hon. gentleman. Taxes had not been reduced, though the value of property had fallen more than half. The same lavish expenditure was attempted to be supported by diminished means. If those who were represented as so dangerous were let alone, the whole cause of alarm would soon subside. At the last meeting in the city no radicals had attended; but there was a strong feeling for rational reform throughout the country. To give freedom by means of reform to the people, was the only means of restoring tranquillity now, and of being prepared for any emergency.

Mr. Wilson observed, that it seemed pretty generally admitted on all sides, that the evil arose from want of employment and from heavy taxes. Was it possible, then, to remove these causes of discontent? He should be most happy if the poorer and the labouring classes of society could be convinced of the impossibility. Of this, however, all who heard him must be satisfied: every member of that House well knew that the unfortunate state of things to which he had alluded could not be done away, that our manufactures must continue depressed, and that taxes must continue to be paid. He was not, he trusted, insensible to the sufferings now experienced, nor, in giving his support to these measures, did he conceive that he was preventing their mitigation. The condition of the lower orders he hoped soon to see ameliorated. But it appeared to him that the proposed measures were necessary, if it were only for the purpose of showing that the sentiments often pronounced at public meetings were not the unanimous sentiments of the country. It had been urged, that the people had not sufficient confidence in that House, and that in their belief a majority of it gave its votes as a matter of course to the ministers of the Crown. But was not this likely to be always the case? And if the gentlemen opposite were to come into power, would they not think themselves also justified in making use of the patronage of government? For one, he must frankly say, that he preferred the term of five years for the duration of the bill now before the House to a shorter period: a shorter time would, he thought, only serve to keep men's minds in their present state of agitation. As long as that should continue, there would be a necessity for increased expense, and an enlarged military establishment. He wished to see that necessity at an end. With these impressions, and adverting to all the circumstances in which this country was now placed, he felt it his duty, as an honest man, and an Englishman, to vote for the present measure.

Mr. D. W. Harvey could not agree that the true remedy for the grievances of this country was to be found in the multiplied and complicated provisions of the system now recommended to their adoption. So far from allaying the present discontents, or putting an end to existing evils, he believed these enactments would aggravate and increase them. There were, in his opinion, but two certain and effectual remedies; one, a diminution, or perhaps rather an equalization, of the taxes; the other, a parliamentary reform. The former was, perhaps, that which called for more immediate attention. There were many persons who had large property, and especially in land, who derived advantage, instead of suffering loss, from our present system of taxation, connected as it was with the whole system of our internal policy. A given rental might pay a larger amount of taxes than it did thirty years ago, but that rental was itself augmented in a much more considerable proportion. A landed proprietor of 5,000*l.* per annum was before charged with perhaps 800*l.* a year: he now paid double that sum, but his entire estate had also, during the intervening period, been doubled in value. Had manufacturing or any species of labour experienced a similar advantage? He concurred with the view lately taken of this subject by a noble lord; he wished to see the duties on salt and other articles subjected to an excise differently modelled, and, if a property tax was to be resorted to, that it might be attended with various gradations, and fall chiefly on the richer orders. Nothing would more completely satisfy the minds of the labouring classes that their interests were consulted, and prove to them that there was a disposition to sympathize with their wants and sufferings. He had, however, one very strong objection to the measures before the House. They were bound to consider, when they were about to create new powers, to whom it was that they intrusted them. His majesty's ministers had lost the confidence of the nation upon this subject. It had expected that parliament was called together for the purpose of going into an inquiry respecting it, and his own constituents had abstained from publicly assembling to consider the transactions at Manchester under this persuasion, conceiving that, as a full investigation would so soon take place, their meeting might be regarded as a mark of their disposition to prejudge the question. This had been a general belief, but the country was disappointed. The learned gentlemen on the other side had contended, that the House was an inadequate tribunal, and that the subject would come more properly under the cognizance of courts of law. The hon. and learned solicitor-general had, a few nights since, made a triumphant appeal on the ground of the inquest at Oldham. He had asked whether it was right to take the question out of the hands of a court specially constituted for the purpose of conducting inquiries of this nature? What now had become of this reasoning? For his own part, he must declare that he had a very sincere respect for the judges of the King's-bench, but he could not understand the grounds on which they proceeded in putting a stop to the inquest. It appeared to him that they had gone out of their way on that occasion. It was new to him to find a man allowed to convert his own wrong into a justification of himself. The coroner was absolved from the necessity of resuming an inquest in consequence of his own irregularity; and what chance was there now that the merits of the case would ever be ascertained? The court had, indeed, referred to the grand jury, and stated that the matter might be safely left to that tribunal. No doubt a grand jury would discharge its duty; but it had been admitted in that House, that they had a peculiar protection thrown over them. They could not be called upon, in consequence of their oath of secrecy, to divulge the grounds on which they acted. With regard to this point, however, he would here mention a case which had been recently decided at York. A prisoner was on his trial for felony, and one of the witnesses against him was under examination. A member of the grand jury, by whom the bill of indictment had been found, happened to be present, and was so struck with the difference between the witness's testimony there and what he had sworn before the grand jury, that he thought it his duty to apprise the judge of it. The latter conceived that it was essential to the ends of public justice that the witness should be indicted for perjury. A bill for this purpose was preferred to the grand jury, and upon the evidence of one of themselves, the man was indicted and convicted. It was deemed right in that case, for the paramount ends of justice, to release a grand juror from the obligation of his oath. In the case of the transaction at Manchester, there was a general persuasion, that although the grand jury might not have ignored bills contrary to evidence, yet that they had refused to admit certain evidence. This sometimes happened on election committees, and he recollected an instance of two sitting at the same time, and one of them determining that treating was bribery, and the other that treating was not bribery. The cause of this difference was, the rejection of evidence in one room, which evidence was admitted in the other. It might have been possible that the Lancashire grand jury conceived that if Derbyshire were indicted, no proceedings could be had against Mr. Hunt and his friends, and therefore threw out the bill against him. There seemed to him, however, to be an absolute necessity for inquiry into all the transactions at Manchester. The very first letter of the papers submitted to the House was a very important document. It represented the disturbed districts to be in a state calculated to end in a revolution, and it was remarkable that it was dated on the 1st of July, several days before the prorogation of parliament. No allusion, however, was made to it in the speech from the throne, and parliament was allowed to separate with some general advice only, to maintain order in their respective neighbourhoods. This furnished some reason for believing that ministers wished the evil to go on, till it assumed some tangible shape, and should enable them to bring forward these portentous measures. He believed, however, that their only tendency would be to exasperate and increase the disaffection already prevailing.—He had now but a very few observations to make on that other question of sovereign importance—he meant a reform of parliament. It had been too successfully endeavoured to confound this subject with the views of the radicals. He could not agree indeed with all the terms of reproach which had been applied to the latter. They wished for what they considered suitable remedies to all the distempers of our condition. He had lately suffered from an internal complaint, and was desirous of a radical cure, but this his physician could not undertake, though he promised him considerable relief. His own principle with regard to parliamentary reform was narrowed to this—that the House should contain no member who did not, at fixed periods, revert to some public body, to whose praise or condemnation he should be subject, whilst dismissal or re-election should depend on their judgment of his conduct. This, he believed, would be satisfactory to the public, but they would not be satisfied whilst they saw so many members who had no constituents. He did not wish that the House should be converted into a mere organ of the sentiments of others, for that would be incompatible with their character as a deliberative body. The principle of reform which had stated went to no such extreme, and could, he thought, be obnoxious only to those who looked to their seats as a source of profit to themselves.

Lord Stanley, in consequence of his having been so pointedly alluded to, rose to submit a few observations. He certainly had been, no doubt unintentionally, very much misconceived. The hon. gentleman who spoke last was wrong in supposing that he had admitted, that a grand juror's oath threw too great a protection over him. He had said, that the Lancashire grand jury were able to justify their conduct, but that they would not violate their oaths. Unquestionably, however, that obligation might be removed by the interference of a superior court. The hon. member, he apprehended, had derived his facts from the statements contained in Mr. Hunt's petition; in which it was alleged, that the grand jury had been actuated by feelings and prejudices against him. He wished to speak with tenderness of all persons who addressed themselves to the House; but he must say, that there was no authority for the assertions of the hon. member in this respect.

Mr. Boote Wilbraham asked, whether the hon. member for Colchester meant to state that the grand jury refused to receive the evidence of Derbyshire?

Mr. D. W. Harvey did not mean to say any such thing. All he had asserted was, that on public grounds it would be desirable to know the reasons which influenced the grand jury to ignore particular bills. They might have ignored them by adopting a particular rule, and acting upon it to the exclusion of a certain line of evidence, which, if admitted, would perhaps have led them to a different result.

Mr. Boote Wilbraham stated, that the grand jury had made no such rule, nor refused any particular evidence.

Mr. Hutchinson, after lamenting the painful necessity in which he found himself, of trespassing upon the attention of the House, after the speeches that were made by his hon. friends round him, warmly defended his hon. and gallant friend from the attack made upon him by the hon. member for Marlow. He was the more ready to repeat and justify every expression made use of by his hon. and gallant friend, as he was so much in the habit of connecting his feelings and interests with his own upon every occasion. Before he proceeded further, he begged to ask ministers, whether it was their intention to extend the provisions of this Bill to Ireland?

Mr. Grant replied, that it was intended to include Ireland within the operation of the bill.

Mr. Hutchinson resumed, and with great animation recalled the attention of the House to the speech of the noble lord, when he introduced this bill to their consideration—a bill which would be for ever connected with his name. Did not that noble lord, in his opening speech, contrast the peaceable state of Ireland with the disturbed condition of England?—Did he not express his pride and satisfaction at seeing what he termed the peaceable and prosperous state of a country with which he was so nearly connected? Why, then, did the noble lord talk of the peaceable and tranquil state of Ireland if he meant to visit that country with the pains and penalties of his bill of coercion? What was the noble lord's intention by adopting such a delusive course? Did he mean to deceive the seventy Irish members who voted with him on the former night, and to induce them to give their support, under the idea that though England was to be coerced, Ireland was to be free? When the noble lord, with his usual douceur of manner, and apparent modesty, even though introducing a measure of such tremendous consequence, made this allusion to the state of Ireland, what was his meaning? Why the delusion? He intreated the Irish members to recollect the declaration of the noble lord as to the tranquillity of their country, and to couple it with what they now heard of the intention to include Ireland in the operation of this Bill. [Hear, hear! and some coughing from the ministerial benches.] Gentlemen might interrupt him if they pleased; they might manifest a readiness to vote away the liberties of their own country, but they must give him leave to defend those of his—such at least as remained to his country in her present state. When the noble lord had talked of the prosperity of Ireland, he did not believe him, though he was ready to admit its peace and tranquillity, and to assert its claim for an exemption from the operation of these bills.—Nothing, he must say, could be more outrageous than the conduct of the noble lord, who, upon evidence of his own showing, part absurd, part anonymous, grounded the necessity of measures subversive of the most essential privileges of the constitution, notwithstanding the many flat contradictions which this evidence had received in both Houses of Parliament. It seemed the noble lord, even with his majorities, did not feel himself on quite as safe ground as he at first imagined, when he now came down, and in smooth and flowing numbers, admitted the limitation of the bill to five years existence. It was to be hoped that before this night passed away, a feeling of a similar description would prompt the noble lord, notwithstanding his bold declarations, to make the bill local, instead of general, in its application. He begged pardon while he said that there was something so outrageous and offensive in the mode pursued by the noble lord, that he was afraid to give vent to the feelings which it excited in his breast. The ministers, in bringing forward these measures, came before their country with false colours. Were these the glories that followed the labours of upwards of half a century of administrations like the present? Were these the laurels which the people were to reap after the termination of a war unparalleled in its renown, but for which no thanks were due to ministers, though none could be too much for the brave soldiers and their great captain, who had won them by their spirit and heroism? Was it in the fifth year of profound peace with the world that ministers were to claim confidence, when they avowed that sedition and treason raged among their own people, and that they could only be eradicated by bills of pains and penalties? [Coughing on the ministerial benches.]—He trusted gentlemen would refrain from interrupting him: he meant to be brief, but if this interruption were persevered in, he should only have to detain them longer, as he was determined to express his opinions, and he would extend them to tenfold length if these attempts were renewed.—He was old enough to recollect the proceedings of governments and parliaments in Ireland, and to remember the cruel oppressions that were practised upon the people, when the noble lord was in, as well as when he was out of office in that country. He recollected when any honest man who interposed between the people and their oppressors was coughed down in parliament by the purchased majority of that day.—What had been the result? The grievances of the people were met by coercion—the country at length became goaded to madness, and a devastating rebellion was the result. The history of those sad times in Ireland presented a spectacle for deep contemplation. There were those in power in that day who were eager to see the people draw the sword, that they themselves might have a pretext for throwing away the scabbard. The vices which human nature exhibited once, she again threw forth at other periods, and he meant no offence to any particular individuals when he avowed his full and thorough conviction, that there were persons in the country at this moment, who, for their own black and malignant purposes, were ready and eager to drive the people into acts of outrage which might furnish a pretext for putting down that people at the point of the sword. If parliament lent itself to such persons it would stand degraded in the eyes of the people—it would forfeit its character as the guardian of public liberty. They were told, indeed, by ministers, of the nations of the continent that were saved by the vigour and valour of their councils. He denied the assertion, and declared that the nations of the continent were saved by themselves, and not by his majesty's ministers. The proof of the estimation in which ministers were held on the continent, could be easily put to the test. Go to any court in Europe, and see the contempt in which they were held—go to any people in Europe and see the scorn and derision which were heaped upon them: they were universally despised and detested. So long as the strength of the continental people rested upon the influence of rotten thrones, it crumbled, and they owed their existence as nations to whatever of generosity was bestowed upon them by their conqueror, Buonaparté; when at length an accumulation of oppression roused the people to resistance, they expelled the previous conqueror, his own people refused him obedience and oppressed nations conquered—not France, but Napoleon. He had no words in which he could adequately express his admiration of the military glory acquired by this country during the late eventful war; but the noble efforts and heroism which consummated it, would, he feared, have been vain, if the people of the continent had not to a man risen and assisted in the expulsion of their oppressor. But this glory belonged to the people, and not to the ministers. Where had they the suffrages of any once prostrate nation for its redemption? Would the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) whose eloquence was so exercised in defence of the measures of his colleagues, and who had but just returned from the continent, say from what state he had procured a certificate of attachment to his majesty's ministers? Did he obtain one from the fallen and expelled people of Parga? Was it from the people of Genoa he received an eulogium upon the merits of the British ministers? If it were not was it from dismembered Saxony, or did Belgium resound their praises? What did France say of their acts? They suffered, as friends, their parties to enter her states, and they remained there as invaders. To crown all, in the fifth year of peace, the people of this empire—the people whose energies and perseverance, under every sacrifice, enabled ministers to carry to the full length the whole of their war measures, were now to be put down by coercion—they were to receive chains in return for their efforts and their confidence—and these were to be rivetted, without even the preparatory form of any inquiry.—The hon. member, with great force, condemned the whole policy of his majesty's ministers on the present occasion: at home and abroad it was alike disgraceful, condemned, execrated, and despised. Why was it that, under such circumstances, appeals were made to rally round the throne with loyal addresses, when no danger for the stability of the throne could at all be contemplated while no efforts were made to rally round the people and the constitution, and to save both from the pains and penalties that were alike levelled against them? He then condemned, in pointed terms, the proposed duration of the bill, and its extension beyond the local places of disorder.

Mr. Grenfell appealed to the House, whether, as had been imputed to him by the hon. gentleman who last spoke, he had said that the gallant general fought better than he spoke. As to the expression, that "the country was degraded," he had not said that it had been used in the course of this debate; it had been used three months ago by the gallant general on the hustings at Southwark.

Mr. Barham was of exactly a contrary opinion to that expressed by the hon. gentleman respecting the character which this country sustained in the estimation of foreigners; for if any Englishman was not satisfied with that character, he must be unreasonable indeed. He did not know any thing of Parga; but with Genoa he had long been acquainted, and he knew that, whatever might have been the sufferings of that people, they did not ascribe those sufferings to England.

the hon. gentleman would go to Genoa, or into Saxony, he would find the highest opinion entertained of the character of this country. As to the main question, he thought it his duty to support ministers on the measures before the House. His opinion that such a measure as the present was necessary, was founded on the illegality of those meetings which it was the object of the bill to suppress; for he could not suppose that any thing so dangerous to the peace of this country as these meetings were, could be legal. As to the conduct of the Manchester magistrates, he believed they had acted in the discharge of a difficult and delicate duty; and as to the yeomen, he could not bring himself to believe that a body of Englishmen were capable of acting with the wanton cruelty which had been imputed to them. But while he agreed with ministers on these points, there was another question on which he entirely differed from them; for he was of opinion that these proceedings were of such a nature, that they ought to have been inquired into. He did not believe that the House of Commons had fallen into such contempt as had been alleged by the hon. gentleman, but that, on the contrary, it was still respected by the majority of the people. He did not doubt, however, that this respect would be greatly diminished, if an inquiry into those proceedings was denied; and therefore he was convinced that no evil could arise from inquiry, equal to the evil that would result from denying it. The construction likely to be put by the country on the refusal of ministers to institute an inquiry. Was, that they were afraid of something coming out that would not bear the light. —He thought the present measure ought to be restricted to those parts of the country only that required it, because, to punish the whole kingdom for the offence of some districts, comparatively small, was certainly not a measure likely to promote conciliation. He was not a reformer himself. He had no objection to correct abuses by applying the laws with proper severity in all cases of corruption; but he would not introduce any new principle into the system of representation. As to the principles of Radical Reform, he conceived that if they were adopted they would lead directly to the abolition of monarchy and the subversion of the constitution. He looked, however, on the right of petitioning to be one of the most valuable and useful privileges of the subject, when judiciously exercised; and, therefore, the House should be guarded in making any law that would trench on this privilege. He appealed to the chancellor of the exchequer, whether the property-tax would have been repealed, but for that resistance which this measure was calculated to prevent in future. The slave-trade, also, had been petitioned against; and there the result had proved the good effects of expressing temperately the sentiments of the people on great measures. At the time of the American war, the people were for peace, and peace was accordingly granted to them; in the revolutionary, they expressed their desire for war, and Mr. Pitt continued it; in short, on every memorable occasion the good effects of listening to the voice of the people through their petitions, had been clearly proved; but now ministers, by this measure, were going to cut asunder the link that connected the parliament with the people.

Mr. Hutchinson, in explanation, disclaimed any intention of stating that the national character of England was degraded upon the continent, as the last speaker appeared to think. —What he meant to say was, that the policy and practice of the British cabinet was universally deemed to be disgraceful upon the continent—that in fact, that policy and practice were odious in the estimation of every intelligent man in Europe.

Mr. Knox supported the motion; but as he spoke under the gallery, and in a low tone, we could not catch a complete sentence from the hon. member throughout his speech.

Mr. J. Smith rose, he said, to take notice of some erroneous and mischievous reports which had been lately propagated, and with the origination of which he could not suppose that government had any concern. He could not, indeed, suspect the members of the government of descending to any unworthy expedient for the purpose of producing an effect in debate. But he lamented to say, that some reports had recently gone forth from high authority, which were materially calculated, and which did actually operate, to affect the credit of the country.—He alluded particularly to the report mentioned elsewhere, that there were no less than 100,000 men in a state ready to be called out for open rebellion, in the line between the Weir and the Tyne up to Carlisle. Now he would take leave to say, that this statement was not true, because it was impossible it could be true, for there were not 100,000 men in the whole of the district alluded to capable of bearing arms. The population of the counties of Northumberland, Durham and Cumberland, comprehended within the district alluded to, amounted, according to the Census of 1811, to 480,000; and supposing 70,000 to have been since added, which was rather a liberal supposition, that addition could not be conceived to include more than 10,000 men capable of bearing arms.— This conclusion he founded upon the authority of those able writers who, especially in the course of the French Revolution, had illustrated the number of men capable of bearing arms, which could be rationally looked for among a certain amount of population; and he was fully persuaded, that the district to which he referred could not produce 100,000 men capable of bearing arms, even if the lord-lieutenants of the several counties were, with all the clergy, to be included.— Such an extraordinary statement, then, as he had mentioned should serve to put the House and the public on their guard against similar exaggeration, and the more so, as the propagation of such statements was calculated to do serious injury. For example, the statement upon which he had animadverted, coming as it did, from a nobleman of great property and consideration in the country (the duke of Northumberland) had had a very serious effect upon public credit on Saturday last. Several persons, indeed, were known at once to take proceedings for transferring their property from our own to foreign funds.— For his own part, he had never done, nor would he ever do any such thing; because it was his resolution never to desert the vessel of his country in its distress, but, on the contrary, to cling to it while a plank remained to swim upon.— But upon the same ground that sustained this resolution, he must lament the delusion of others, and deprecate the cause which gave birth to such delusion. Delusions of this nature must always serve to do mischief; for any report that created alarm, was calculated to affect public credit, which was the more to be deprecated at present, as it must operate to produce an unfavourable exchange, and so raise the price of bullion, at a time when the Bank was called upon to commence payments in bullion. In every view, then, he condemned such groundless fears as had induced him to address the House; for although the finding of 100,000 men capable of bearing arms in the district referred to was quite as improbable, or rather as impossible, as that Rutlandshire could furnish 20,000 such men, or Bedfordshire 50,000, still there were minds upon which such stories were likely to operate, and such minds ought not to be practised upon.

Sir Isaac Coffin said, he would vote for this measure because the constitution was in danger, and he was sworn to defend it.

A Gentleman, whose name we could not learn, deprecated the propagation of groundless alarms, and expressed his disinclination to vote for making the present a permanent or universal measure. He thought some such measure necessary in certain districts, but he would have it apply only to such districts, and he would rather vote for it if it were only to continue for one year, or three years at farthest.

Sir Robert Heron declared, that he was so perfectly and entirely opposed to the bill, that no limitation could reconcile him to it. No case could be stated which would, for a moment, reconcile him to any measure that he deemed to be an infraction of the constitution; and he conceived it would be much better for ministers to take the responsibility of such a proceeding upon themselves, than to endeavour to procure for it the high sanction of that House. On the subject of the Manchester meeting, it was not his intention to detain hon. gentlemen for two minutes; but this he must say, they had been frequently told that they were not to prejudge the conduct, or the motives of the magistrates of Manchester. His duty told him, that they were now assembled as the representatives of the people, and it was especially for them not to prejudge the people. Till evidence was offered such as was to be relied upon, to the contrary, he was bound not to suppose them guilty. In the whole course of the observations which had fallen from those who assumed a different position, he had heard but one remark in the shape of an argument; and that was, that the reforms which the meeting in question was assembled to discuss, were no other than so many projects of sedition; but if that was the case, Mr. Speaker himself was guilty of disseminating them: "for you, Sir, (continued the hon. baronet, addressing himself to the chair) whose conduct has entitled you to the esteem of this House, and of the country—you, Sir, have always directed that the petitions which have been presented to us for similar objects should be printed, and copies of them, under your eye, have been circulated among hon. members." Respecting the meeting at Birmingham, indeed, there could be no doubt; but he could not think that it was always necessary to exercise the utmost severity against the people, even when their proceedings had assumed a character of illegality. Mr. Speaker had not suffered, he believed, by the election of the "legislatorial attorney," and if he were to attempt to take his seat among them, he would meet with a reception likely to occasion disappointment and vexation to himself [Hear!]. The worst measure of all, as connected with the Manchester business, however, was the letter of thanks to the magistrates. The people had been long accustomed to receive from the throne solace in their sufferings, and commiseration for their distress. The fountain of mercy and justice in this case, unhappily, had been polluted; and, as far as it was in the power of ministers to do so, the father of his people had been converted into the head of a faction. The people petitioned for relief, because they were miserably distressed; and what answer was the House about to return to their petitions? That they had raised a new army [Hear, hear!]. Yes, they had raised a new army, at a time when they had already one which it would be impossible long to pay—one for which there could exist neither demand nor necessity at home nor elsewhere, because of a state of general peace. In conclusion, he had only to express his utter dissent from the principle and provisions of the bill.

Sir C. Monck took the opportunity of stating, in reference to what had been reported to have occurred in another place, that he did not believe the population of the northern districts alluded to could afford the numbers which were reported to be actually engaged in plans of disaffection. He at the same time was most confident that the noble duke who was said to have made the statement, would not have made it unless he fully credited it.

Mr. Brownlow defended the conduct of the Irish members who supported the present measures, from the implication conveyed in the speech of the hon. member for Cork. It was asserted by him that seventy members from that part of the kingdom were deceived by the noble lord as to the fact of their extension to Ireland. He denied any such inference. The Irish members who supported these measures of security did so under an irresistible impression of their necessity. It was because they had witnessed in their own country the symptoms and effects of a growing rebellion, that they hurried from their homes and families to ward off from this most favoured land those violences, the misery of which had been experienced in Ireland.

Mr. Hutchinson stated, that until that night he had not the remotest idea that the bill was to extend to Ireland. What he had said in his speech went to charge the noble lord with the deception practised on the members of that part of the country, who thought they were alone imposing those severities on Great Britain. In the bill, as it now stood, there was no mention of the united kingdom.

Lord Castlereagh said, it was probable the hon. member was not in his place when he opened the subject to the House; if he was, it was impossible but he must have heard him directly state that it was intended that the bill should apply to every part of the kingdom.

On the question being put, that the bill be recommitted,

Colonel Beaumont observed, that it was unnecessary for him to take up much of the time of the House. He rose for the purpose of expressing, in the first place, his wish that an instruction might be given to the committee. But he trusted that every hon. member, who, like himself, belonged to no particular party, would not feel himself committed by the vote he might have given in regard to this bill. He meant to move, that an instruction be given to the committee, to the effect that they should limit the duration of the bill, so as that its operation might not extend beyond the 1st of March, 1821. It would have been most gratifying to his feelings if such a measure could have been altogether dispensed with. He was proud to say, that from the first moment in which he had had the honour of sitting in that House, he had kept himself quite unconnected with any party. His sole object had ever been the support of the constitution, and of the rights which it involved, in their original, ancient, and long-established vigour. He need not enlarge upon the immense importance of the subject before the House—important in every sense of the word; but he must take the liberty of differing from the opinion advanced by a noble lord on a former night, that this bill was not, in fact, an infringement of constitutional rights. Had that noble lord contended that it was called for by the circumstances of the times, he should have been most willing to allow the fact; for he thought the necessity of it, for the preservation of our rights, our liberties, and our property, was so clear, that he could not imagine any of those honourable gentlemen who disapproved of its provisions would argue that it was of itself unnecessary. It had been stated by an hon. member, that the minds of the people were more likely to be kept in a state of agitation and ferment by a bill for one year than by one for five years. But he did not see how it was to be proved that the people of England could forget all their duties, their rights, and their loyalty, at the end of one year, as if they were impatient to resume seditious practices. He should therefore move, “That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill, that they make provision to limit the duration of the Bill to six weeks after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was desirous of taking the earliest opportunity to express his regret that he could not coincide in the motion of his hon. friend. It was of the very first importance that upon a subject of this nature there should be, if possible, an unanimity of opinion among them; and when his noble friend had stated his wish that the bill should be limited in its duration, and not permanent, he had hoped that he would have united all opinions. There were, however, very different opinions held, especially by the hon. gentleman who thought that no real or actual dangers threatened the country from within; but to such he was not now addressing himself. The case had been so frequently and so fully argued, that he had not the smallest hope of inducing any of them to recant their opinions. It was to those who thought it should be a temporary measure, that he now wished to address one or two observations. The evils which they were called upon to remedy had been growing upon us for many years. In 1812 they had assumed so serious a character, as to require the imposition of very strong measures; but in 1817, they had increased to such a degree, as to call for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act. And from that time to the present, although for a short period they were checked by the vigour of parliament, they had been increasing till they had attained the full maturity of mischief. A period of less than five or six years could hardly tranquillize the public mind; and he should therefore move, that, instead of the words in the proposed instruction of the hon. gentleman, the limitation to be for five years. The hon. gentleman who had proposed the instruction had not spoken of the period at which public tranquillity was likely to be re-established. And what was the reason? That by putting so short a term to the bill, he should force the government the sooner to adopt some measures of reconciliation. But he had not told them what those measures were to be. He had heard, indeed, a good deal from honourable gentlemen who entertained views about parliamentary reform—a subject upon which, by-the-by, he had not yet heard any two gentlemen agree as to their plans; but to suspend precautionary measures, or subject them to considerations like these, would be a sacrifice of public prudence for a mere effusion of popularity. Another hon. gentleman had said, that if this bill passed, no meeting could be legally held to oppose the property tax, or any other unpopular measure. Now, he begged leave to remind him, that the meetings which were formerly held upon that subject, were convened, many of them, by the sheriffs; and completely proved how much the public voice influenced the proceedings of parliament. Upon the whole, it appeared to him, that this bill did not take away from the people any one of their rights or liberties, but was calculated so to regulate and modify them, as to ensure their proper and salutary exercise. Moreover, the proposed term would afford the country full experience of the effects of this measure. He could not but complain of the erroneous statements which had been so often made in that House against his majesty's government, namely—that, without sufficient time for due consideration, they had approved of the conduct of the Manchester magistrates. He was anxious to explain to the House the real history of that fact. On the morning of the 17th of August the first accounts of the meeting reached them by express. On the 18th, two gentlemen, who had arrived with full information of all the circumstances, were examined by his majesty's ministers: on the 19th and 20th they appeared before the law officers of the crown, and all the members of the cabinet: and it was on the 21st, and not before, that the letter in question was written. But, to return to the subject before them, he considered that a period of five years was as short a time as could be assigned to restore the public tranquillity. Under this feeling, it was impossible for him to support a shorter limitation, and he should therefore move, by way of amendment, to leave out the words, "six weeks after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament," and to add instead thereof "five years, and from thence to the end of the next Session of Parliament."

Mr. Calcraft began by observing, that if the right hon. gentleman had not, in the termination of the speech, entered into a defence of the thanks which his majesty's ministers had given to the magistrates of Manchester for their conduct, he should not have now spoken upon that subject. It was his decided opinion, that in a transaction which involved the name of the Prince Regent, they should have taken more time, and exercised more care. The present proposition was wrong from the noble lord—the House might easily discover by what—by those large divisions which the noble lord had seen opposed to him. The concession was not owing to any sympathy for the people, to any feeling for their liberties, which were violated, to any wish for, or attempt at conciliation, no, but it was owing to the conduct of those independent gentlemen who had honestly exerted themselves to prevent the passing of so extraordinary a measure upon such grounds. But what was the precedent resorted to for this measure? Why (and it showed the extremity to which the noble lord and his colleagues were reduced), the only one which could be found for this experiment on the liberties of the people—the only one which the noble lord could find, after rummaging over all his books—was the Grenville act; but the House should recollect, that in that case a power was given up which had been abused, and the aid of the other House of parliament was called in to establish that new judicature. Looking to the proposed amendment, and anxiously wishing for something like conciliation, he conceived that the term of fourteen months in the original proposition was too long for such an experiment on the liberty of the subject, and long enough for that inquiry into the state of the country which he thought ought to take place before any strong measure was agreed to. When the inquiry into the proceedings at Manchester was refused, he could not bring himself to believe, that no inquiry would be instituted into the general situation of the country. Something, he thought, should be done, in order to ascertain and provide some remedy for the distress which prevailed in the country. When this subject was alluded to, it was said that gentlemen fled off immediately to the question of reform, as a universal remedy. He did not think so; voting for reform, as he always had done, he did not conceive that that alone would be a sufficient remedy for the evils which were complained of. At the same time he would admit, that a wise and temperate reform would produce a powerful effect in conciliating the people, and whenever the subject should come before the House, he would give it his best consideration. His panacea for the present distress was, that an inquiry should be instituted, in order to ascertain how many were thrown out of employment, and to devise some means of assisting them. For this purpose he would give his vote for a sum of money out of the public purse, to take off the present pressure of distress, until it should be seen whether trade would revive, and bring matters back to their former channel. He had agreed to a vote for the relief of the sufferers in Russia. He had voted for loans to some of our colonies; and should it now be said, after the House had agreed to those votes, that in consequence of the conduct of a few demagogues, no inquiry should take place into the state of the people, and no assistance be given in their distress? His advice was, that a trial should be made, in order to see what could be done: this he said to prevent being taunted with urging the question of reform as the only remedy. He spoke of an immediate substantial remedy—of bread and meat; which, he maintained, should be procured for those who were labouring under severe pressure; and he felt satisfied, that if such relief were afforded, the itinerant demagogues would soon be without followers. He did not mean to underrate the alarms which were felt for the state of the country; he would, on the contrary, admit that there were bodies of men inclined to do mischief, but he denied that they could overturn the state. That was a result which he could not contemplate from any thing which was alleged of what had occurred in any part of the country; it was a danger which he did not and could not apprehend, on such grounds as were before the House. But while danger was thus talked of, was it considered that there were 11,000 additional men added to the standing army of the country? Was that no ground of security against the danger which was feared? He thought it was; and he would rather depend upon it than upon all the measures which the noble lord could devise. Were not the whole of those measures, connecting them with what he had just alluded to, sufficient to exasperate the people? Were they not rather calculated to make men desperate than to conciliate them in this period of general distress? But it was said, that the distress was only temporary. Why what had been the case whenever any stagnation of commerce, or manufacture, or revenue took place; it was said to be only temporary; but this discontent which was the effect of that distress, was to be considered as permanent, and it was so intended to deal with it. God forbid he should assert, that if the revenue was declining, something should not be done to support it; but what had the right hon. the chancellor of the exchequer done? Why, in those periods of alleged temporary distress, additional burthens were laid upon the people—new taxes, in proportion to their inability to bear them. Could this step be productive of conciliation? There was also the grant to the duke of York; what effect had that produced in the minds of the people? The sum of 10,000*l.* a year could not certainly be considered as very great in the national expenditure; but such were the circumstances under which it was given that, almost every class were agreed in looking upon it as wasteful and extravagant. And yet following up such measures as that, with those which were now proposed, ministers complained that they (the opposition) could not agree with them. It was said to them (the opposition), "Why are you not satisfied to join us now, when we come with open arms to receive you—when we are willing to conciliate?" He would answer, that such measures could not satisfy them, because they were not such as would produce conciliation; because they were uncalled for by any circumstances connected with the state of the country. It had been said, that this bill might be limited to three years. He would object to any extension of it beyond that which was mentioned in the proposition of the hon. member. He conceived that period too long for the suspension of the liberties of the people, and, as he had before observed, quite long enough for the inquiry which he maintained ought to take place into the state of the country.

Mr. Banks contended that if the bill were limited to the short period proposed, it would, instead of good, be productive of considerable mischief. The hon. gentleman proceeded to notice the insurrection under Was Tyler, and the historical acts connected with it; he also adverted to the disturbances that had been occasioned in Flanders by a party, like the radicals of the present day, wearing the distinguishing mark of white hats. After adverting to several of the circumstances connected with public meetings, he arrived at the conclusion, that some permanent law was required for their regulation; and he concluded by repeating that he thought fourteen months much too short a period for the duration of this bill.

Mr. Fowell Buxton troubled the House with reluctance, but it was overcome by a conviction of the necessity of stating the motives for his vote, on a question of such acknowledged magnitude. He differed from the hon. gentleman who proposed that fourteen months should be the duration of the measure, as he was convinced that in that interval the existing ferment would not have subsided. Another and an invincible objection to it was, that if it were so limited, it was certain that at the end of a year it would be effectually defeated. But if he differed from the hon. member, he differed also from the noble lord. The period proposed by ministers was, he thought, much too long. When an inroad was made upon the constitution (and he considered this measure a most important inroad upon it), it ought to continue for the shortest possible period. Still more was he opposed to the reasons urged on the other side for the longer continuance. The noble lord had declared that he thought the bill would be an improvement on the constitution; but he was content to take it as our forefathers had left it, without any alteration beyond what pressing circumstances required. Surely it could not be seriously argued, that the complicated machinery of petitioning five magistrates, or the majority of the grand jury, in case the sheriff refused to call a meeting, was an advantage not enjoyed under the old system. A right hon. gentleman on a late occasion, with a facility of language peculiarly his own, had supposed a case in which he should be called upon to instruct a mere stranger on the laws and constitution of the country, its external and internal policy, and in all the arcana of government. If such a task had fallen to him (Mr. Buxton), he would have referred the stranger to that part of the bill which called upon any justice or justices, if they thought fit, to prevent any individual from addressing a meeting, and inflicted severe penalties on parties resisting or refusing to obey. What would a stranger think of such a law? Suppose a magistrate, endeavouring to retrieve his broken fortune by a supererogation in zeal and loyalty, should deem it right to stop an individual who was casting reflections on the government. [No, no; hear.] Honourable gentlemen would observe, that it depended on the discretion and interpretation of the magistrate, and he might order any speaker at the meeting to prison for resistance; and then a clause of indemnity was inserted to screen the magistrate in case death or wounds ensued, while the parties resisting were subjected to transportation. The stranger to whom he would show this part of the measure might study from that time until doomsday, and not at last discover that this was an improvement upon the constitution [Cheers!]. The arguments on this question had been so exhausted, that he should confine himself to evidence. He lived in connexion with a class of the community not the richest nor the poorest, the tradesmen of this country; and the more he had seen of them, the more he had learned to admire and respect them. Among them prevailed the most genuine attachment to the principles of the constitution. It had been insinuated that they were disciples of Mr. Hunt; but the celebrated minority of 84 at the late Westminster election was sufficient evidence to the contrary. Next it was said, that they were the disciples of Carlile; but he was convinced from intimate knowledge, that the indignation of the House against the pernicious doctrines of that man was not so great or so sincere as that which was felt by the great body of the tradesmen of this kingdom; they feared that the odious principles recently promulgated would make an inroad upon their children, and destroy the harmony and happiness of their domestic circle. A force of this kind might easily be collected round the government and the constitution that would set at defiance irreligion and disaffection. It must be accomplished, however, by satisfaction and conciliation; and if it were asked, as it had been, what plan of conciliation ought to be adopted, he would fairly say that he would begin by rejecting the present bill, which was to suspend for five years a valuable part of the constitution. He firmly believed that that single act would give more satisfaction, would diffuse more content throughout the whole empire than any other, and would produce more tranquillity than all the laws of force and compulsion that could be brought into action against the people. Another measure of conciliation, and a measure of the utmost value at this time was, a declaration of economy, followed as it ought to be by carrying that declaration into effect. There was a glaring inconsistency in the argument of a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Peel), on a former night; he had shown with great clearness and truth, the wide difference that existed between the inhabitants of Manchester and of other parts of the country—that when trade flourished, the inhabitants of Manchester were contented; and when it was depressed, that they were clamorous for the remedy of some supposed grievance. Yet what was his conclusion from this admitted state of things? That the law which might be so necessary for Manchester ought to be inflicted on the whole British empire [Cheers]. He concluded by stating, that if any gentleman would move that the present bill should be limited to three years, he would support it; but if not, he would rather vote for the extended period of the noble lord, than for the short time proposed to be inserted in the instruction to the committee.

Mr. Perceval said, he was fully convinced that the bill would be attended with the most evil consequences; that it would have an immediate and injurious tendency, and on this account he was called upon to oppose those with whom he generally acted. He would shortly lay before the House the estimation in which he held the right of the people to meet to petition the legislature. In the first place, it had been acknowledged by parliament, in his opinion, much more effectually in the temporary restrictions to which it had been subjected, commonly called gagging-bills, than it had been contravened by the statute of Charles 2nd. He was prepared to contend, that the meetings of the people to petition parliament, whether summoned or not summoned by the sheriff, was their undoubted and constitutional right. He held it to be a most salutary vent for discontent: the saying of Mr. Burke, that this right formed the safety-valve of the constitution, had been already quoted, as it merited, in terms of the highest applause. Let not parliament, then, when the commotion within was at its height from the extraordinary heat applied at the present moment, increase the pressure upon that safety-valve, and thereby perhaps occasion, or at least endanger, a terrible explosion. This might be called an active advantage derived from the right; but of a different nature was that benefit which was derived from the consciousness in the subjects of this country that their complaints could be heard, whenever they thought fit to lay them before their representatives. It was this that gave an Englishman that proud character of independence, that distinguished him from all the nations of the earth. Was it nothing, he would ask, to destroy, or at the best to diminish, this proud independence. It was said that it was a dangerous right—a right that might be injurious to its possessors; but when we took even from the child the sword by which he might be wounded, and supplied its place by a leaden weapon, it exhibited some feeling of indignation at the cheat which was practised. The people of England had too much understanding to be thus imposed upon by those who affected to deprive them of their rights, under the pretence that they would be injurious. Surely there was something offensive in the words “parish meeting;” and this circumstance, trifling as it was, deserved attention, and the solicitor general well knew it, when, from the beginning to the end of his speech, he so studiously abstained from employing them. It was answered, that if the people could not call themselves together, they might still be convened, as of old, by the sheriff or lord-lieutenant; but he had much doubt, whether after the passing of this bill, even those meetings still allowed would not rapidly decrease. Such was his opinion of this bill, that though he thought it ought not to pass for one year, he would rather that it should be passed for five years; because, at the expiration of that period, the whole country would be so dissatisfied with it, and that dissatisfaction would be so loudly expressed, that there would be no difficulty in casting it away for ever. On these grounds, he should vote for the motion, which continued these restrictions for five years, rather than for that which continued them for three years, though he must confess that it was to the latter motion that he felt the best inclined.

A Member said, that he should vote for the amendment of the chancellor of the exchequer, because he considered this bill calculated to serve as a protection to our best and dearest rights. Nothing could be so dangerous to the constitution of the country as the tumultuous meetings which had recently taken place, and if they were allowed to continue, our liberties would certainly fall a sacrifice to them. The act ought to be continued so long as to render the cause which it was intended to repress desperate: this could only be done by continuing it for five years. If it was to be passed only for one year, the disaffected would resume their labours with fresh vigour, as soon as its operation expired.

Mr. Wilberforce, after complimenting his honourable young friend on the other side of the House, for the strong and ardent manner in which he had that evening declared himself in support of the liberties of his country, gave his cordial thanks to the noble lord opposite, for having given up his intention to render the measure permanent. It was one of the peculiar excellencies of the British constitution, an excellency which none of the republics of old had ever enjoyed, to be able in times of popular commotion to strengthen the hands of the executive government; and afterwards, when the danger was past, to revert to our former state of liberty and freedom. He should have had great difficulty in bringing himself to vote for the measure, if the noble lord had determined to persist in his original intentions; but now that he had so far conceded to the wishes of the House as to limit their duration to five years, he had not the slightest objection to strengthen his hands with these powers for that period. He should therefore advise the House, if they thought the danger to be so great as to justify them in passing the bill at all, to select that time for the period of trying its efficacy which was fixed on by the average opinion of all parties; because, if there was any injury done by passing these measures, it was in the way of precedent; and gentlemen who argued in behalf of their duration for three years rather than five, erred equally with their opponents against precedent, and, besides that, endangered the success of the measures themselves, by the reluctance which they evinced to grant the two additional years. This reluctance could only arise from the circumstance that they thought the danger not to be so great as was represented; and if that was the case, how did they reconcile it to themselves to vote for their continuance for three years? To confine those restrictions to certain counties, was also highly objectionable; because, if these radicals would abandon their principles in three years, under the restrictions now proposed to be established in their own districts, would it be right to allow them to have another field to which they might resort? Would it not be giving them a fresh place in which to carry on their trade and occupation? They all knew with what art those deluded and deluding men conducted their designs; and it was but too probable that the publications, which they would disseminate to effect their purpose in the districts not yet contaminated, would be of such a nature as would induce those who read them to go any lengths in the prosecution of the criminal objects held up as worthy of pursuit, though they would not be of such a nature as to render those who disseminated them liable to prosecution in the eye of the law. He should not detain them any longer at the present late hour of the night. He had only been led to express the sentiments which they had just heard from the love which he bore to the constitution, and the conviction which he felt that it was beyond all other things worth preserving. When he heard the question agitated, whether we were in the most danger from the encroachments of the Crown or of the people, he was at first in some doubt; but when he recollected the character and views of such men as Hunt, he felt convinced that they were ten times more dangerous enemies to liberty than any bad minister in this country possibly could be: so that he felt himself justified in adopting the sentiments of the poet,

"Now, half a patriot, half a coward grown,
"I fly from petty tyrants to the throne."

Lord Milton asked, what feelings ought to actuate the House when they passed their judgment on the present ministers, who, after acknowledging the value of the right of petition, had come forward and proposed to abrogate it for ever? The only right left by the present bill would be, not the right to meet, but the right to ask an officer of the Crown for leave to meet.

Lord Clive wished to correct a misrepresentation, under which several honourable members appeared to labour in the course of the debate. A noble relative of his had never said that there were 100,000 men furnished with arms in the northern counties: he had never stated from his own knowledge whether they had arms or not; he had merely said, that their own estimate of their numbers and strength was to that amount.

Mr. Marryat said, he could not but regret that the question respecting the duration of the bill, should have been brought forward in the present stage of their proceedings: it would have been much more convenient, in his opinion, to have gone through the different clauses of the bill in the committee first, and to have settled the duration of it afterwards. If the clauses were filled up in that spirit of moderation which had marked the speech of the noble lord on the treasury bench, he should have felt the less difficulty in agreeing to the more extended term proposed; but if, on the contrary, when it came out of the committee, it contained what he considered as severe and unnecessary restrictions on the liberty of the subject, he should then vote for limiting its duration to the shortest possible period. At present, the House were called upon to decide how long a bill should continue in force, the spirit and character of which they had yet to learn. As far as he could then judge, the period proposed by the motion was too short, and that proposed by the amendment too long; and he inclined to the opinion of the hon. member opposite (Mr. Buxton), that three years would be a more eligible term than either. He thought six weeks after the commencement of the next session of parliament too short a period, because the House would have to decide upon the renewal of the measure, before sufficient time had elapsed to enable them to form a correct judgment of its effects; and to excite fresh agitation in the public mind, before the present agitation had well subsided. He thought five years, and from thence to the end of the next ensuing session of parliament, too long, because he recollected that the allied sovereigns, after stipulating by treaty that their armies should continue in the occupation of France for five years, considering that period would be necessary for the restoration of tranquillity in that country, voluntarily evacuated it at the end of three years. If then, France, at the conclusion of a war in which the passions of men had been excited to a degree of fury that perhaps never was equalled, could completely recover her tranquillity in the course of three years, surely this country, under present circumstances, could not require a longer term of probation. Being called upon to decide between two extremes, he considered, in the first place, that to renew an expiring law, was easy, usual, and almost a matter of course; but to repeal an existing law, was on the contrary always attended with great difficulty. In the next place he considered, that if he must err at all, it was his duty to err on that side that was most favourable to the rights and liberties of the people; and for these reasons he should give his vote for the shorter, rather than for the longer period.

Mr. Wynn did not consider the measure before the House an infringement upon the rights of the people. He denied that it confined that right; on the contrary, it left it undiminished. It was not illegal, according to the provisions of the act, to hold meetings within doors; and before the American war it never was the practice to hold meetings in the open air. It had been said that it was left to the discretion of officers of the Crown to call public meetings; but he did not know that the sheriffs of counties were generally speaking, liable to the influence of the Crown. He knew there was a spirit of loyalty throughout the kingdom that would be sufficient to put down, even by force of arms, the disloyal and disaffected; but he had great confidence that it would be unnecessary to resort to such a measure.

Mr. Maxwell bore testimony to the people of his county assembling in arms, and firing off pistols on retiring from the spot. He considered it under all circumstances, his duty not to oppose the measure of the noble lord. He saw no objection to its extending to the manufacturing districts for five years, and to the whole empire for one year.

Lord Compton thought that circumstances would necessitate a much stronger measure if the present were not carried.

Mr. Benett, of Wiltshire, hoped that three years would be sufficient for the operation of the measure, as before that period, something might be done to better the condition of the people. He trusted that a select committee would be appointed to consider the distress of the country, and propose some relief.

Lord Cranley said, he should vote for the amendment of the chancellor of the exchequer, though he was of opinion that it would have been more beneficial to the country, that the bill should have been made permanent [Loud cries from the opposition of "Move that it be made permanent."]

The gallery was then cleared for a division. Colonel Beaumont's motion was negatived without a division. The House afterwards divided on the motion of Mr. Buxton to limit the bill to three years. For it, 153; Against it, 328: Majority, 175. The Chancellor of the exchequer's amendment was then carried in the affirmative; after which the House resolved itself into a committee, resumed, and the chairman obtained leave to sit again to-day.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, December 7.

SEIZURE OF ARMS BILL.] Lord Sid-mouth moved the third reading of this bill.

The Earl of Darnley did not rise to offer any opposition to the principle of the bill in this stage. He was disposed to allow that a temporary necessity for such a law might exist, though at the same time he thought that necessity had been, in a great measure, occasioned by the improper manner in which the existing laws had been administered but though he might admit the necessity of some enactment of this kind, it did not follow that he should approve of all the powers proposed to be given to the magistrates. What he chiefly objected to, was the power given to search houses by night. Besides, he did not see any advantage that could be derived from retaining that clause, as, after what had passed, it was not to be supposed that persons having arms in their possession, for an improper purpose, would keep them in their houses. On the contrary, it was to be presumed, that they would conceal them somewhere else. The noble lord then alluded to two local acts formerly passed, authorizing the seizing of arms, and particularly to one in the reign of William 3rd, which required the warrant of two justices to authorize the seizing of arms in the day-time. This example, he thought, ought to have been followed in the present bill; and he felt it his duty to protest against the power of entering and searching houses in the night-time.

Lord Sidmouth observed, that if the measure were really more severe than the circumstances of the country required, he would willingly consent to any proposition for softening it; but such was far from being the case. He did not set much importance on a precedent either of a remote or recent date, as the necessity of the present measure must be judged from the circumstances which gave rise to it. He could not agree to any alteration in the clause.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, December 7.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY—PETITION OF THE CORPORATION OF LONDON.] The sheriffs of London presented a petition from the lord mayor, alderman, and commons, of the city of London, in common council assembled; setting forth,

“ That the petitioners have learnt with apprehension and regret that measures subversive of our free constitution have been submitted to parliament by the ministers of the crown, on the pretext of conspiracy for the destruction of all religion, government, and property within the realm; for the defeat of so monstrous a design, did the petitioners believe in its reality, they would be most anxious to employ all the means that they possess; but while such an alarm rests merely upon unauthenticated or anonymous statements which have been submitted to no investigation (however countenanced by the turbulent conduct and inflammatory writings of some misguided or evil-minded men), the petitioners cannot perceive the necessity of any abridgment of our liberties; deeply lamenting the prevalence of discontent, the petitioners humbly recommend to the House, as its only proper cure, a sincere and earnest endeavour to remove all just ground of complaint, and, sensible of the inconveniences arising from frequent large assemblages, and from the want of respect and affection between the magistracy and the people, they respectfully submit that a constitutional remedy might be found in the establishment of a due representation and liberal municipal constitutions, agreeable to the ancient usage and analogy of our government, for those places in which population has extensively accumulated, but which do not yet enjoy them; that the petitioners fully participate in the disgust excited by some late publications hostile to the christian religion and the public peace, yet, as they immediately became the objects of general detestation, and could have been at once submitted to the judgment of the laws, and as they bear an infinitely small proportion to those productions which are favourable to knowledge, virtue, and religion, they seem to the petitioners to afford no reason for subjecting the press to enactments calculated to harass all who are connected with it, to destroy its freedom, and to prohibit some of its most useful labours; that the petitioners trust therefore, that at a time when they anxiously expected an investigation into transactions which have recently called forth an expression of general disapprobation, and hoped for such a redress of grievances and reform of abuses as might allay the irritated feelings of the people, the House will not hastily, and without inquiry, during the prevalence of an unfounded or exaggerated alarm, pass laws on account of a partial and temporary evil, tending permanently and universally to affect the liberty of the subject, and to produce increased irritation, while they are inefficient as to the purposes for which they are designed; the petitioners therefore humbly pray, and earnestly entreat, that should however some measures be thought necessary for the preservation of the public peace, that the House will adopt such only as shall be limited in their extent and duration, and that the next care of the House may be (rejecting the desperate counsels of those who would refuse all concession) to apply itself to the effectual correction of those abuses and defects which have given rise to the prevailing discontent.”

The petition was read, after which,

Mr. Alderman Wood observed that, in moving that it be laid on the table, he should say a very few words. He could not, however, consent to give a silent vote upon these bills: he had attended with the utmost diligence to the protracted debate upon them, and had not heard a single argument to convince him that an inquiry ought not to be granted before they were passed. After commenting on the statement made by lord Castle-reagh, of the immense number of stones found on the place of meeting at Manchester, the day after the meeting had occurred, and after treating as absurd the supposition of the noble lord, that the reformers had marched thirty or forty miles with these stones in their pockets, he proceeded to argue, that great advantage had been derived to the supporters of ministers from the candid manner in which another noble lord (Stanley), had expressed his sentiments on the fatal events of the 16th of August. Both in the House and out of the House it had been supposed that that noble lord had spoken of the facts to which he alluded, from his own personal knowledge, whereas he had fairly acknowledged that he only spoke upon information derived from others. He himself (ald. Wood) had heard nothing but opinions upon this subject: he had heard no facts; and facts were the most important points in this discussion. There were, however, some points on which they were all agreed; and one of these was, the existence of great distress in the nation. Hence arose our existing discontents; and what, he would ask, were the means which had been taken to allay them, or to remove the cause from which they originated? A committee had, indeed, been appointed, to take into consideration the state of the poor laws. What had been the result of their labours? Why, they had done nothing more than bring forth some new regulations regarding the law of settlements. What might they not have done, and yet what had they really done, with regard to Ireland? It was in evidence before the House, that in that country, there were above six millions of acres uncultivated. Had one of them been put into cultivation? No. And yet the House had voted during the last session 50,000*l.* for the use of those who were willing to emigrate to the Cape of Good Hope. The streets of the various towns in this country were filled with numbers of the lower Irish, who deprived our own population of employment to a certain degree. Surely, it would be as well to send some of them back to their own country, and employ them upon the millions of acres which it contained in an uncultivated state, and yet of a nature fitted for cultivation. This would be a means of relieving part of the existing distress. Other gentlemen would be able to devise other methods; and therefore he implored the House to institute, as soon as possible, a committee of inquiry regarding the most effective way of relieving the miseries of the unfortunate poor. During the course of the debate, none of the speakers, except some of those on his side of the House (indeed from the other side it would be quite idle to expect it), had entered into the cause of their distress; he therefore had great delight in seeing several hon. gentlemen with whom he generally acted, and among them the member for Durham, determined to force upon the House, and not to blink the question of parliamentary reform. Reform was now an object dear to the people: reform they would have; and all the House could do, either by restrictions on public meetings, or restrictions on the press, would be useless. The people would meet, and do as he himself had seen done in manufactories in France and Italy: one person would read to twenty, and the whole twenty, though they might read less than they did before, would certainly hear more read to them. The effect, too, of what was read would be stronger, from the different comments which would be made upon it. Those comments would lead the parties to attach themselves together more closely in private societies; and those societies would eventually prove much more dangerous than the late tumultuary meetings.

Mr. Alderman Thorpe expressed his satisfaction that ministers had at last determined to render these measures temporary. In saying this, he did not mean to admit that a case had been made out for even a temporary enactment of them. He thought that an exaggerated degree of alarm had been excited, by the large meetings which had been recently so common throughout the country, as many persons attended them from distress, and not from seditious motives. It was his opinion, that the House would have done more to conciliate the people by granting an inquiry, than it could ever do by resorting to measures of severity and coercion. He hoped the bills would receive further modifications when they were in the committee.

Mr. Alderman Waithman expressed his decided approbation of every sentiment contained in the petition, and his firm conviction, that, if the evil were so great as had been represented, it would increase, and not diminish, under the present restrictions.

Ordered to lie on the table.

MAGISTRACY OF NORFOLK.] Mr. Wodehouse rose for the purpose of making a communication to the House on a subject connected with lord Suffield, the lord-lieutenant of the county of Norfolk. He should abstain from making any comment upon the documents which he was going to read, and should commence, as a matter of public duty, by reading a letter which he had yesterday received from lord Suffield. The hon. member then read the following letter:—"Gunton, Dec. 4. Dear Wodehouse,—I am exceedingly obliged to you for your letter of yesterday, in reply to which I beg leave to say, that I am not conscious of having acted with any partiality respecting the insertion of gentlemen in the commission of the peace, of which I think the commission itself, with the additions made to it, affords pretty strong evidence. I recollect to have had some conversation with Mr. Coke at general Money's on the subject of the commission, but am not aware of a promise on my part to insert any gentleman Mr. Coke might name; nor, had I been so disposed, did Mr. Coke give me an opportunity, for I never had the honour of receiving an application from him to that effect; and a list of names sent by Mr. Coke to the clerk of the peace, even supposing such a list to have been sent, could not be considered by me in that point of view. In reference to Mr. Coke's assertion, that gentlemen have been added to the commission by the lord chancellor, in consequence of my refusal, I believe the statement to be absolutely erroneous, and that no such circumstance has taken place since I have had the honour of being lieutenant of Norfolk. I think both yourself and colonel Wodehouse can vouch for my impartiality, as I have certainly declined some applications from both of you, when it did not appear to me there was a want of magistrates, or for other reasons. I am, &c. Suffield." He received this communication yesterday, and had intended to have laid it before the House last night, had not certain circumstances prevented him. In the interval, he had had an interview with the lord chancellor, who had informed him, that he had no recollection of the circumstances to which his hon. colleague had on a former night alluded. Since that period he had received the following letter from his lordship:—"Dear sir—The assistance with which the chancellor is favoured by the custodes rotulorum in selecting persons to be placed in the commission of the peace in different counties, of whose qualifications he cannot have personal knowledge, has established a habit of the chancellor's placing in the commission gentlemen recommended by them. But this is mere recommendation, however much to be respected; and if the chancellor doubts the propriety of placing any person so recommended in the commission, he acts upon his own judgment. If the custos rotulorum declines to recommend any gentleman applying to him to be so recommended, and that gentleman applies to the chancellor, the chancellor judges for himself whether he will place the name in the commission, notwithstanding the objection, generally, if not always, first communicating with the custos rotulorum upon the subject of the objection. I am not able to call back to my recollection the circumstances which may have taken place respecting the Norfolk matter, which has been mentioned. I have a faint recollection that some mention was some time ago made to me, by whom I cannot say, respecting the want of magistrates in some part of that county. What was done upon that

I cannot ascertain; but my secretary of commissions having, at my instance, looked into the correspondence and papers for ten years, as he informs me, finds nothing relative to the appointment of justices in that county, in which communication has not been had with lord Suffield. If any other person applied to me, I therefore suppose I must have communicated with lord S.; but the only way, perhaps, in which accurate information can be obtained, is by Lord S.'s inspecting the commission, and seeing whether any names have been therein inserted without communication with him, and on the other hand, Mr. C. should state the particulars to which he alluded. It is possible, though I do not recollect the fact, that I have been applied to, to place gentlemen in this commission not recommended by Lord S. I think it very improbable that I should have placed their names in the commission without observing the civility of communicating to lord S. that such application had been made to me, though, after such communication, I should of course have decided upon the matter as it appeared to me to be right, if there had been any difference of opinion. That there has been any such I do not recollect. It occurs to me to mention, that there are two matters which are exceptions to what is above stated. A gentleman who was recommended by the secretary of state was of course inserted in the commission, and I very lately mentioned the name of a clergyman to be inserted in the commission, whose name I understood, would be found in the next recommendation of the custos rotulorum. Your's, dear sir, Eldon.—P. S. Being informed, since I wrote the above, that Mr. C. stated that he had a personal interview with me upon the subject, I cannot doubt the accuracy of that gentleman's statement, though the fact has escaped my recollection."—He had now performed what he conceived to be his duty, though he thought it right, before he sat down, to corroborate that part of lord Suffield's letter, where allusion was made to himself personally: he could speak with the utmost confidence of the impartiality which lord Suffield had always displayed in the exercise of his official duties.

Mr. Coke repeated, that in consequence of a declaration made to him at general Money's by lord Suffield, that he would insert in the commission of the peace the names of such of his friends as he (Mr. Coke) should recommend, he had left certain names at the office of the clerk of the peace for the county; and was afterwards informed that not one of the gentlemen whose names he had so left was appointed to the magistracy. Having made this application, as far as he could recollect, upon the most gracious declaration of lord Suffield, he was not a little surprised at the refusal which he experienced; and he therefore subsequently applied to the lord Chancellor for the same purpose. The lord chancellor advised him to make another application to the lord lieutenant; but under such circumstances as he had described, every body would see that such a proceeding was impossible. When, therefore, he came to town in the ensuing spring, he wrote to the lord chancellor on the subject, who appointed him a meeting in his private chamber in the House of Lords, where he had never been before, and where he had never been since. The lord chancellor told him, that he would turn the subject in his mind, for he was fully convinced that he (Mr. Coke) would not recommend any individual as a fit person to be appointed a magistrate who was unworthy of the situation. Whether lord Eldon had paid the lord lieutenant of the county the compliment of communicating with him on this point, he could not tell; but this he knew, that all the persons whom he recommended were within four months inserted in the commission, except, indeed, one hon. gentleman, now a member of the House. Whether the memory of lord Eldon had failed him, was not for him to determine: if it had, so much the worse for the suiters of the court in which his lordship presided. But he himself well recollected all these points. As to the impartiality which lord Suffield was said to display in the exercise of his magisterial duties, he must say that, for one, he doubted it. He firmly believed that several of the magistrates had merely been put into the commission for party purposes, and that several of his (Mr. Coke's) friends had been rejected merely because they were his friends. This was the kind of influence which would be exercised in all parts of the kingdom, if the present bills were to pass: it would be extended not only to the magistrates, but to the sheriffs in every county. He did not mean to say that it was extended so far at present; by no means: there had recently been a splendid meeting of the freeholders of Norfolk at Norwich; and too much praise could not be given to the high sheriff of the county for his conduct on that occasion. He had there stated, that it was his firm opinion, that the government were themselves most strongly implicated in the events at Manchester [loud cries of Hear!] It was his opinion, and he could not change it. It was his opinion, because they set their faces against all inquiry, for fear, he supposed, of something coming out which would deeply implicate themselves. Having taken parson Harrison in London without a riot, they were determined to kick up a riot, rather than not have a reason for enacting measures like the present.

The Speaker said, that before the conversation went any farther, he could not help pressing upon the notice of the House its irregularity, and the dangerous consequences which it might tend to produce. He ought, perhaps, to have stopped the hon. member who commenced it, but he was not aware of the length to which he would go. After he had allowed the hon. member to proceed through the whole of his statement, it would have been an act of gross injustice to have thrown any impediment in the way of the hon. member who had just sat down. He hoped the House would pardon him for saying, that the conversation had already gone far enough, and farther even than the most lax practice allowed. It was not, perhaps, necessary that their laws and regulations should always be observed to the letter; but unless the spirit of them was preserved, they would not be able to preserve their own dignity, or to carry on the business of the public with that celerity and regularity which was absolutely necessary.

The conversation then dropped.

PENRYN BRIBERY BILL.] Sir C. Burrell rose to make his promised motion respecting the Borough of Penryn. He said, he felt it his imperative duty again to bring the subject under the consideration of parliament; he trusted that hon. members would turn their attention to his bill of last session, that he might be enabled to carry it through all its stages. Alterations had been suggested to him in the provisions of it, but he had not seen any reason for adopting them. There had been several instances in which the elective franchise had been extended, and boroughs thrown open, and it was his firm conviction that they had been attended with great good. This bill had been in the hands of all the members last summer, and therefore he thought it unnecessary to say any thing more at present. The hon. baronet then moved "That leave be given to bring in a bill for the preventing of Bribery and Corruption in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for the borough of Penryn."

Sir C. Hawkins spoke in opposition to the measure, but was quite inaudible.

Mr. Denison said, he had suggested in the last session that the elective franchise should be transferred from Penryn to one of the most populous towns of the kingdom, as Birmingham or Manchester, which did not send a member to parliament.—The corruptions of that borough were so notorious, that it appeared to him quite hopeless to think of preventing them, except by removing the elective franchise altogether. His majesty's ministers had resorted to very strong measures—they had sharpened the sword against itinerant orators, and against those who had inflamed the public mind; if they had gone no further it would have been well, but they had adopted a system of coercion against the people instead of one of conciliation. He thought, that had the elective franchise been transferred from Penryn to Manchester, it would have tended much to conciliate the people of that place. On the subject of reform he would say nothing. His hon. friend the member for Durham, had given notice of his intention to submit to the House a motion of that kind, and he had no doubt that it would meet with his perfect concurrence. The noble lord had mistaken the true way to pacify and conciliate the public mind. He might sharpen the sword of the law to put down factious demagogues, but let them throw down the olive-branch to the people.

"Be to their faults a little blind,
"Be to their virtues very kind,
"And clap the padlock on their mind."

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Sir R. Peel moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the act passed last session, for the better regulation of Cotton Factories.—The object of the amendment was, when any accident by fire or otherwise took place in a factory, to allow the people thrown out of employment by such accident, to work by night, in such part of the works as were not destroyed, till the accident was made good. If this was not allowed, the worst consequences must arise, from letting loose on society a number of people without employment.

Lord A. Hamilton observed, that a case had lately occurred in the county which he had the honour to represent, which proved the necessity for the bill now moved for. Part of the factory of an individual well known to many members of that House, had lately been burnt down, and without an alteration in the law a number of persons would be thrown out of work altogether.

Mr. Philips said, the bill now moved for was a complete proof of the absurdity of attempting to interfere between the employer and the labourer. This bill gave a sanction to the most disgraceful practice ever adopted in cotton factories, that of employing persons by night; and yet he did not see how the measure could be refused, without depriving a number of people of work altogether.

Mr. Brougham did not see how the present bill could be considered as a proof of the absurdity of the former measure. In a subject of such extent it was hardly possible to provide for every case that might occur, and accordingly the accident alluded to proved that there was an omission in the act; but that omission would now be supplied without delay.

Mr. Finlay would have been more willing to vote for the repeal of the former act. His hon. and learned friend had talked of an omission—why it was full of omissions. The accident had happened to the person with whom the bill originated; but had it happened to a person less favourable to the measure, perhaps the hon. baronet would not have shown the same eagerness to supply the omission.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

SEDITIONOUS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] Lord Castlereagh having moved the order of the day for going into a committee on this bill,

Mr. Hutchinson said, that before the House went into a committee, he would, with the leave of the House, make a few observations. In the first place, then, he would again express his astonishment and surprise at the intention of the noble lord to extend the provisions of the bill to Ireland. He did not mean to look on this subject in a narrow point of view. He could assure honourable gentlemen, members for England and Scotland, that no one more heartily entered into their feelings than himself—that no one would be more anxious to assist them in protecting the well disposed and the loyal, if they wanted protection. Having unfortunately witnessed disturbances in his own country—having seen how far the zeal and the fears of men carried them—he was willing to make every allowance for gentlemen on this occasion. But measures of this kind were measures of pains and penalties much more likely to violate the constitution, than to put down the disaffected. Differing as he did from gentlemen who thought these bills necessary, he was yet willing that every protection should be given to the public peace, and even with his purse he was willing to assist—but the assistance he would render, would be very different from the support of measures calculated to overturn the constitution of England. He rose principally to say a few words in favour of that part of the empire from whence he came, and of which he ever felt proud. He did not recollect the precise words that fell a few nights ago from the noble lord, but he recollected, and the House recollected the matter of that speech. He would remind the noble lord of the description he had given of the present state of Ireland—he had described that country as in a state of peace, of tranquillity, and prosperity: he had even gone further—he seemed to have taken credit to himself for the present tranquillity of that country, and he had contrasted her situation with other parts of the empire. From the opening speech of the noble lord, then, there was no reason to conjecture that these bills of pains and penalties were to be extended to Ireland: no one could suppose that her loyalty, her tranquillity, her patience under sufferings, were to be rewarded by a fresh aggression on her liberties. True, the noble lord had stated that the bills were to extend to parts of England not disturbed, but from no part of his speech could it be conjectured that it was his intention, or that it was at all necessary, to extend the provisions of these obnoxious bills to Ireland. If the noble lord had fairly stated such to be his intention, he would have been ready to enter the lists with him, and to convince him,—if his mind was at all open to conviction,—that the bill was not at all necessary for Ireland; that it was uncalled for, that it was unwise, as well as unjust. He would ask the noble lord to recollect the days of the Irish parliament—the days of her glory and of her disgrace—yet even in the most disgraceful and degenerate state of that parliament would the noble lord, at the very moment that he boasted of the tranquillity and prosperity of the country, have dared to go to the Irish parliament and say, “You have been tranquil, you have been prosperous, and I now come down to propose for you a system of pains, of penalties, and of degradation—I propose to disarm your people, to invade the liberty of the press, and to prevent public meetings—I come down to prepare gagging bills and measures which innovate on your constitution.” Would the noble lord have ventured to make such a proposal to an Irish parliament? Would an Irish parliament lost and degraded as it might be, have endured so great an outrage? He would ask the noble lord, then, did he mean to dissolve the union—did he mean to disgust the Irish people, more than they were with that odious measure? The noble lord had done enough to disgust that country since the union. He had not, indeed, given any specific pledge—he was too cautious to do that; but he had done enough to shew that it was not intended to observe the spirit of the act of union. He put it to the noble lord, did he mean to outrage, more than they had been, the feelings of that oppressed and insulted people? Was it because some parts of the manufacturing districts of England were discontented, that therefore Ireland—inoffensive and peaceable as she was acknowledged to be by the noble lord, for which she received the praise of the noble lord—was to be visited with a bill of fresh pains and penalties? Ireland, after suffering for ages under the bad, the ungenerous policy of England—Ireland, whose oppressions words could not describe, had yet proved superior to her misfortunes, and had shown a rare and excellent example of good conduct. Why would not the noble lord allow her to remain in this state of peace and repose?—Did he mean to drive the people into rebellion? He might rest assured, that no measure would be more mortifying to Ireland than the extension of this bill. The bill went to prevent public meetings, unless under certain sanctions. It went, then, to prevent Catholic meetings—meetings which had been ever marked by order and decorum; yet, under the provisions of this bill, the Catholics of Dublin, and of other cities, would not be allowed to assemble in their accustomed meetings, without the permission of the aldermen, the sheriffs, or the lord mayor—men generally speaking, of bigotted principles; they would be then driven to parish meetings, or not to meet at all; and thus, would that feeling of disgust which suffering and injustice must ever create, be greatly increased by a wanton and insulting prohibition: he really did not believe that the noble lord intended to extend the bill to Ireland, when he made his opening speech. Indeed, it was a fact, that some Irish members had voted with the noble lord under the belief that the bill was not to apply to Ireland. He could say more: that inquiries were made by an individual whether the provisions of the bill were intended to be extended to Ireland, and he was informed they were not. He believed it was quite an after thought, to meet the objections of those who might ask, why this abominable measure should be applied to England, to Wales, and Scotland, and not to Ireland. The noble lord seemed to have a second sight on the subject, and he now intended to put this bill down the throats of the Irish. The bill was clearly not necessary by his own statement; yet he would venture to turn round to the Irish members, and say, you must consent to it. The noble lord had said a great deal about the prosperity of Ireland. It was a description to which he could not bear testimony: there was no part of the world where the peasantry endured greater misery and distress—the trade and manufactures of the country were so low, that the chancellor of the exchequer had declared, a few nights since, that it was necessary to continue the protecting duties settled at the time of the Union, for some years longer. And why was it necessary? Because the manufactures of Ireland were in such a state as would end in ruin, if they had not the benefit of these protecting duties. Twenty years of trial had passed away since the Union, and the Irish manufactures were in a state of ruin, and the Irish people in a state of the utmost distress. It was then very strange that the noble lord should talk of the prosperity of a country which required only to be visited to show its poverty and wretchedness. Such was its real situation, and the assertion of the noble lord must have been made in ignorance, or

with a wish to deceive. So fully was he impressed with the unhappy situation of that country, that should no other member be found to do so, he would in the course of the session, move for a committee to take the state of Ireland into consideration. Before he sat down, he would for that country, implore the protection of the House: he was sure they would not outrage the feelings of the Irish people. To the principles of the measures, as they affected the rest of the empire, he had objections not less strong. He had seen measures of a similar character tried in Ireland before the rebellion. What could be their object now but to gag the people—to put down their free meetings—to prevent public opinion from showing its front against the ministers—to disarm the people—to expose their houses to be entered at night—and to subject females to brutal insult, or brutal violation!—These things had occurred in Ireland. The noble lord might wish to forget them, but they could never be forgotten there. What would these measures effect? They would drive the people to madness. The system which the noble lord and those who acted with him had pursued for many years, had involved the country in misfortune, and had left the people oppressed with an intolerable load of taxation—and now the work was to be completed by gaining a surrender of all their liberties? The hon. member concluded by saying, that though he was not then prepared with any amendment, he would, in the course of the discussion propose, that Ireland should be exempted from the operation of the bill.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the hon. member would have several opportunities of bringing on the discussion he had in view. He might do so in the committee, or on the report.

The House having gone into a committee, the chairman began to read the bill, paragraph by paragraph. When he arrived at the clause, which enables lords-lieutenant, or custodes rotulorum of counties to convene public meetings,

Sir C. Monck objected to this new provision, on the ground that it was desirable that different authorities should be as little confounded together as possible. But if it were proper to maintain, in any case, a distinction between the functions of particular offices, it was between those of a civil and military nature.

The lord-lieutenant was a military officer, not of very ancient institution, although, in point of fact, he was sometimes also custos rotulorum. This was not, however, uniformly the case; for instance, in Durham, the bishop, on account of his palatinate rights, was the custos. He could see no good reason for this innovation. If at all admitted, he should prefer seeing the custos only mentioned, or should not object to the authority being confined to the sheriff. This last was always forthcoming, generally resident, and could always act through his deputies. The custos was no other way distinguished than by being at the head of the commission of the peace. In this character he sometimes corresponded with government, but no otherwise held a higher rank than the rest of the magistracy. He now proposed, therefore, to leave out the words "lord-lieutenant."

Lord Castlereagh observed, that this clause would not interfere with another, which provided, that the old law should continue in all respects, except only as certain new regulations were added. The sheriff would still have the power of convening the county, and he could not conceive what objection there was to the lord-lieutenant possessing a similar authority.
